THE ALL ENGLAND LAW REPORTS REPRINT

BOWMAN AND OTHERS v. SECULAR SOCIETY, LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Finlay, L.C., Lord Dunedin, Lord Parker of Waddington, Lord Sumner and Lord Buckmaster), January 30, February 1, 2, 5, 8, May 14, 1917]

The granting of a certificate of the incorporation of a company, while constituting conclusive evidence that all the requirements of the Companies Acts in respect of registration have been complied with and that the company is duly registered under the Acts [see now Companies Act, 1948, s. 15], is not conclusive of the legality of the objects set out in the memorandum of the company. If a company with illegal objects obtained registration and the matter came to the notice of the court, the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown could institute proceedings by way of certiorari to cancel the registration which had been improperly or erroneously allowed.

Even if the objects of a company were illegal it would not follow that, while the certificate of incorporation remained unrevoked, the company would be incompetent to receive money for the furtherance of those objects, for in such a case the law takes no notice of the donor's motive in making the gift or the legality or otherwise of the purposes for which he intends the property to be applied by the donee and a company is not a trustee of money which it receives as an absolute gift. Where a gift to a company is in the form of a legacy the executor administering the testator's estate cannot be heard to discuss the probable uses to which the company would put the money any more than if the legacy had been to an individual. If, however, the directors of the company applied the money for an illegal object, they would be guilty of misfeasance and liable to replace the money, even if the object for which the money was applied was expressly authorised by the memorandum.

Per LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON: The registrar of companies fulfils a quasi-judicial function, and his duty is to determine whether an association applying for registration as a company is authorised to be registered under the Companies Acts. Only by misconduct or great carelessness on the part of the registrar could a company with objects wholly illegal obtain registration.

Criminal Law—Blasphemy—Need to prove vilification or irreverence.

Per LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON: To constitute blasphemy at common law there must be such an element of vilification, ridicule, or irreverence as would be likely to exasperate the feelings of others and so lead to a breach of the peace.

By his will a testator gave the residue of his estate upon trust for a company limited by guarantee and registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1893. The main object with which the company was formed was to promote the principle "that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action," together with ancillary objects hostile to or critical of the Christian religion.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal, reported [1915] 2 Ch. 447, affirming a judgment of JOYCE, J., upon an originating summons taken out by the Secular Society, Ltd., the present respondents, to obtain the payment to them of the residue of the estate of the late Charles Bowman.

 The House took time for consideration.
 May 14, 1917. The following opinions were read.

D LORD FINLAY, L.C.—The question in this case is as to the validity of a bequest of residue to the respondents, the Secular Society, Ltd. The right of the respondents to payment was attacked by the appellants, the next of kin of the testator, upon the ground that the objects of the respondents' society were such that the bequest was not enforceable. The respondents took out an originating summons, dated Nov. 25, 1914, for the payment of the residue to them. JOYCE, J., decided in their favour, and his decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal.

E The decision of the case must turn upon the proper construction of the memorandum of association of the respondents' society, and the view to be taken of the law of England with regard to bequests for such purposes as are therein enumerated. The memorandum of association, so far as material, is as follows:

F “(3) The objects for which the company is formed are: (a) To promote in such ways as may from time to time be determined the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. (b) To promote the utmost freedom of inquiry and the publication of its discoveries. (c) To promote the secularisation of the State, so that religious tests and observances may be banished from the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary. (d) To promote the abolition of all support, patronage, or favour by the State of any particular form or forms of religion. (e) To promote universal secular education, without any religious teaching in public schools maintained in any way by municipal rates or imperial taxation. (f) To promote an alteration in the laws concerning religion, so that all forms of opinion may have the same legal rights of propaganda and endowment. (g) To promote the recognition by the State of marriage as a purely civil contract, leaving its religious sanctions to the judgment and determination of individual citizens. (h) To promote the recognition of Sunday by the State as a purely civil institution for the benefit of the people and the repeal of all Sabbatarian laws devised and operating in the interest of religious sects, religious observances, or religious ideas.”

H I In my opinion, the governing object of the society is that which is stated in para. 3 (a) of the memorandum of association, and the other objects stated in the memorandum under heads (b) to (g) of the third paragraph are subsidiary. I agree with what has been said by the founder of the respondent society in an article from the “Freethinker,” June 19, 1898, which is in evidence: “Clause (a) is of the highest importance and governs everything else.” It was argued on behalf of the respondents that some, at all events, of the objects of the society are not affected by any taint of illegality—e.g., that 3 (d) and (e), which state disestablishment and universal secular education as objects to be promoted, are in themselves harmless. It is, of course, the fact that either of these two objects may be advocated from motives which are entirely friendly to religion. But it (a) is the governing object, then these and all the other clauses in the memorandum must be read by its light; in other words all the other clauses in the third paragraph are so many ways of carrying into practical application the principle enunciated in the first paragraph of cl. 3. That clause, in my opinion, lays down quite clearly that human conduct should not be based upon supernatural belief. This amounts to a negation of all religion, including, of course, the Christian religion, as governing human conduct. If the influence of supernatural motives is to be eliminated, the Christian religion is discarded in common with all forms of religion in the ordinary sense of the term. I think, therefore, that the memorandum shows that the object of the society was to promote in various ways the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge only, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action. Is a legacy in favour of a society which exists for such a purpose enforceable by English law?

Two preliminary points were taken on behalf of the respondents. They contended, first, that the certificate of incorporation is conclusive to show that the objects of the society are not unlawful, and, secondly, that some of the objects were not unlawful and it cannot be presumed that the legacy in question would be applied to any but lawful objects. We were informed that these points were argued on behalf of the respondents in the Court of Appeal. No notice is taken of either of them in any of the judgments, and the court must have considered that they had been disposed of in the course of the argument. In my opinion, neither is tenable. The society was registered on May 27, 1898, as a company limited by guarantee under the Companies Acts. The statute then in force was the Companies Act, 1862. Section 18 deals with the effect of registration and enacts that the certificate of incorporation shall be conclusive evidence that all the requirements of the Act in respect of registration have been complied with, and s. 192 repeats this provision and adds that the certificate is to be conclusive evidence that the company is authorised to be registered under the Acts. The Companies Act, 1900, enacts by s. 1 that the certificate shall be conclusive evidence that all the requisitions of the Companies Acts in respect of registration and in matters precedent and incidental thereto have been complied with, and that the association is a company authorised to be registered and duly registered under the Companies Acts. This provision appears to have been introduced into the Act of 1900 to get rid of some doubts which had been raised by what was said in Re National Debenture and Assets Corpn. (4) to the effect that if, in fact, only six persons had subscribed the memorandum, incorporation would not have been validly effected, and it is repeated in s. 17 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [see now s. 15 of the Companies Act, 1948]. It was argued before us that the society could not have been properly incorporated if its objects were illegal, and that as the certificate is conclusive to show that the company is one authorised to be registered and duly registered, it follows that it cannot for any purpose be contended that the objects are illegal. In my opinion, this argument is an attempt to extend the effect of these enactments beyond their fair meaning and manifest object. What the legislature was dealing with was the validity of the incorporation and it is for the purpose of incorporation, and for this purpose only, that the certificate is made conclusive. This first preliminary point, in my opinion, fails. The second point also fails on the true construction of the memorandum with which I have dealt above. Taken in themselves, some of the objects, as stated in the memorandum, may be harmless, but they cannot be taken by themselves. They are mere applications of the governing principle stated in 3 (a), and we are driven back upon the question whether that object is legal.

Counsel for the appellants contended that it was illegal on two grounds. First, that it is criminal to attack the Christian religion, however decent and temperate may be the form of attack. Second, that a court of law will not assist in the

A promotion of such objects as that for which this society is formed, whether they are criminal or not.

In support of the first of these propositions, it was contended that to attack the Christian religion is blasphemy by the common law of England, and that the view put forward upon this subject by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., is erroneous. LORD COLERIDGE laid it down in R. v. Ramsay and Foote (3) (15 Cox, C.C. at p. 238).
B that

"if the decencies of controversy are observed, even the fundamentals of religion may be attacked without the writer being guilty of blasphemy."

This view was controverted by SIR JAMES FITZJAMES STEPHEN, who, in his HISTORY OF THE CRIMINAL LAW, vol. 2, pp. 449-476, on a review of the authorities, maintained that blasphemy consisted in the character of the matter published and not in the manner in which it is stated, and that any attack on the Christian religion, in whatever language expressed, constituted the offence of blasphemy at common law. A reply to the arguments of SIR J. F. STEPHEN was made by MR. ASPLAND of the Middle Temple, barrister-at-law, in a pamphlet entitled THE LAW OF BLASPHEMY, published in 1884, in which the authorities up to date are collected and examined. If SIR J. F. STEPHEN'S view be right, any pamphlet or speech in promotion of the governing object of the respondent society would be criminal and in every sense illegal. In my opinion, the appellants have failed to establish that all attacks upon religion are at common law punishable as blasphemous. There are no doubt to be found in the cases many expressions to the effect that Christianity is part of the law of England, but no decision has been brought to our notice in which a conviction took place for the advocacy of principles at variance with Christianity, apart from circumstances of scurrility or intemperance of language.

The earliest prosecution for blasphemy in the common law courts was in the reign of Charles II; in earlier times probably such cases were dealt with by the ecclesiastical courts. The main cases on this subject prior to R. v. Ramsay and Foote (3) are: (i) R. v. Taylor (5); (ii) R. v. Woolston (6); (iii) R. v. Williams (7) (in connection with which R. v. Carlile (8), and R. v. Eaton (9) should be referred to); (iv) R. v. Waddington (10); (v) R. v. Hetherington (11). In the cases numbered (i), (iii), (iv) and (v), it is apparent on the face of the reports that the language used was scurrilous and offensive. This is less apparent in the reports of R. v. Woolston (6). But examination of the libels in respect of which informations in that case were filed, namely, Mr. Woolston's first, second, third, and fourth discourses of the miracles of our Saviour, shows that the sacred subjects treated by him were handled with a great deal of irreverence, and in many passages language was used by him that was blasphemous in every sense of the term. It is apparently with reference to this element that in a passage in the report in 1 BARNARDISTON, p. 163, the court in dealing with the second point made on behalf of Mr. Woolston observed: "That as the Christian religion was part of the law of the land whatever derided that derided the law." The true view of the law of blasphemy appears to me to be that expressed by LORD DENMAN in R. v. Hetherington (11), which is substantially in accordance with that taken by LORD COLERIDGE in R. v. Ramsay and Foote (3), and followed by PHILLIMORE, J., in R. v. Boulter (12). We have been referred by LORD DUNEDIN to the law of Scotland on this subject, as stated in HUME'S CRIMINAL LAW (vol. 1, p. 568), and it appears to be the case that in Scotland scurrility or indecency is an essential element of the crime of blasphemy at common law. Certain Scottish statutes which made it a crime to contravene certain doctrines have been repealed. The consequences of the view put forward on behalf of the appellants would be somewhat startling, and in the absence of any actual decision to the contrary I think we must hold that the law of England on this point is the same as that of Scotland, and that the crime of blasphemy is not constituted by a temperate attack on religion in which the decencies of controversy are maintained. A

The appellants, however, contended that whether criminal or not, the objects for which the society was formed were such that the law would give no help for the recovery of funds to be applied in their promotion. The principle on which this part of the appellants' case rested was very clearly stated by BRAMWELL, B., in Cowan v. Milbourn (2). In the course of the argument, BRAMWELL, B., said B (L.R. 2 Exch. at p. 233):

"An act may be illegal in the sense that it will not be recognised by the law as capable of being the foundation of any legal right, or that it may even deprive what it accompanies of that capacity although it is followed by no penalty."

In the course of his judgment (ibid. at p. 236) he expressed himself to the same effect. The principle is very familiar, and has been applied in innumerable cases. The question whether the present case falls within it demands a careful examination of the authorities. In arriving at the conclusion that the object of the respondent society was not unlawful in the sense that the court will not aid the plaintiff to get the legacy, the Court of Appeal found it necessary to overrule two cases. The first of these cases is Briggs v. Hartley (1). In this case a legacy had been left for the best original essay on C

"The subject of natural theology, treating it as a science and demonstrating the truth, harmony, and infallibility of the evidence on which it is founded, and the perfect accordance of such evidence with reason, also demonstrating the adequacy and sufficiency of natural theology when so treated and taught as a science to constitute a true, perfect, and philosophical system of universal religion (analogous to other universal systems of science such as astronomy, &c.) founded on immutable facts and the works of creation and beautifully adapted to man's reason and nature, and tending, as other sciences do, but in a higher degree, to remove and elevate his nature and to render him a wise, happy, and exalted being." E F

SHADWELL, V.-C., gave judgment in these terms:

"I cannot conceive that the bequest in the testator's will is at all consistent with Christianity, and, therefore, it must fail."

This is a direct decision by a judge of great eminence upon the point, and, in my opinion, the Court of Appeal had no sufficient ground for overruling it. G

The second of these cases is Cowan v. Milbourn (2). In that case the plaintiff had hired of the defendant some rooms at Liverpool for the purpose of having lectures delivered there. Placards were issued giving as some of the subjects of the lectures "the character and teachings of Christ, the former defective, the latter misleading," and "The Bible shown to be no more inspired than any other book, with a refutation of modern theories thereon." The use of the rooms was refused by the defendant, and he justified his refusal by the character of the lectures proposed to be delivered. In an action in the Court of Passage, Liverpool, for breach of contract to let, the learned judge ruled that the lectures announced were blasphemous and illegal, and a verdict was entered for the defendants, with leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for him on each of these counts. Motion was made accordingly in the Court of Exchequer before KELLY C.B., MARTIN, B., and BRAMWELL, B. The court refused to grant a rule, the Chief Baron expressing himself as follows (L.R. 2 Exch. at p. 234): H I

"It would be a violation of duty to allow the question raised to remain in any doubt. That question is whether one who has contracted to let rooms for a purpose stated in general terms, and who afterwards discovers that they are to be used for the delivery of lectures in support of a proposition which states, with respect to our Saviour and His teaching, that the first is defective and the second misleading, is nevertheless bound to permit his rooms to be used for that purpose in pursuance of that general contract. There is abundant authority for saying that Christianity is part and parcel of the law of the land, and that therefore to support and maintain publicly the proposition I have above mentioned is a violation of the first principles of the law and cannot be done without blasphemy. I therefore do not hesitate to say that the defendant was not only entitled, but was called on and bound by the law, to refuse his sanction to this use of his rooms."

"I am of the same opinion, and I will state my grounds. I think that the plaintiff was about to use the rooms for an unlawful purpose, because he was about to use them for the purpose of, 'by teaching or advised speaking,' 'denying the Christian religion to be true or the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be of Divine authority.' That he intended to use the rooms for the purposes declared by the statute to be unlawful is perfectly clear, for he proposed to show that the character of Christ was defective and His teaching misleading, and that the Bible was no more inspired than any other book. That being so, his purpose was unlawful, and if the defendant had known his purpose at the time of the refusal he clearly would not have been bound to let the plaintiff occupy them, for if he would, he would then have been compelled to do a thing in pursuance of an illegal purpose. . . . Now, it appears that the plaintiff here was going to use the rooms for an unlawful purpose; he therefore could not enforce the contract for that purpose, and therefore the defendant was not bound, though he did not know the fact. It is strange there should be so much difficulty in making it understood that a thing may be unlawful in the sense that the law will not aid it and yet that the law will not immediately punish it. If that only were unlawful to which a penalty is attached the consequence would be that inasmuch as no penalty is provided by the law for prostitution a contract having prostitution for its object would be valid in a court of law. The rule must be refused, and I do not regret the result, and on this ground, that this placard must have given great pain to many of those who read it."

The authority of these two decisions has never, so far as I am aware, been questioned in any later case, and no satisfactory reason is given in the Court of Appeal for disregarding them. The Master of the Rolls says ([1915] 2 Ch. at p. 463):

"It seems to me that the undoubted relaxation of the views as to common law blasphemy must extend to matters outside the criminal law."

He goes on to say that in his view the decision in Briggs v. Hartley (1) ought not to be followed, and with regard to Cowan v. Milbourn (2) he says (ibid. at p. 464):

"So far as I am aware, this case, which was decided in 1867, has never been followed, and notwithstanding my profound respect for the learned judges who decided it, I am bound to say that I think it ought not to be followed. If Cowan v. Milbourn (2) is still good law, the plaintiffs cannot claim the legacy, but as I do not consider it is good law I think JOYCE, J., was right in the view which he took."

"A much more difficult question is whether this object, though not illegal in the sense of being punishable, is illegal in the sense that the law will not recognise it as being the foundation of legal right, and will do nothing to aid it. The denial of religion is not in terms the object of the company as set out in (a), but I think that it is involved in it, and that it is not possible to promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge and that human welfare is the proper end of all thought and action, without, at any rate inferentially, denying the Divine government of the world and the principles of religion. I think there is no doubt that in former times such an object would have been held to be contrary to public policy, but the question is whether it is right to hold so now. I think that the doctrine of public policy cannot be considered as being always the same, and that many things would be and have been held contrary to public policy which are not so held now."

The learned lord justice goes on to refer to Briggs v. Hartley (1) and Cowan v. Milbourn (2), and says (ibid. at p. 467):

"Whatever may have been the doctrine as to public policy prevailing in 1850, when the former case was decided, I do not think that it ought now to be followed. If the latter decision means that no consideration will support a contract which involves any questioning of the truth of religion, I also think that should not be followed, but the court may have inferred from the title to which I referred that the lectures attacked religion in a reviling and contumelious manner, and if that were the case the decision was, I think, right.

WARRINGTON, L.J., does not specifically refer to Briggs v. Hartley (1), and with regard to the judgments of KELLY, C.B., and BRAMWELL, B., in Cowan v. Milbourn (2), he says (ibid. at p. 473):

"Neither of the judges really dealt with the question whether the lectures, if not infringing a positive ordinance of law, would have rendered the contract incapable of being enforced. It is quite true that BRAMWELL, B., laid it down that a thing may be unlawful in the sense that the law will not aid it and yet that the law will not immediately punish it, but accepting this as correct, as I think it clearly is, it still remains to consider whether the particular thing in question is unlawful in the wider sense or not. In my opinion there is no authority binding us to hold that the promotion in a proper manner of the objects of the company is contrary to public policy, and we ought not to hold it to be so."

It may be that there has been a considerable change of public opinion with regard to the discussion of religion, but the question is whether anything has taken place to justify any court in holding that the principle of law on this matter may be treated as obsolete. From time to time the standard as to what is decent discussion of religious subjects may vary, and in one age a jury would find that a particular publication was blasphemous in the strict sense of the term which would not be so considered in another. With regard to questions of public policy such as those arising in connection with restraint of trade, circumstances with regard to facility of communication and of travel may so alter that the principle invalidating such contracts would apply to a particular state of circumstances in one age but not in another. But it is difficult to see how a change in the spirit of the time could justify a change in a principle of law by judicial decision. Such changes in public opinion may lead to legislative interference and substantive alteration of the law, but cannot justify a departure by any court from legal principle, however they may affect its application in particular cases. The decisions in Briggs v. Hartley (2) and Cowan v. Milbourn (2) are in conformity with a considerable body of authority on this subject. It has been repeatedly laid down by the courts that Christianity is part of the law of the land, and it is the fact that our civil polity is to a large extent based upon the Christian religion. This is notably so with regard to the law of marriage and the law affecting the family. The statement that Christianity is part of the law of the land has been often given as a reason for punishing criminally contumelious attacks upon Christianity. It is true that expressions have in some cases been used which would seem to imply that any attack upon Christianity, however decently conducted, would be criminal. For the reasons I have already given, I do not think that this view can be accepted

A as having represented the common law of England at any time. But the fact that Christianity is recognised by the law as the basis to a great extent of our civil polity is quite sufficient reason for holding that the law will not help endeavours to undermine it.

B These two cases do not stand alone. In 1754 De Costa v. De Paz (13) came before LORD HARDWICKE, the question arising upon a will which directed the investment of £1,200 and that the revenue arising therefrom should be applied forever in the maintenance of a Jesiba or assembly for daily reading the Jewish law and for advancing and propagating their holy religion. A bill was brought to have the money laid out according to the will, and, as stated in the report (2 Swan. at p. 488, n.):

C "The Lord Chancellor, upon the opening, asked if there had ever been a case where such a charity as this had been established, for it being against the Christian religion, which is part of the law of the land, he thought he could not decree it."

D After argument, LORD HARDWICKE said that the first question was "whether the legacy in question is good and such as this court can or ought to establish." He pointed out that the case would be different where the legacy was for the support of poor persons of the Jewish religion, and then proceeds as follows (ibid. at p. 490, n.):

E "But this is a bequest for the propagation of the Jewish religion, and though it is said that this is a part of our religion, yet the intent of this bequest must be taken to be in contradiction to the Christian religion, which is a part of the law of the land, which is so laid down by LORD HALE and LORD RAYMOND; and it undoubtedly is so, for the constitution and policy of this nation is founded thereon. As to the Act of Toleration, no new right is given by that, but only an exemption from the penal laws. The Toleration Act recites the penal laws, and then not only exempts from those penal laws, but puts the religion of the dissenters under certain regulations and tests. This renders those religions legal, which is not the case of the Jewish religion, that is not taken notice of by any law, but is barely connived at by the legislature."

F Accordingly, LORD HARDWICKE declared that he was of opinion that the legacy was not good in law, and ought not to be decreed or established by the court. In 1819, in In Re Bedford Charity (14), LORD ELDON referred (2 Swan. at p. 522) to De Costa v. De Paz (13) as establishing that no one can found by charitable donation an institution for the purpose of teaching the Jewish religion, and made the following observations (ibid. at p. 527):

G "I apprehend that it is the duty of every judge presiding in an English court of justice, when he is told that there is no difference between worshipping the Supreme Being in chapel, church, or synagogue, to recollect that Christianity is part of the law of England."

H It will be observed that De Costa v. De Paz (13) is a decision given by LORD HARDWICKE in 1744 and approved by LORD ELDON in 1819, to the effect that a legacy for the promotion of the Jewish religion was not enforceable, as being for the promotion of a faith contrary to Christianity. Secularism, as explained in the respondents' memorandum, is much more contrary to Christianity than is the Jewish religion. The Jews have been relieved by the Jewish Relief Act, 1846, s. 2, but there is no statute in similar terms with regard to those holding the views expressed by the memorandum of the respondent society.

I In Lawrence v. Smith (15) a bill was filed to restrain the piracy of some lectures delivered at the College of Surgeons. An ex parte injunction was granted and a motion was made by the defendant to dissolve the injunction on the ground that the work could not be the subject of copyright, and passages were referred to which, it was contended, were hostile to natural and revealed religion and denied the immortality of the soul. The Lord Chancellor said, in giving judgment (Jac. at p. 473):

"Looking at the general tenour of the work, and at many particular parts of it, recollecting that the immortality of the soul is one of the doctrines of the Scriptures, considering that the law does not give protection to those who contradict the Scriptures, and entertaining a doubt, I think a rational doubt, whether this book does not violate that law, I cannot continue the injunction. The plaintiff may bring an action, and when that is decided he may apply again."

In a note (ibid. at p. 474) it is stated that in Murray v. Benbow (16) (Feb., 1822) Mr. Shadwell, on the part of the plaintiff, moved for an injunction to restrain the defendant from publishing a pirated edition of LORD BYRON's poem, "Cain," and that the Lord Chancellor, after reading the work, refused the motion on grounds similar to those stated in Lawrence v. Smith (15). A note of LORD ELDON's judgment on that application is given in the preface to "Cain" in the large octavo edition of BYRON's works, published in 1846 by John Murray, p. 317. In Thompson v. Thompson (17) a question having arisen (vide 1 Coll. at p. 392) as to a bequest for literary purposes with reference to the doctrines maintained in the testator's writings, the Vice-Chancellor (SIR J. L. KNIGHT-BRUCE) said (ibid. at p. 397):

"Understanding it to be admitted that the testator's writings, published and unpublished, contained nothing irreligious, illegal, or immoral, I have no doubt that this is a legal disposition, according to the law of England."

He held the bequest good, "supposing neither atheism, sedition, nor any other crime or immorality to be inculcated by the works." Here, again, SIR J. L. KNIGHT-BRUCE recognised the doctrine that a bequest for irreligious purposes could not be enforced. In 1850 Briggs v. Hartley (1) was decided.

In Pare v. Clegg (18) it was contended that the claim of the plaintiff as creditor of a society called the National Communities Society (which afterwards took the name of the Rational Society) must fail on the ground that the society was founded for an immoral and illegal purpose. LORD ROMILLY, M.R., in delivering judgment, dealt with this contention as follows (29 Beav. at p. 601):

"The charges against [the society] are that it was founded, first, for the purpose of propagating natural religion, to the injury of revealed religion; secondly, in order to put an end to all moral restraint on the actions of mankind; and thirdly, to destroy the institution of private property generally. I have perused the rules of the society for the purpose of considering the force of this objection, and although I am of opinion that the society is based upon irrational principles, and seeks to realise a visionary and unattainable object, it is not, I think, to be considered as founded for the purpose of propagating irreligious and immoral doctrines in the ordinary and proper sense of those words. It is not such a society as that a person dealing with it could not acquire the right to enforce a contract entered into with him by the society."

This implies that if the result of the examination of the rules had been to show that the society was formed for irreligious purposes the decision might have been the other way. These authorities, beginning with De Costa v. De Paz (13) in 1754 and ending with Pare v. Clegg (18) in 1861, appear to me to establish that the courts will not help in the promotion of objects contrary to the Christian religion, apart altogether from any criminal liability, and to show that Briggs v. Hartley (1) and Cowan v. Milbourn (2) were well decided, and that if the law of England is to be altered upon the point, the change must be effected not by judicial decision but by the Act of the legislature.

It is foreign to the subject of the present inquiry to consider whether the welfare of the individual and the greatness of the nation would be best promoted by

A proceeding on the lines of the Secular Society, involving the ignoring of the supernatural as influencing human conduct, and holding out the promotion of happiness in this world as the chief end of man, or upon the lines indicated in the striking passage with which LORD BACON concludes his ESSAY ON ATHEISM, and the still more striking quotation from CICERO which he there makes. Such considerations bear upon public policy and may have had some influence in moulding the English law upon the subject. But we have to deal, not with a rule of public policy which might fluctuate with the opinions of the age, but with a definite rule of law to the effect that any purpose hostile to Christianity is illegal. The opinion of the age may influence the application of this rule, but cannot affect the rule itself. It can never be the duty of a court of law to begin by inquiring what is the spirit of the age and in supposed conformity with it to decide what the law is. Very nice and difficult questions may arise whether in any particular case the purpose is hostile to the Christian religion. No such difficulty arises in the present case, as by the memorandum of association the axe is laid to the root of the tree of all religion. The legacy was given and would be taken for the purposes of the society, as stated in the memorandum, and if these purposes are illegal the illegality is not mended by the certificate of incorporation. In my opinion, they are illegal in the sense that the law will not aid in their promotion and this appeal ought to be allowed.

LORD DUNEDIN.—Before I had committed my views in this case to writing, I had the advantage of seeing not only the judgment just delivered by the Lord Chancellor, but also those about to be delivered by my noble and learned friends, LORD PARKER and LORD BUCKMASTER. In these there is contained so much that not only has my adhesion, but is expressed better than I could hope to do, that I shall refer to them for several of the propositions on which my judgment rests, and shall only state succinctly the reasons which have led me, though not without hesitation, to the conclusion that this appeal should be dismissed. I have said that I have formed my opinion not without hesitation; but that hesitation is due to one fact only. Had there been no authorities to deal with, and I were to approach the matter from the point of view of legal principle alone, I do not think I should have felt much difficulty. What has troubled me is that I think it is impossible to decide the case as I think it should be decided without going counter to what has been said by judges of great authority in past generations. It is always, I feel, no light matter to overrule such pronouncements.

I shall first deal with two points which must be resolved before the case can be further considered, but on which, for the reason already mentioned, I shall adopt the opinion of others as my own. I agree with what I understand is the unanimous opinion of your Lordships, that as to what is necessary to constitute the crime of blasphemy at common law, the dicta of ERSKINE, J., LORD DENMAN, C.J., and LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in Shore v. Wilson (19), R. v. Hetherington (11), and R. v. Ramsay and Foote (3) respectively are correct; and I adopt the reasoning of the Lord Chancellor and LORD BUCKMASTER. Further, I agree with the Lord Chancellor that on a fair construction para. 3a of the memorandum of association of the respondent company expresses the dominating purpose of the company; and that the other matters are mentioned not as independent, but only as subsidiary aims. I agree with him in thinking that teaching in accordance with 3a is inconsistent with and to that extent subversive of the Christian religion—by which expression, without attempting definition, I mean all such forms of religion as have for a common basis belief in the Godhead of the Lord Jesus Christ.

It is said for the appellants that the court will not lend its assistance for the furtherance of an illegal object, and that money given to the society must needs be illegally applied, because it certainly can only be used for objects in terms of the memorandum, and such objects are illegal, because the Christian religion is part of the law of the land. Now if money was laid out in either procuring publications or lectures in terms of the objects of the memorandum, such publications or lectures need not be couched in scurrilous language, and so need not be such as would constitute the crime of blasphemy at common law. Nor need they be criminal under the Blasphemy Act, 1697, for here I agree with LORD BUCKMASTER that the Act is so framed as to make its penalties only apply when there has been what may be termed apostasy. It would not, I think, be safe to found any argument on the fact—but it is a fact sufficiently curious to be mentioned—that the Scottish Parliament two years before the Blasphemy Act passed an Act in similar terms, but omitting the words “having been educated in or at any time having made profession of the Christian religion, &c.” In the repealing Act, 53 Geo. 3, c. 160 [relating to Doctrine of the Trinity], this and another older Scottish Act are repealed in toto, while the Blasphemy Act was allowed to stand. How innocuous it was on a true construction may be surmised from the fact that there seem to have been no prosecutions under it. Criminal liability being negatived, no one has suggested any statute in terms of which it—by which I mean the supposed use of the money—is directly prohibited. There is no question of offences against what may be termed the natural moral sense. Neither has it been held, I think, as being against public policy, as that phrase is applied in the cases that have been decided on that head. Now if this is so, I confess I cannot bring myself to believe that there is still a terra media of things illegal, which are not criminal, not directly prohibited, not contra bonos mores, and not against public policy. Yet that, I think, is the result of holding that anything inconsistent with Christianity as part of the law of England cannot in any way be assisted by the action of the courts.

The Lord Chancellor has reviewed the authorities which he holds to be contrary to this opinion. Undoubtedly there are dicta; but so far as concerns actual judgments, they might, I think, all be supported on grounds not inconsistent with this opinion, except Briggs v. Hartley (1) and Cowan v. Milbourn (2). On the other hand, the opinions of the consulting judges in Shore v. Wilson (19) (including those of PARKE, B., and TINDALL, C.J.) are, in my view, clearly inconsistent with the decision in Briggs v. Hartley (1) and in favour of the view I am holding. For it is, I think, impossible to hold that the terms of 53 Geo. 3, c. 160, effected anything more than relief from statutory penalties and disqualifications, and equally impossible to say that Unitarian doctrine is, in the words used by SHADWELL, V.-C., in Briggs' Case (1), “consistent with Christianity.” I do not say more about the cases because they are to be reviewed with great minuteness by LORD BUCKMASTER, in whose views I entirely concur.

It is not, however, on this point alone that I desire to rest my judgment. So far, I have dealt with the matter as if the question were one of contract or of trust. That there is no trust here is, I think, clear beyond doubt. The trust to be constituted must either be found in some expression of the donor—here the testator—relative to the gift; or in the fact that the donee—here the society—is a trustee, and that the gift is only given to him in that capacity. But the testator has clogged his gift with no conditions. He has made an absolute gift to a legal entity which is entitled to receive money. The certificate of incorporation in terms of the section quoted of the Companies Act, 1900, prevents anyone alleging that the company does not exist. Then the law of Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche (20) is based upon the consideration of what is and what is not intra vires of a statutory corporation, but I have never heard it suggested that it made a company a trustee for the purposes of its memorandum. I do not say more, for here I wish respectfully to concur with what is said on this subject by LORD PARKER. Trust being out of the reckoning, there can be no doubt that there is here no question of contract. What remains? Nothing but an ordinary action for a legacy at the instance of a legal person that has a right to sue. It is here that I feel disposed to quarrel with the phrase “the assistance of the courts.” I do not see that the company is seeking the assistance of the courts to carry out

A the objects of the memorandum. It is seeking their assistance only to compel the executor to do his duty, so that it may receive what is legally due to it. If the legacy were due to an individual, the executor would not be heard to discuss the probable uses to which the legatee would put the money. I do not think he can do so in the case of the society. For after all—and treating the memorandum, in spite of the opinion I have expressed already, as indicating purposes entirely
B illegal such as in contract would not serve as foundation for an action—there is no reason why the society should not employ the money in paying its office rent. For these reasons, and those to be more fully stated by my noble and learned friends who are to follow me, I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON (read by LORD SHAW).—In considering
C the questions which arise for decision on this appeal, it is, I think, well to bear in mind certain general and perhaps somewhat elementary principles.

At common law the conditions essential to the validity of a gift are reasonably clear. The subject-matter must be certain; the donor must have the necessary disposing power over, and must employ the means recognised by common law as sufficient for the transfer of, the subject-matter; and, finally, the donee must be
D capable of acquiring the subject-matter. If these conditions be fulfilled, the property in the subject-matter of the gift passes to the donee, and he becomes the absolute owner thereof and can deal with the same as he thinks fit. The common law takes no notice whatever of the donor's motive in making the gift or of the purposes for which he intends the property to be applied by the donee, or of any condition or direction purporting to affect its free disposition in the hands
E of the donee. It is immaterial that the gift is intended to be applied for a purpose actually illegal—as, for example in trade with the King's enemies—or in a manner contrary to the policy of the law—as, for example in paying the fines of persons convicted of poaching. In either case, the essential conditions being fulfilled, the gift is complete, the property has passed, and there is an end of the matter. A
F gift at common law is never executory in the sense that it requires the intervention of the courts to enforce it. With regard to the conditions essential to the validity of a gift, equity follows the common law. On the one hand, if the subject-matter be property transferable at common law, equity will not as a rule aid a gift which does not fulfil the essential conditions. On the other hand, when the property is transferable in equity only, equity also requires that the subject-matter must be
G certain, that the donor must have the necessary disposing power, and must employ the means which equity recognises as sufficient for a transfer of the subject-matter, and that the donee must be capable of acquiring the subject-matter. If a donee sues in equity to recover the subject-matter, he sues by virtue of an equitable estate already vested in him and not to enforce the gift. Under certain circumstances, however, the donee does not in equity, even if all the requisite conditions
H be fulfilled, obtain an absolute interest. The gift may have been obtained by duress or undue influence, in which case it will be set aside in equity, and if the donee has obtained any legal property he will be compelled to restore it to the donor or those claiming under him. Again, the circumstances of the gift or the directions given or objects expressed by the donor may be such as to impose on the donee the character of a trustee. In such a case equity will enforce the trust so far as I may be, and if for any reason the trust fails will imply a resulting trust in favour of the donor or those claiming under him. But except so far as they may be relevant on the points above mentioned, equity does not any more than the common law pay any attention to the donor's motives in making the gift or to the purposes for which he intends the property to be applied by the donee, or to any condition or direction affecting its free disposition in the hands of the donee. The question whether a trust be legal or illegal or be in accordance with or contrary to the policy of the law only arises when it has been determined that a trust has been created, and is then only part of the larger question whether the trust is enforceable. For, as

It may be well to illustrate what I have said by one or two examples. Thus, if a testator gives £500 to A., saying that he knows A. will expend it in procuring masses to be said for testator's soul, the question arises whether A. is a trustee for the purpose indicated. If he be not a trustee, he will in equity take the legacy beneficially, the fact that the trust, if there be a trust, would be unlawful, being quite immaterial. [But see Bourne v. Keane, [1918 19] All E.R. Rep. 167.] If, however, it be held that A. is a trustee, then, as the trust is unlawful, equity will not allow the trustee to retain the legacy. Again, in the case of a simple legacy of £500 to A., where conversations had taken place between A. and the testator as to the purposes for which the legacy should be applied, the question would arise whether these conversations rendered it unconscionable for A. to take the legacy for his own use. If so, equity would treat him as a trustee. If not, it would allow him to retain the legacy, although the purpose for which the legacy was intended by the testator was unlawful, or otherwise unenforceable. Again, it is well settled that a gift to A. to help him in his business is an absolute gift to A., and it is, therefore, immaterial whether A.'s business is that of a corn merchant or a receiver of stolen goods. If, however, A. were a trustee the character of the business would be material in considering whether the trust was one which equity would carry into execution. B C D

In the present case you will find that the testator has given his residuary estate through the medium of trustees for sale and conversion to the Secular Society, Ltd., and the question is as to the validity of this gift. There is no doubt as to the certainty of the subject-matter, or as to the testator's disposing power, or as to the validity of his will. So far as the conditions essential to the validity of the gift are concerned, the only doubt is as to the capacity of the donee. The Secular Society, Ltd., was incorporated as a company limited, by guarantee under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1893, and a company so incorporated is by s. 17 of the Act of 1862 capable of exercising all the functions of an incorporated company. Primâ facie, therefore, the society is a corporate body created by virtue of a statute of the realm, with statutory power to acquire property by gift, whether inter vivos or by will. The appellants endeavour to displace this primâ facie effect of the Companies Acts in the following manner. If, they say, you look at the objects for which the society was incorporated, as expressed in its memorandum of association, you will find that they are actually illegal or, at any rate, in conflict with the policy of the law. This being so, the society was not an association capable of incorporation under the Acts. It was and is an illegal association, and as such incapable of acquiring property by gift. I do not think this argument is open to the appellants, even if their major premise be correct. By the first section of the Companies Acts, 1900, the society's certificate of registration is made conclusive evidence that the society was an association authorised to be registered—that is, an association of not less than seven persons associated together for a lawful purpose. The section does not mean that all or any of the objects specified in the memorandum, if otherwise illegal, would be rendered legal by the certificate. On the contrary, if the directors of the society applied its funds for an illegal object, they would be guilty of misfeasance and liable to replace the money, even if the object for which the money had been applied were expressly authorised by the memorandum. In like manner, a contract entered into by the company for an unlawful object, whether authorised by the memorandum or otherwise, could not be enforced either in law or in equity. The section does, however, preclude all His Majesty's lieges from going behind the certificate or from alleging that the society is not a corporate body with the status and capacity conferred by the Acts. Even if all the objects specified in the memorandum were illegal, it does not follow that the company cannot on that account apply its funds or enter into a contract for a lawful purpose. Every company has power to wind-up voluntarily, and E F G H I

A moneys paid or contracts entered into with that object are in every respect lawfully paid or entered into. Further, the disposition provided by the company's memorandum for its surplus assets in case of a winding-up may be lawful, though all the objects as a going concern are unlawful. If there be no lawful manner of applying such surplus assets, they would on the dissolution of the company belong to the Crown as bona vacantia: Cunnack v. Edwards (21). Some stress was laid on the public danger, or at any rate the anomaly of the courts recognising the corporate existence of a company all of whose objects, as specified in its memorandum of association, are transparently illegal. Such a case is not likely to occur, for the registrar fulfils a quasi-judicial function, and his duty is to determine whether an association applying for registration is authorised to be registered under the Acts. Only by misconduct or great carelessness on the part of the registrar could a company with objects wholly illegal obtain registration. If such a case did occur it would be open to the court to stay its hand until an opportunity has been given for taking the appropriate steps for the cancellation of the certificate of registration. It should be observed that neither s. 1 of the Companies Act, 1900, nor the corresponding section of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, is so expressed as to bind the Crown, and the Attorney-General, on behalf of the Crown, could institute proceedings by way of certiorari to cancel a registration which the registrar in affected discharge of his quasi-judicial duties had improperly or erroneously allowed. But, as will appear later, I do not think that the present is a case requiring such action on the part of your Lordships' House.

E It follows from what I have already said that the capacity of the Secular Society, Ltd., to acquire property by gift must be taken as established, and all the conditions essential to the validity of the gift being thus fulfilled, the donee is entitled to receive and dispose of the subject-matter thereof, unless either (i) the gift was obtained by duress or undue influence, or (ii) there is something which in a court of equity imposes on the donee the character of a trustee. Admittedly there is no question of duress or undue influence, and, in my opinion, it is impossible to hold that the donee was intended to take or in fact takes the subject-matter as trustee or in any other character than that of absolute owner. It should be observed that the testator says nothing as to how he desires his residuary estate to be applied in the hands of the society, nor is there any evidence that he made any communication to anyone on behalf of the society with regard to such application. The only possible argument in favour of the testator's intention to create a trust rests upon this. The society is a body corporate, to which the principle of your Lordships' decision in Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Co. v. Riche (20) is applicable. Its funds can only be applied for purposes contemplated by the memorandum and articles as originally framed or altered under its statutory powers. A gift to it must, it may be said, be considered as a gift for those purposes, and, therefore, the society is a trustee for those purposes of the subject-matter of the gift. This argument is, in my opinion, quite fallacious. The fact that a donor has certain objects in view in making a gift does not, whether he gives them expression or otherwise, make the donee a trustee for those objects. If I give property to a limited company to be applied at its discretion for any of the purposes authorised by its memorandum and articles, the company takes the gift as absolutely as would a natural person to whom I gave a gift to be applied by him at his discretion for any lawful purpose. A.-G. v. Haberdashers' Co. (22) is an express authority on this point. A gift of a fund on trust to pay the income thereof in perpetuity to a society, whether corporate or otherwise, might possibly, if the objects of the society were charitable, be established as a charitable gift, exempt from objection, on the ground that it created a perpetuity. But it is one thing to establish a gift (which would otherwise fail) on the ground that it is charitable, and quite another thing to avoid a gift which would otherwise be good on the ground that it creates an unenforceable trust. If a gift to a corporation expressed to be made for its corporate purposes is nevertheless an absolute gift to the corporation, it would be quite illogical to hold that any implication as to the donor's objects in making a gift to a corporation could create a trust. The argument, in fact, involves the proposition that no limited company can take a gift otherwise than as trustee. I am of opinion, therefore, that the society, being capable of acquiring property by gift, takes what has been given to it in the present case, and takes it as absolute beneficial owner and not as trustee.

The above considerations appear to me to be alone sufficient to dispose of this appeal. Nevertheless, I will proceed to consider the matter on a footing that the society takes in the character of trustee. On that footing it seems to me that the trust is clearly void, and that the appellants ought to succeed, whatever opinion your Lordships hold on the questions which were argued before the House. A trust to be valid must be for the benefit of individuals, which this is certainly not, or must be in that class of gifts for the benefit of the public which the courts in this country recognise as charitable in the legal as opposed to the popular sense of that term. Moreover, if a trustee is given a discretion to apply trust property for purposes some of which are and some are not charitable, the trust is void for uncertainty. A simple instance of this is a gift for charitable or benevolent purposes. Such a gift is void, for benevolent purposes are, as is well settled, not necessarily charitable: Morice v. Bishop of Durham (23); James v. Allen (24); Jarman's Estate (25). If your Lordships will refer for a moment to the society's memorandum of association, you will find that none of its objects, except, possibly, the first, is charitable. The abolition of religious tests, the disestablishment of the Church, the secularisation of education, the alteration of the law touching religion or marriage, or the observation of the Sabbath, are purely political objects. Equity has always refused to recognise such objects as charitable. It is true that a gift to an association formed for their attainment may, if the association be unincorporated, be upheld as an absolute gift to its members, or if the association be incorporated as an absolute gift to the corporate body; but a trust for the attainment of political objects has always been held invalid, not because it is illegal, for everyone is at liberty to advocate or promote by any lawful means a change in the law, but because the court has no means of judging whether a proposed change in the law will or will not be for the public benefit, and, therefore, cannot say that a gift to secure the change is a charitable gift. The same considerations apply when there is a trust for the publication of a book. The court will examine the book, and if its objects be charitable in the legal sense, it will give effect to the trust as a good charity: Thornton v. Howe (26); but if its object be political it will refuse to enforce the trust: De Themmines v. De Bonneral (27). If, therefore, there be a trust in the present case it is clearly invalid. The fact, if it be the fact, that one or other of the objects specified in the society's memorandum is charitable would make no difference. There would be no means of discriminating what portion of the gift was intended for a charitable and what portion for a political purpose, and the uncertainty in this respect would be fatal.

The only way of meeting this difficulty would be to argue in favour of a general charitable intention on the part of the testator. The rule of equity in this respect is well known, and, however admirable in the interest of the public, has, I think, gone further than any other rule or canon of construction in defeating the real intention of testators. Perhaps the most striking instance of the application of the rule is De Costa v. De Paz (13), to which I shall have to return presently. There the trust was for the purpose of establishing an assembly for reading the Jewish law and instructing the people in the Jewish religion. The Jewish Relief Act had not yet been passed, and, therefore, the gift could not be applied as directed by the testator. Nevertheless, LORD HARDWICKE held that, the gift being for a religious purpose, the testator had manifested a general charitable intent, and accordingly the fund was applied for paying a preacher to instruct children in the Christian instead of the Jewish religion. Any argument in favour of the testator's general charitable intention in the present case would have to proceed on the footing that

A the society's first and paramount object was charitable, and that its subsequent objects, though not charitable in themselves, were entirely subsidiary to the first object. It would be an argument depending for its validity on the true construction of the memorandum, and precisely analogous to that urged by the appellants in support of their contention that because the society's first object was illegal, all its other objects were also illegal, or, as they put it, tinged with illegality. I

B will consider the two arguments together.

The only object specified in the company's memorandum of association which can of itself be said to be either charitable or illegal is the first. All the other specified objects are in themselves clearly non-charitable, and admittedly legal. The suggestion must be that the charitable or illegal character of the first object so clearly manifests a charitable or illegal intention on the part of the testator

C that all the subsequent objects (being non-charitable) must, on the hypothesis that the first is charitable, be ignored altogether, or being legal, must on the hypothesis that the first is illegal, be themselves treated as illegal. Such suggestion, when analysed, appears to rest entirely on the assumption that the object first specified in the memorandum must be the paramount object, and that all the other specified objects must be subsidiary or subordinate. Such an assumption

D introduces a new, and, in my opinion, a very dangerous, canon of construction. Moreover, in the present case it appears to be inconsistent with the terms of the memorandum itself. The first object is to promote the principle therein referred to, not in such manner as thereafter mentioned, but in such ways as may from time to time be determined. This can only point to the subsequent objects being distinct or independent objects. Moreover, one of those objects, that lettered

"to assist by votes of money or otherwise other societies or associated persons or individuals who are specially promoting, not the first object, but any of the objects thereinbefore mentioned."

F How can it be argued that the society is precluded from giving assistance to societies or individuals who, while repudiating the society's first object, advocate the secularisation of education or the disestablishment of the Church on political or even on religious grounds? It is impossible to limit the societies or individuals to whom assistance may be granted to such as uphold the principle referred to in the society's first object. It is equally impossible to treat an act expressly authorised by the memorandum as ultra vires the company because of the motive by which

G the agents of the company may be inspired. The whole frame of the memorandum points to the company having distinct and separate objects, and not to the first object being paramount and the others subsidiary. Any argument in favour of a general charitable or a general illegal intention must therefore fail. Just as the objects of the society which the testator had in view in making the gift cannot be said to be illegal merely because the first object specified in the memorandum

H is illegal, so also if the society takes as trustee it cannot be said that the testator had a general charitable intention sufficient to support the trust merely because the first object specified in the memorandum is charitable. It follows that the trust, if a trust has been created, is wholly invalid, whether the first object is, on the one hand, charitable, or, on the other hand, illegal.

I I will next proceed to consider whether a trust for the first object specified in the memorandum would be a valid trust. The society's first object is "to promote the principle that human conduct shall be based upon natural knowledge and not upon supernatural belief, and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action." A trust to promote or advocate this principle would certainly not be a trust for the benefit of individuals. But could it be established as a charitable trust? It is certainly not within the preamble of the statute 43 Eliz., c. 5. This is not conclusive, though the courts have taken that preamble as their guide in determining what is or is not charitable. It is not a religious trust.

for it relegates religion to a region in which it is to have no influence on human conduct. The principle may have its attractions for certain types of mind, but on analysis it appears to be extremely vague and ambiguous. The first branch does not prescribe the end to which human conduct is to be directed. It merely says that whatever aim a man has in view he is to base his conduct on natural knowledge rather than on supernatural belief. This may merely mean that if, for example, we desire to defeat our enemies we should avail ourselves of all known scientific means, and not rest idle in the belief that there is a special providence looking after our interests. The meaning intended must necessarily be obscure until the terms "natural knowledge" and "supernatural belief" are more narrowly defined. Passing to the second branch of the principle, it is, I think, equally obscure. It lays down dogmatically what ought to be the end of all human thought and action, "so think and act as to secure human welfare in this world." No hint is given as to what constitutes human welfare, a point on which there is the widest difference of opinion, or as to why anyone should act on the precept unless it be assumed that altruism is merely enlightened egoism. It would, in my opinion, be quite impossible to hold that a trust to promote a principle so vague and indefinite was a good charitable trust. Even if the principle to be promoted were as definite as KANT's categorical imperative I doubt whether a trust for its promotion would be charitable.

It remains to consider the question (which formed the chief topic of argument at your Lordships' Bar), whether the promotion of the principle specified as the society's first object is either illegal or against the policy of the law. A trust for the promotion of the principle being unenforceable on other grounds, this question could only arise on a criminal prosecution for blasphemy or in an action to enforce a contract entered into for the purpose of promoting the principle. In discussing it I shall assume that the principle involves a denial of or an attack upon some of the fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion. On the subject of blasphemy I have had the advantage of reading and I entirely agree with the conclusions arrived at by my noble and learned friends, the Lord Chancellor and Lord BUCKMASTER. In my opinion, to constitute blasphemy at common law there must be such an element of vilification, ridicule, or irreverence as would be likely to exasperate the feelings of others and so lead to a breach of the peace. I cannot find that the common law has ever concerned itself with opinion as such, or with expression of opinion, so far as such expression is compatible with the maintenance of public order. Indeed there is express authority that heresy as such is outside the cognisance of a criminal court unless the heretic by setting up conventicles or otherwise endangers the peace: see HAWKINS' PLEAS OF THE CROWN, vol. 1, p. 354. The contrary view appears to be based on various dicta (I do not think they are more than dicta), to the effect that Christianity is part of the law of the land, the suggested inference being that to attack or deny any of its fundamental doctrines must, therefore, be unlawful. The inference, of course, depends on some implied major premise. If the implied major premise be that it is an offence to speak with contumely or even to express disapproval of existing law, it is clearly erroneous. If, on the other hand, the implied major premise is that it is an offence to induce people to disobey the law, the premise may be accepted, but to avoid a non sequitur it would be necessary to modify the minor premise by asserting that it is part of the law of the land that all must believe in the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and this again is inadmissible. Christianity is clearly not part of the law of the land in the sense that every offence against Christianity is cognisable in the courts. A good deal of stress was laid in this connection upon the Blasphemy Act, 1697, and its provisions undoubtedly give rise to certain difficulties. I think, however, for reasons which will appear later that this Act should be construed as imposing, in the case of persons educated in or who have at any time professed the Christian religion, certain additional penalties for the common law offence rather than as creating a new statutory offence. The fact that there

A has, as far as can be discovered, never been a prosecution for an offence under the Act points to this view having been generally accepted.

On the question whether the promotion of the principle in question is against public policy as opposed to being illegal in the criminal sense the appellants relied principally on two authorities, namely, Cowan v. Milbourn (2) and Briggs v. Hartley (1). In the former case the court, consisting of KELLY, C.B., MARTIN, B., and
B BRAMWELL, B., refused to enforce a contract for the hire of rooms, the purpose of the hirer being to use the rooms for certain lectures, one of which, as advertised, was to be on "The character and teaching of Christ: the former defective, the latter misleading," and another on "The Bible shown to be no more inspired than any other book." KELLY, C.B., was of opinion that the first of these lectures could not be delivered without blasphemy. He referred especially to the fact
C that Christianity was part of the law of the land. MARTIN, B., agreed. BRAMWELL, B., quoted the Blasphemy Act, and said that the rooms were clearly intended to be used for a purpose declared by the statute to be unlawful. It appears, therefore, that all three judges considered that the purpose was unlawful in the strict sense, though BRAMWELL, B., referred to the distinction between things actually unlawful in the sense of being punishable and things unlawful in the sense of being contrary
D to the policy of the law. This, however, appears to have been unnecessary for the decision. The court refused to enforce the contract. In Briggs v. Hartley (1) the testator had created a trust to provide a prize for the best essay on natural theology, treated as a science, and sufficient when so treated to constitute a true, perfect, and philosophical system of universal religion. SHADWELL, V.-C., held the trust void as inconsistent with Christianity. In my opinion, the first of these cases
E might possibly be supported on the footing that the lectures intended to be given would involve vilification, ridicule, or irreverence likely to lead to a breach of the peace. In so far as it decided that any denial of or attack upon the fundamental doctrines of Christianity was in itself blasphemous either at common law or under the statute, I think it was wrong.

The second case, however, appears to be a direct authority on the point at issue.
F for the trust was clearly a good charity unless it could be held contrary to the policy of the law. I desire to call the attention of the House to certain general considerations and to certain authorities which have led me to the conclusion that Briggs v. Hartley (1) was wrongly decided and that there is nothing contrary to the policy of the law in an attack on or a denial of the truth of Christianity or any of its fundamental doctrines provided such attack or denial is unaccompanied by G such an element of vilification, ridicule, or irreverence as is necessary for the common law offence of blasphemy. In the first place I desire to say something as to the history of religious trusts. Trusts for the purposes of religion have always been recognised in equity as good charitable trusts, but so far as I am aware there is no express authority dealing with the question what constitutes religion for the purpose of this rule. Prior to the Reformation that form of Christianity now called H Roman Catholic was undoubtedly within the rule, but the same cannot be said with equal certainty of other forms of Christianity or of the Jewish religion, which has little in common with Christianity except its monotheism and its belief in the inspiration of the Old Testament. After the Reformation Anglican Christianity was undoubtedly within the rule, but this cannot be said with equal certainty of Roman Catholicism or of any form of Protestant dissent or of the religion of the
I Jews. The question is complicated by the fact that the Reformation was followed by a number of penal statutes enforcing conformity with the Established Church and imposing penalties on the exercise of any other form of religion whether Christian or otherwise. As long as these statutes remained in force no trust for the purposes of any other religion than the Christian religion or of any form of Christianity other than the Anglican were enforceable because it was clearly against public policy to promote a religion or form of religion the exercise of which was penalised by statute. The fact that no such trust was enforceable does not show that it was not a trust for the purposes of religion within the meaning of the rule. The Revolution of 1688 was followed by the Toleration Act of that year, which exempted Protestant dissenters from the penalties imposed by the earlier Acts, but provided that nothing therein contained should afford any protection to Roman Catholics or persons denying the Trinity. From the date of this Act all trusts for the religious purposes of any nonconformist body entitled to the benefit of its provisions have been held good charitable trusts, and, inasmuch as the provisions of the Act do not deal with the validity of trusts, but merely give exemption from penalties, I think we are safe in assuming that in the equitable rule as to trusts for the purposes of religion being charitable religion includes all forms of religion which accept, as the exempted nonconformists may be said to have done, the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith.

But subsequent decisions enable us to go a step further. The Unitarian Relief Act, 1812, repeals so much of the Toleration Act, 1688, as enacts that nothing therein contained should extend to give any ease or benefit to persons denying the Trinity, and also so much of the Blasphemy Act as relates to persons denying the Trinity. As from the passing of this Act trusts for the religious purposes of Unitarians have always been held good charitable trusts. The repeal of the Blasphemy Act, which did not itself affect the common law, could not alter the common law. These decisions proceed, therefore, on the footing that a mere denial of the Trinity is not criminal. The Unitarian Relief Act, containing no provisions as to trusts, they also proceed on the footing that but for the statutory penalties to which, prior to the Act, persons who denied the Trinity had been subject, a trust for a religion which rejects the doctrine of the Trinity would have been a good charitable trust. A denial of or attack on the doctrine of the Trinity can never, therefore, have been either actually illegal or contrary to the policy of the law. Further, whatever may have been the case with the Unitarians of 1812, it is quite certain that in more recent years many Unitarians have not only denied the Trinity, but have disputed the "Divine authority" of the Old and New Testament in the sense in which that expression is ordinarily used by persons professing the Christian faith. If there is any doctrine vital to Protestant Christianity it would appear to be that of the Divine authority of the Scriptures, and yet in the case of trusts for the religion of Unitarians no distinction has been drawn between those who do and who do not hold this doctrine. It would seem to follow that a trust for the purpose of any kind of monotheistic theism would be a good charitable trust, and that it is not illegal or contrary to public policy to deny the authority of the Old or New Testament. The Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1832, and the Jewish Relief Act, 1846, expressly validate trusts for the purposes of the Roman Catholic and Jewish religions.

No inference can, therefore, be drawn from any decision since they were placed on the statute book. But De Costa v. De Paz (13), to which I have already referred, is important in this connection. It was decided before the Jewish Relief Act, and LORD HARDWICKE held that a trust for the purpose of the Jewish religion was bad, on the ground that it was against Christianity, and Christianity was the law of the land. It would have been enough to say it could not be enforced on the ground that the practice of the Jewish religion was subject to statutory penalties. On further consideration, however, LORD HARDWICKE upheld the gift on the ground that it was for a charitable purpose, and that the testator's general charitable intention ought not to be defeated because the fund could not be applied in the way the testator desired. He left it to the Crown to direct a cy-près application. As I have already said, the Crown applied it for the purposes of the Christian religion. This case seems to show that the Jewish religion is within the equitable rule, and that, apart from the statutory penalties, there was never anything inconsistent with public policy in enforcing a trust for the benefit of the Jewish religion. De Costa v. De Paz (13) was followed in Isaac v. Gompertz (28). LORD THURLOW there held that a trust for the maintenance of a Jewish synagogue was charitable.

A and directed an application to the Crown with a view to its ex-près application. Apart from the question of religious trusts there is one authority directly in point. In Pare v. Clegg (18) the plaintiff sued the trustees of a friendly society, known as the Rational Society, for moneys lent to the society. The trustees objected that the society had illegal objects, and that the money could not be recovered on that account. The object of the society included the promotion of

B the following propositions :

"(i) That all facts yet known to man indicate that there is an external or internal cause of all existences by the fact of their existence; that this all-pervading cause of motion or change in the universe is the power which the nations of the world have called God, Jehovah, Lord, &c., but that the facts are yet unknown to man which define what that power is. (ii) That all ceremonial worship by man of this cause whose qualities are yet so little known proceeds from ignorance of his own nature, and can be of no real utility in practice; and that it is impossible to train men to become rational in their feelings, thoughts, or actions until all such forms shall cease."

C

D These propositions are clearly anti-Christian. If they point to religion at all, it is a kind of negative deism, if I may use that expression, and not a theistic religion. Nevertheless, it was held by ROMILLY, M.R., that they contained nothing "irreligious or immoral" and that, therefore, the defence failed. It follows that he cannot have thought that there was anything against public policy in advocating deism or (à fortiori) any form of monotheism. This conclusion is further borne out by Thompson v. Thompson (17). There the trust was to pay a stipend to

E some literary man who had not been successful in his career and who would assist in extending the knowledge of the doctrines to which the testator had devoted his attention and pen. This was held to be a charitable gift, provided the testator's writings, published or unpublished, contained nothing "irreligious, illegal, or immoral."

F In my opinion, the authorities I have mentioned are sufficient to establish that the first object of the society's memorandum is not open to objection as contrary to the policy of the law. It is not illegal for it does not involve blasphemy. It is not irreligious, for it is at any rate consistent with that negative deism which was held not to be irreligious in Pare v. Clegg (18). It is not immoral or seditious. It is, no doubt, anti-Christian, but, to adopt the words of COLERIDGE, J., in Shore v. Wilson (19) (9 Cl. & Fin. at p. 539) :

G "There is nothing unlawful at common law in reverently doubting or denying doctrines parcel of Christianity, however fundamental. It would be difficult to draw a line in such matters according to perfect orthodoxy or to define how far one might depart from it in believing or teaching without offending the law. The only safe and, as it seems to me, practical rule is that which I have

H pointed out and which depends on the sobriety and reverence and seriousness with which the teaching or believing, however erroneous, are maintained."

I I am glad to be able to come to this conclusion. It would be a serious matter for your Lordships' House, unless clearly compelled by authority, to lay down a principle which would not only lead to the anomalies pointed out by LORD BUCKMASTER, but would preclude the courts of this country from giving effect to trusts for the purposes of religions which, however sacred they may be to millions of His Majesty's subjects, either deny the truth of Christianity or, at any rate, do not accept some of its fundamental doctrines. On all these grounds I think the appeal fails.

LORD SUMNER (read by LORD DUNEDIN).—The question is whether an anti-Christian society is incapable of claiming a legacy duly bequeathed to it merely because it is anti-Christian. The certificate proves that the incorporation is that of the statutory number of persons in accordance with the formalities of the Act, that "all the requirements of the Act in respect of registration have been complied with": Companies Act, 1862, s. 18; and that the respondent society is a complete person in law. It does not prove that all the memorandum powers are lawfully exercisable.

What then are the society's character and powers? For them we must look at the memorandum, and then the question will be: Does the law permit their exercise? Paragraph 3 (a) gives its principle. The first part is stated both as a positive proposition, namely, that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and as a negative proposition, namely, that it should not be based on supernatural belief. The second part is expressed only positively, namely, that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action, but equally the negative of this proposition is implied. Since "human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action," any object save the welfare of mankind in this world (for example, the glory of God) cannot be a proper end for any thought or action at all. The powers taken in the subsequent paragraphs are ancillary to the first and some are so expressed. It is true that object (k) is "to publish books," and object (l) "to assist by votes of money other societies or individuals who are specially promoting any of the above objects," but are we to say that this company has among its memorandum powers the publication of Bibles and Prayer Books, the subvention of Bible societies, and the doing of all lawful things conducive to the attainment of such objects, such as building a mission hall for reading the Bibles and offering the prayers? If the memorandum is to be so construed it is decisive of the case, for I agree that this gift is not an imperfect gift nor impressed with any trust in the donee's hands, and a donee, who sometimes acts legally and sometimes illegally, cannot be deprived of his legacy for fear he might follow the evil and eschew the good. It is not a question of hoping for the best, as was argued; the law must presume that what is legal will be done, if anything legal can be done under the memorandum. Thus one just man may save the city. To my mind, if the memorandum be construed as it is by my noble and learned friend who has immediately preceded me, any consideration of blasphemy or Christianity or their legal position is irrelevant, for the appeal succeeds without it, and before we come to it. I think we should look at the substance and that all the paragraphs should be construed as if they concluded with the words, "for the purposes and on the principle stated in para. (a)." Surely a society incorporated on such a principle cannot be supposed, as a matter of construction, to exercise ancillary powers on other principles or for independent purposes. Of course, it must be assumed that the powers taken are to be used, if possible, for lawful ends; for example, to subsidise a blaspheming lecturer would be an ultra vires act, and those who so disbursed the company's money would be personally liable to refund it, apart from aiding and abetting; but as I take the memorandum to be that of a society deliberately and entirely anti-Christian, in which opinion I believe the shareholders themselves would agree, I am constrained to deal with the question: What if all the company's objects are illegal per se? for I should be loth to dispose of this case on the narrow ground that, even if all its other objects are illegal, the company in law can always wind-up and so dispose of its funds.

If the respondents are an anti-Christian society, is the maxim that Christianity is part of the law of England true, and, if so, in what sense? If Christianity is of the substance of our law, and if a court of law must, nevertheless, adjudge possession of its property to a company whose every action seeks to subvert Christianity and bring that law to naught, then by such judgment it stultifies the law. So it was argued, and if the premise is right, I think the conclusion follows. It is not enough to say with LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in Ramsay's Case (3) (48 L.T. at p. 735) that this maxim has long been abolished, or with my noble and learned friend, the Master of the Rolls, in the court below that "the older view," based on this maxim, "must now be regarded as obsolete." If that maxim expresses a positive rule of law once established, though long ago, time cannot

A abolish it nor disfavour make it obsolete. The decisions which refer to such a maxim are numerous and old, and although none of them is a decision of this House, if they are in agreement and if such is their effect, I apprehend they would not now be overruled, however little reason might incline your Lordships to concur in them.

In what sense, then, was it ever a rule of law that Christianity is part of the law? The legal material is fourfold: (i) statute law; (ii) the criminal law of blasphemy; (iii) general civil cases; (iv) cases relating to charitable trusts. From statute law little is to be gleaned. During the sixteenth century many Acts were passed to repress objectionable doctrines, but plainly statutes were not needed if the common law possessed an armoury for the defence of Christianity as part and parcel of itself. Indeed, who but the King in Parliament could then say whether the Christianity, which for the time being formed part of the common law, was the Christianity of Rome or of Geneva or of Wittenberg? Certainly the courts could not. After the Revolution of 1688 there were passed the Toleration Act "to give some ease to scrupulous consciences in the exercise of religion," which, upon conditions, relieved certain dissenters (Papists and those who denied the Trinity excepted) from the operation of various existing statutes, and the Blasphemy Act, which recites that "many persons have avowed blasphemous doctrines contrary to the doctrines and principles of the Christian religion and may prove destructive to the peace and welfare of this kingdom." That the Blasphemy Act simply added new penalties for the common law offence of blasphemy, when committed under certain conditions, was held by LORD HARDWICKE in De Costa v. De Paz (13), and by the Court of King's Bench in R. v. Carlile (29), and LORD ELDON in A.-G. v. Pearson (30) said that the Toleration Act left the common law as it was and only exempted certain persons from the operation of certain statutes. Such, indeed, is the clear language of the statute, nor can the fact that persons are singled out for special punishments, who deny the Godhead of the Three Persons of the Trinity, the truth of the Christian religion, and the Divine authority of the Holy Scriptures, or who maintain that there be more Gods than one, be accepted as showing that the common law offence of blasphemy consists in such denials and assertions and in nothing else. Later Acts have relieved various religious confessions from the burthen of the Blasphemy Act and other statutes, but, except in so far as they deal with charitable trusts for the purposes of such confessions, on which I do not now dwell, they seem to carry the present matter G no further.

The common law as to blasphemous libels was first laid down after the Restoration, and here the statement that Christianity is part of the law is first found as one of the grounds of judgment. Earlier opinions of the same kind are curiously general in character. In Bohom v. Broughton (31), on a quare impedit, it is said:

H "A tielx leis que ils de Saint Eglise ont en ancien Scripture coient a nous doner credence; car ceo common ley sur quel tous mans leis sont fondes."

Again, in the DOCTOR AND STUDENT (Dialogue I, chs. 5, 6, and 7) three successive chapters state the grounds of the law of England—the first, the law of reason; the second, the law of God; and the third, the usage and custom of the realm. When Lilburne was on his trial in 1649 (Lilburne's Case (32)), he complained that he was not allowed counsel and appealed to the judges "to do as they would be done by." LORD KEBLE said (4 State Tr. at p. 1307): "You say well. The law of God is the law of England." But all the same, Lilburne had to do the best he could for himself. A passage from LORD COKE may also be quoted. Brook, J., had once observed casually (Y.B. Hen. 8, fo. 4) that a pagan could not have or maintain any action, and LORD COKE in Calvin's Case (33) (7 Co. Rep. at 17a), founding himself on this and on St. Paul's Second Epistle to the Corinthians (ch. vi, v. 15), stated that infidels are perpetui inimici, and "a perpetual enemy cannot maintain any action or get anything within the realm." Of this WILLES, C.J., in Omychund v. Barker (34) observes (Willes, at p. 542):

"Even the devils themselves, whose subjects, [LORD COKE] says, the heathens are, cannot have worse principles: and besides the irreligion of it, it is a most impolitic notion and would at once destroy all that trade and commerce from which all this nation reaps such good benefits."

Evidently in this interval the spirit of the law had passed from the Middle Ages to modern times. So far it seems to me that the law of the Church, the Holy Scriptures, and the law of God are merely prayed in aid of the general system or to give respectability to propositions for which no authority in point could be found.

At the beginning of the seventeenth century a considerable change of procedure took place in reference to religion. Legate was burnt at Smithfield in 1612 upon a writ de haeretico comburendo, and another heretic, named Wightman, at Lichfield about the same time, but they were the last persons to go to the stake in this country pro salute animae. No doubt this process was moribund. Before the Restoration the Court of Star Chamber and the Court of High Commission had been suppressed, and at length, by the statute 29 Car. 2, c. 9, the writ de haeretico comburendo itself was abolished, with all process and proceedings thereupon and all punishment of death in pursuance of any ecclesiastical censures. It is to be noted that the Act, in saving the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts over "atheism, blasphemy, heresy, and schism," distinguishes blasphemy from the profession of false doctrines, whether atheistical or heretical. The time of Charles II was one of notorious laxity both in faith and morals, and for a time it seemed as if the old safeguards were in abeyance or had been swept away. Immorality and irreligion were cognisable in the ecclesiastical courts, but spiritual censures had lost their sting, and the civil courts were extinct which had specially dealt with such matters viewed as offences against civil order. The Court of King's Bench stepped in to fill the gap. In 1663 Sir Charles Sedley was indicted for indecency and blasphemy (Sedley's Case (35)). The indecency was so gross that little stress was laid on the blasphemy, which was probably both tippy and incoherent. The court told the prisoner that they would have him know that, although there was no longer any Star Chamber, they acted as custos morum for all the King's subjects, and it was high time to punish such profane actions, contrary alike to modesty and to Christianity. Then follows Taylor's Case (5) in 1675, when the indictment was for words only, though ribald and profane enough. This is the earliest trial for blasphemy. Adwood's Case (36) in 1617 is not an instance. It is like Traske's Case (37), where the matter in hand was the making of conventicles as tending to sedition.

The indictment in Taylor's Case (5) is given in TREMAINE'S PLACITA, p. 226, and shows that the charge was not confined to the fact that Taylor's language was contrary to true religion, but that it was considered dangerous to civil order, for it concludes:

"Ad grave scandalum professionis verae Christianae religionis in destructionem Christianae gubernationis et societatis . . . ac contra pacem dicti domini regis."

Taylor's Case (5) is the foundation stone of this branch of the law, and for a century or so there is no sign of carrying the law beyond it. The case repays scrutiny. The objection that the offence was an ecclesiastical one lay on the very face of the words charged, and in directing the jury HALE, C.J., found it necessary to show why it was also a civil offence. He said that such kind of wicked, blasphemous words, though of ecclesiastical cognisance, were not only an offence to God and religion, but a crime against the laws, State, and government, and "therefore punishable in this court, for to say religion is a cheat is to dissolve all those obligations whereby the civil societies are preserved." It is true that he added that Christianity was parcel of the laws of England, "and therefore to

A reproach the Christian religion is to speak in subversion of the law," but this does not really enlarge the previous statement. Speaking in subversion of the law, without more, in the sense of saying that particular laws are bad and should be mended, has never been a criminal offence, and agitating against them has often led on to fortune. Woolston's Case (6), in 1728, supplies the completion of the doctrine. Upon a motion in arrest of judgment, the court followed Taylor's Case (5) as settled law. The argument was that Woolston's crime, if any, was of ecclesiastical cognisance (he was a clergyman who joked about the miracles), and that "mere difference of opinion is tolerated by law." LORD RAYMOND'S answer was:

C "I would have it taken notice of that we do not meddle with any differences in opinion and that we interpose only where the very root of Christianity is spoken of. . . . To say that an attempt to subvert the established religion is not punishable by those laws upon which it is established is an absurdity."

D True it is that the last words somewhat invert LORD HALE'S reasoning, for they seem to treat an attempt to subvert the established form of Christianity (not any other) as an offence, because it attacks the creature of the law, not because that form is the basis of the law itself and the bond of civilised society. At any rate the case leaves untouched mere differences of opinion, not tending to subvert the laws and organisation of the realm.

E Curl's Case (38), heard about the same time, was a case for publishing an obscene libel, but is of some incidental importance. The courts were chary of enlarging their jurisdiction in this regard, and in Queen Anne's time judgment had been arrested in such a case for supposed want of precedent, and the offence was treated as one for ecclesiastical cognisance only. On a motion for arrest of the judgment on Curl it was argued that the libel, being only contra bonos mores, was for the spiritual courts. The motion was refused, the Chief Justice saying:

"If it reflects on religion, virtue or morality, if it tends to disturb the civil order of society, I think it is a temporal offence."

F He said, too, "religion is part of the common law," but PROBYN, J., clears this up, adding:

"It is punishable at common law as an offence against the peace in tending to weaken the bonds of civil society."

G At the end of the eighteenth and beginning of the nineteenth centuries various publishers of PAINE'S AGE OF REASON were prosecuted. The words indicted were chosen for their scoffing character, and indeed are often really blasphemous, but the idea throughout is that the book was the badge of revolution and tended to jeopardise the State. Thus during the trial of Williams (R. v. Williams) (7) ASHURST, J., said (26 State Tr. at p. 715) of it that "it was an offence against law and government, from its direct tendency to dissolve all bonds and obligations of civil society," and again, in passing sentence on him in the Court of King's Bench, he states the ground of this offence thus:

H "All offences of this kind are not only offences to God, but crimes against the law of the land, and are punishable as such, inasmuch as they tend to destroy those obligations whereby civil society is bound together, and it is upon this ground that the Christian religion constitutes part of the law of England."

I If later cases seem to dwell more on religion and less on considerations of State, I think, when examined, they prove to be of small authority. In Waddington's Case (10) there seems to have been little argument, and no decisions were cited. R. v. Davison (39) decides in effect that contempt of God in court may be also contempt of court. In 1838 ALDERSON, B., told a York jury (R. v. Gathercole (40), 2 Lew. C.C. at p. 254) that "a person may, without being liable to prosecution for it, attack Judaism and Mahomedanism, or even any sect of the Christian religion (save the established religion of the country), and the only reason why the latter is in a different situation from the others is because it is the form established by law and is therefore part of the constitution of the country. In like manner and for the same reason any general attack on Christianity is the subject of criminal prosecution, because Christianity is the established religion of the country."

The defendant, in fact, had not made any general attack on Christianity, but, being a Protestant clergyman, had foully aspersed a Roman Catholic nunnery. Whether this strange dictum was material or not, and whether it is right or not (and ALDERSON, B.'s, is a great name), it only shows that the gist of the offence of blasphemy is a supposed tendency in fact to shake the fabric of society generally. Its tendency to provoke an immediate breach of the peace is not the essential, but only an occasional feature. After all, to insult a Jew's religion is not less likely to provoke a fight than to insult an episcopalian's; and, on the other hand, the publication of a dull volume of blasphemies may well provoke nothing worse than throwing it into the fire. Hetherington's Case (11) was a motion in arrest of judgment. Even here, alongside of the propositions that the Old Testament contains the law of God, and that "it is certain that the Christian religion is part of the law of the land" (per PATTERSON, J.), we find LORD DENMAN, C.J., saying (5 Jur. at p. 530):

"As to the argument that the relaxation of oaths is a reason for departing from old law, we could not accede to it without saying that there is no mode by which religion holds society together but by the administration of oaths, but that is not so, for religion . . . contains the most powerful sanction for good conduct."

R. v. Moran (41) is of small authority. Later prosecutions add nothing until LORD COLERIDGE's direction to the jury in R. v. Ramsay and Foote (3). For thirty years this direction has been followed, nor was it argued by the appellants that the publication of anti-Christian opinions, without ribaldry or profanity, would now support a conviction for blasphemy.

It is no part of your Lordships' task on the present occasion to decide whether LORD COLERIDGE's ruling was or was not the last word on the crime of blasphemy, but the history of the cases and the conclusion at present reached go to show that what the law censures or resists is not the mere expression of anti-Christian opinion, whatever be the doctrines assailed or the arguments employed. It is common ground that there is no instance recorded of a conviction for a blasphemous libel, from which the fact, or, at any rate, the supposition of the fact, of contumely and ribaldry has been absent, but this was suggested to be of no real significance for these reasons. Such prosecutions, it was said, often seem to be persecutions, and are, therefore, unpopular, and so only the gross cases have been proceeded against. This explains the immunity of the numerous agnostic or atheistic writings so much relied on by secularists. All it really shows is that no one cares to prosecute such things till they become indecent, not that, decently put, they are not against the law. Personally, I doubt all this. Orthodox zeal has never been lacking in this country. The Society for Carrying into Effect His Majesty's Proclamations against Vice and Immorality, which prosecuted Williams in 1797, has had many counterparts both before and since, and as anti-Christian writings are all the more insidious and effective for being couched in decorous terms, I think the fact that their authors are not prosecuted, while ribald blasphemers are, really shows that lawyers in general hold such writings to be lawful because decent, not that they are tolerable for their decency though unlawful in themselves. In fact, most men have thought that such writings are better punished with indifference than with imprisonment.

I may now turn to decisions in civil cases other than cases of charitable trusts. They are at least inconclusive. In Murray v. Benbow (16) (4 State Tr. N.S. at

A p. 1410) BYRON'S "CAIN" was in question. LORD ELDON read it, and as it happened, was able to compare it with "PARADISE LOST." He says:

B "You have alluded to MILTON'S immortal work. It did happen in the course of last Long Vacation, amongst the sollicitae jucunda oblivia vitae, I read that work from beginning to end. . . . Taking it altogether, it is clear that the object and effect were not to bring into disrepute but to promote the reverence of our religion."

C So judging "CAIN" he doubted, and, as an injunction was matter of discretion and not of right, he refused an injunction till the plaintiff's right had been established at law. According to SMILES' JOHN MURRAY (i, 428) the necessary action was brought a jury upheld the copyright, and on a subsequent application the injunction was granted. About the same time, however, in 1822, in Laurence v. Smith (15) an injunction had been obtained ex parte to restrain the issue of a pirated edition of the plaintiff's "LECTURES ON PHYSIOLOGY." As the lectures seemed to him to question the immortality of the soul, LORD ELDON dissolved it as a matter of discretion and in the absence of any judgment deciding the right at law, and observed that "the law does not give protection to those who contradict the Scriptures," a dictum which, in its full width, imperils copyright in most books on geology. In the present case the respondents do not appeal for protection to the court's discretion, but vindicate a right of property as clearly established as if there were a verdict. Again in Pare v. Clegg (18) LORD ROMILLY, M.R., gave judgment against the defendant, remarking that the society which he represented, though based on irrational principles, was not formed "for the purpose of propagating immoral and irreligious doctrines," and so was liable. This is not authority for saying generally that a society formed for the purpose of propagating irreligious doctrines could not be made to pay its debts. At most they must be such irreligious doctrines as the law forbids, and that leaves open the whole question what it is that the law forbids. Whether or not it is an authority directly in favour of the respondents I am not prepared to say. Cowan v. Milbourn (2) has long stood unchallenged. The judges meant to decide no new law, but to follow and apply the passages cited from STARKIE ON LIBEL. I cannot follow the observation of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in Ramsay's Case (3) that the judgments, or, at any rate, that of BRAMWELL, B., turn on the effect of the statute of William III. The rooms had been engaged for two purposes. One was for a tea party and ball in memory of TOM PAINE, and the other was the delivery of the lectures in question. As to the first, the recorder left the case to the jury, who gave a farthing damages for the frustration of this dismal, but no doubt harmless, festivity. As to the other, some fear of a breach of the peace may have existed, for intervention by the chief constable is mentioned in the LAW REPORTS, but not in the LAW JOURNAL, LAW TIMES, or WEEKLY REPORTER. The plea (16 L.T. 290) alleged a purpose "to use the said rooms for certain irreligious, blasphemous and illegal lectures," but they had not been delivered, and no indictable words could have been assigned. The recorder refused to leave the question of purpose to the jury with regard to the lectures. The argument in moving for the rule was that the case should have gone to the jury, for the placards per se did not prove an intention to insult or mislead, and temperate discussion of such subjects is lawful. Clearly the recorder had ruled that under such titles no lecture could be delivered that would not be unlawful. It is upon such a presentation of the case, and, I suppose, on such a ruling at the trial, that KELLY, C.B., said: "Such a lecture cannot be delivered without blasphemy and impiety," and from this his colleagues did not dissent. I do not think that the court were finding in the placards and the chief constable a quia timet justification for the defendant's breach of contract. Their ground was that the hiring was and could only be for an illegal object, and therefore the contract could not be enforced. The distinction is well settled between things which are illegal and punishable and things which, though not punishable, are illegal so as not to support a contract for good consideration. Prostitution is one of the common examples. BRAMWELL, B., evidently thought that secularism was another. But this reasoning postulates that, whatever lectures were actually delivered, they could not but be unlawful. Lectures, lawful because decently expressed, could, however, have been delivered under those titles, and, therefore, the hiring was not conclusively shown to have been for an unlawful purpose and void. The case should have gone to the jury. The alternative view of the case must be that the whole court held that any general denial or dispute of Christian faith is unlawful, which had not been held at law before. From this it would follow that a person, whose business it was to publish and sell anti-Christian books, need neither pay his printer's bill nor the poor rates for his shop, a proposition which is refuted by stating it, and from which at least two members of the court in Cowan v. Milbourn (2) would have recoiled. I think the decision was wrong.

As to De Costa v. De Paz (13), LORD HARDWICKE is reported as saying that "there is a great difference between laying penalties on persons for the exercise of their religion and establishing them by the act of the court."

So here I think there is a great difference between laying civil disabilities on a man for the profession of his irreligion or on a company for the exercise of its memorandum powers, however contrary to Christianity, and establishing them by the act of the court. The appellants' claim is that the court should deny the respondent company's right to receive this money on the ground that it cannot make any lawful use of it, not that it should establish the money in the company's hands as a charitable trust for un-Christian objects. It is true that LORD HARDWICKE goes on to say that and there are a good many other cases of the same kind, especially Briggs v. Hartley (1), in which similar language is used, but charitable trusts form a particular and peculiar branch of the law, and I do not think that the reasoning and still less the remarks contained in those cases bear usefully on general principles. However right it may be to refuse the aid of the law in establishing a trust for secularist purposes, I cannot see why a secularist is not to receive a gift of money because he is a secularist and says so. I will not further pursue the cases cited on charitable trusts, nor could I presume to add to what has fallen from my noble and learned friend, LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.

With all respect for the great names of the lawyers who have used it, the phrase, "Christianity is part of the law of England," is really not law; it is rhetoric, as truly so as was Erskine's peroration when prosecuting Williams: "No man can be expected to be faithful to the authority of man who revolts against the government of God." One asks what part of our law may Christianity be, and what part of Christianity may it be that is part of our law? BEST, C.J., once said in Bird v. Holbrook (42) (4 Bing., at p. 641), a case of injury by setting a spring-gun:

"There is no act which Christianity forbids that the law will not reach; if it were otherwise Christianity would not be, as it has always been, held to be part of the law of England."

But this was rhetoric, too. Spring-guns, indeed, were got rid of, not by Christianity, but by Act of Parliament. "Thou shalt not steal" is part of our law. "Thou shalt not commit adultery" is part of our law, but another part. "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" is not part of our law at all. Christianity has tolerated chattel slavery: not so the present law of England. Ours is, and always

A has been, a Christian State. The English family is built on Christian ideas, and if the national religion is not Christian there is none. English law may well be called a Christian law, but we apply many of its rules and most of its principles, with equal justice and equally good government, in heathen communities, and its sanctions, even in courts of conscience, are material and not spiritual.

Frequently as the proposition in question appears in one form or another, it is B always as something taken for granted and handed down from the past rather than as a deliberate and reasoned proposition. It constantly has been used in charging juries as to unmistakably scurrilous words, where there was neither opportunity nor occasion for defining the limits of legitimate religious and irreligious opinion.
 I question if the foundations of the criminal law of blasphemous libel were ever
 C fully investigated in any court before Ramsay's Case (3). Even then LORD COLERIDGE passed over numerous decisions. To be sure his omissions were faithfully dealt with soon afterwards by STEPHEN, J., one of his own puisnes, in a popular periodical, and this paper your Lordships allowed counsel for the appellants to read as part of his argument, to which, nevertheless, it added nothing either in learning or in cogency. Such observations, too, have often been employed by D judges of first instance in cases relating to charitable trusts, where there was equally little need for any analysis of the proposition or for discussion, either historical or juridical, of its implications. It is fairly clear, too, that men of the utmost eminence have thought and said advisedly that mere denials of sundry essentials of the Christian faith are indictable as such. HAWKINS, in his PLEAS
 OF THE CROWN (Bk. 1, ch. 5, ss. 1 and 2), says that "all blasphemies against God E in denying His being . . . as well as all profane scoffing at the Holy Scriptures" are punishable offences, and adds as the reason for punishing the latter that offences of this nature "tend to subvert all religion or morality, which are the foundation of government." BLACKSTONE COMMENTARIES (Bk. 4, ch. 4) describes a class of crimes consisting in "offences more immediately against the Almighty, by denying His being or providence or by contumelious reproaches of our Saviour Christ" and "all profane scoffing at the Holy Scriptures." Probably few great
 F judges have been willing to go further in questions of religious liberty than LORD MANSFIELD in his eloquent address to this House in Evans v. Chamberlain of London (43). Yet there he says (2 Burn's Eccl. Law, 9th Edn. at p. 218):

G "The eternal principles of natural religion are part of the common law; the essential principles of revealed religion are part of the common law, so that any person reviling, subverting or ridiculing them may be prosecuted at common law."

Again, the very careful Commissioners on the Criminal Law, of whom SERJEANT STARKIE was one and SIR WILLIAM WIGHTMAN another, observe in their Sixth Report, p. 85 :

H "Although the law forbids all denial of the being and providence of God or the Christian religion, it is only when irreligion assumes the form of an insult to God and men that the interference of the criminal law has taken place."

I Nevertheless, it seems too clear to need citation of authorities (the opinions of the majority of the judges in your Lordships' House in Shore v. Wilson (19) having been fully discussed) in order to show that a temperate and respectful denial, even of the existence of God, is not an offence against our law, however great an offence it may be against the Almighty Himself, and, except for Cowan v. Milbourn (2), it has never been decided outside of the region of charitable trusts that such a denial affects civil rights. I cannot bring myself to think that it does so.

What, after all, is really the gist of the offence of blasphemy, or of its nature as a cause of civil disability? Ribaldry has been treated as the gist, which must be a temporal matter; as between creature and Creator, how can the bad taste or the provocative character of such a denial come into question? The denial itself, not the mode of it, must be what merits the Divine anger; but that is an offence against God. Our courts of law, in the exercise of their own jurisdiction, do not, and never did that I can find, punish irreligious words as offences against God. As to them they held that deorum injuriæ dis curæ. They dealt with such words for their manner, their violence, or ribaldry, or, more fully stated, for their tendency to endanger the peace then and there, to deprave public morality generally, to shake the fabric of society and to be a cause of civil strife. The words, as well as the acts, which tend to endanger society differ from time to time in proportion as society is stable or insecure in fact, or is believed by its reasonable members to be open to assault. In the present day, meetings or processions are held lawful which a hundred and fifty years ago would have been deemed seditious, and this is not because the law is weaker or has changed, but because, the times having changed, society is stronger than before. In the present day reasonable men do not apprehend the dissolution or the downfall of society because religion is publicly assailed by methods not scandalous. Whether it is possible that in the future irreligious attacks, designed to undermine fundamental institutions of our society, may come to be criminal in themselves, as constituting a public danger, is a matter that does not arise. The fact that opinion grounded on experience has moved one way does not in law preclude the possibility of its moving on fresh experience in the other; nor does it bind succeeding generations, when conditions have again changed. After all, the question whether a given opinion is a danger to society is a question of the times and is a question of fact. I desire to say nothing that would limit the right of society to protect itself by process of law from the dangers of the moment, whatever that right may be, but only to say that, experience having proved dangers once thought real to be now negligible, and dangers once very possibly imminent to have now passed away, there is nothing in the general rules as to blasphemy and irreligion, as known to the law, which prevents us from varying their application to the particular circumstances of our time in accordance with that experience. If these considerations are right, and the attitude of the law both civil and criminal towards all religions depends fundamentally on the safety of the State and not on the doctrines or metaphysics of those who profess them, it is not necessary to consider whether or why any given body was relieved by the law at one time or frowned on at another, or to analyse creeds and tenets, Christian and other, in which I can profess no competence. Accordingly, I am of opinion that acts merely done in furtherance of para. 3 (a) and other paragraphs of the respondents' memorandum are not now contrary to the law, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD BUCKMASTER.—The terms of the will of the testator and the circumstances leading up to this appeal have been fully stated and repetition is, therefore, unnecessary. In truth, according to the appellants' argument, the whole question to be decided depends upon the meaning of the third article of the memorandum of association of the respondent company, and upon the determination of whether this article, properly construed, renders the real object of the respondent company either criminal or illegal as contrary to the common law. The point of construction must be decided by considering the fair meaning of the language used and without resort to external means. Neither the documents preliminary to the incorporation of a company registered with a memorandum of association, nor the action of directors after a company has been formed, can properly be received in evidence for the purpose of determining what the objects of the company may be.

Clause 3 (a) of the memorandum defines the main object of the company in these words:

"To promote, in such a way as may from time to time be determined, the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, and not

A upon super-natural belief; and that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action."

B Upon this follows a series of objects which in themselves it is not suggested are obnoxious to the law, while the last sub-head of the clause is in general terms and gives power "to do all such other lawful things as are conducive or incidental to all or any of the above-named objects." Without this last provision the true construction of the memorandum would involve the view that if the defined objects could be attained, either by lawful or by unlawful means, it was only those that were lawful that were permitted. But the latter provision makes the meaning quite plain. This conclusion, however, does not affect the appellants' case, which depends upon the assertion that there are no lawful ways by which the objects of the society can be carried out. It is said that the true meaning of the memorandum is to encourage the propagation of doctrines directly contrary to the Christian faith—doctrines that are inimical to the central principle of Christianity and incapable of reconciliation with any essential portion of its creeds. WARRINGTON, L.J., indeed, thought that to promote such objects would be to promote atheism, and as this may be a material matter it is necessary to state the reasons why I am unable to accept this view.

D Natural law may, as it seems to me, be properly regarded as part of the Divine purpose, revealed through the instrument of reason, and if natural knowledge be accepted, as on this assumption it must, as equivalent to the truth, then, to take that as the basis of human conduct, as the first part of the clause directs, does not, to my mind, necessarily mean that a belief in God is thereby excluded. The latter part of the clause, which says that human welfare in this world is "the proper end of all thought and action" is more difficult. That human welfare is a proper end of thought and action few would dispute—it is the end on which the noblest minds have concentrated their highest effort; even if it be regarded as the sole object, I can conceive it being steadfastly pursued by people who possessed a firm belief in a supreme invisible Power using the instrument of man's agency to accomplish the Divine will. That this clause of the memorandum defines an object contrary to the generally accepted conception of the Christian faith is, I think, assented to by all who have heard this case, and from this view I am not prepared to dissent. It is not necessary, and if unnecessary it is certainly not desirable, to attempt a definition of what the law would regard as the essential features of that faith. It is sufficient to say that the respondent company has as its main object the propagation of doctrines hostile to the Christian religion, and the question to be determined is whether it is in consequence an illegal association—incapable of receiving or holding property. The contention that that is so is urged by counsel for the appellants by saying that such doctrine offends, in the first case, against the common law, which prohibits blasphemy. He regards the essence of legal blasphemy as the publication of matter denying or hostile to the Christian faith, and he rejects the interpretation put upon it by ERSKINE, J., in Shore v. Wilson (19) (9 Cl. & Fin. at p. 355), by LORD DENMAN, C.J., in R. v. Hetherington (11) (4 State Tr. N.S. at p. 590), and by LORD COLERIDGE, C.J., in R. v. Ramsay and Foote (3), each of whom state the law so as to limit the offence to the act of denial associated with ribald, contumelious or scurrilous language or conduct. I am unable to accept the appellants' contention as correct. To do so would involve the conclusion that all adverse critical examination of the doctrines of Christianity—even though it was conducted with the utmost reverence—was a blasphemous publication which rendered the writer liable to criminal proceedings. It would, indeed, be hard to find a worse service that could be done to the Christian faith than to prevent people from explaining and inviting an answer to the reasoned convictions that led them to question its truth. The common law which forbids blasphemy is to be gathered from usage and custom, and it is a striking fact that, with one possible exception—R. v. Woolston (6)—every reported case upon the matter, beginning with R. v. Taylor (5), and continuing down to R. v. Ramsay and Foote (3), and R. v. Boulter (12), is a case where the offence alleged was associated with, and I think constituted by, violent, offensive, or indecent words.

That it was considered necessary to report the earlier cases as precedents affords, to my mind, a strong presumption that it was the character of the attack which constituted the crime, for if the law was well recognised as forbidding any adverse criticism, the cases where such criticism was coarse and disgraceful would be too plain to merit preservation. In my opinion, therefore, the common law of England does not render criminal the mere propagation of doctrines hostile to the Christian faith. The crime consists in the manner in which the doctrines are advocated, and whether in each case this is a crime is a question for the jury, who should be directed, in the words of ERSKINE, J., in Shore v. Wilson (19) (9 Cl. & Fin. at pp. 524, 525), quoted by the Master of the Rolls in his judgment in the present case.

It is then said that, even if this be conceded, the object of the society is illegal, not in the sense that acts done to further its objects would be criminal, but that they are of such a nature as to be incapable of establishing a legal right to receive money for their furtherance. I find it difficult to appreciate this distinction, but I understand the contention to be that Christianity is part of the common law of England, and it must, therefore, be illegal, even if it were not criminal, for any body of people to promote doctrines that are hostile to its creed. If this argument be carried to its full extent, it will really show that Unitarians, Positivists, Comtists, and other similar religious and ethical bodies, unless relieved by statute, are illegal associations, for the Christianity known to the common law is certainly not Unitarian Christianity, nor is it reconcilable with the doctrines of COMTE or HEGEL. Again, it would result that editors and publishers would be able to deny payment to contributors and authors whom they had expressly employed to write philosophical and scientific articles or books if it could be decided that the work was anti-Christian, while no one could be compelled to pay for any such books when purchased. Indeed, the doctrine, as it seems to me, would apply to a great deal of classical and scientific literature, and the conditions which would condemn these works might vary from year to year as different views from time to time prevailed. It is quite right to point out that, if the law be as the appellants contend, these considerations afford an argument for its alteration, but do not prove that it does not exist. If, on the other hand, the law is not clear it is certainly in accordance with the best precedents so to express it that it may stand in agreement with the judgment of reasonable men.

Apart from the criminal cases already mentioned certain authorities are referred to, which, if correctly decided, do appear to afford support for the appellants' arguments. De Costa v. De Paz (13)—a decision of LORD HARDWICKE'S—is one of these authorities; and Re Bedford Charity (14), is a decision of LORD ELDON'S, containing statements to the same effect, and so also is Briggs v. Hartley (1). The first of these was a gift for the purpose of providing a fund to be applied for ever for the reading of the Jewish law and for advancing and propagating the Jewish faith. It was certainly open to argument that this was not a charitable bequest and was consequently void as a perpetuity. But it was not upon this ground that the decision was based; it was held that it was a charity (see the report in AMBLER, p. 228), but that the mode of disposition was such that it could not take effect. It is true that in the report in 2 SWANSTON the reason why the gift to the specific object of the charity was held inoperative was because it was contrary to the Christian religion, but in AMBLER it is stated that the objects were contrary to the "established" religion, and as at that date the statutory disabilities under which the adherents of the Jewish faith suffered had not been removed, this might have been sufficient for the purpose of the case; indeed on any other view it is hard to understand why it was supported as a charity at all. I do not, however, propose further to pursue this question, as I have had the advantage of reading LORD

A PARKER's opinion, and with it I am in entire agreement. The second case was merely a question whether Jews might enjoy the benefits of a particular charity, and it was held they might not. The last was a legacy for the best essay on natural theology treated as a science, and sufficient when so treated and taught to constitute a true, perfect, and philosophical system of universal religion; and it was held bad for no further reason than that it was not consistent with Christianity, but

B the law was in no way examined or criticised. In two earlier cases it was stated that Christianity is part of the law of the land, and the authorities quoted in support of the proposition are R. v. Taylor (5) and R. v. Woolston (6); but the pronouncements of LORD HALE and LORD RAYMOND in these cases must be taken in reference to the subject-matter of the case, which, in one instance certainly, and in the other possibly, was a prosecution for scurrilous blasphemy.

C If the reasons for the decision in De Costa v. De Paz (13) were those urged by the appellants I should not regard them as correct. If a gift to endow any body that propagates doctrines hostile to the generally accepted view of the Christian religion was at any time contrary to the common law, it is, in my opinion, contrary at the present time, and gifts to Unitarians and similar religious bodies for the support and endowment of their religious faith are now void. It is urged

D in answer to this that the position with regard to Unitarians, as also with regard to Jews, is altered by two statutes—the one 53 Geo. 3, c. 160 [Doctrine of the Trinity], and the other the Religious Disabilities Act, 1846. I am unable to accept this view. The statutory position appears to me to be plain. By the Act of 1 Will. & Mary, c. 18 (generally known as the Toleration Act), it is provided that

E no penalties shall apply to any person dissenting from the Church of England that shall take the oaths that are specified in 1 Will. & Mary, c. 1, and in 30 Car. 2, st. 2, and accept the articles of religion, excepting arts. 34, 35, and 36, and certain words of the twentieth article. But Papists and those denying the doctrines of the Blessed Trinity as declared in the said articles of religion are omitted from the protection of this statute. The penalties from which this statute grants relief

F are statutory penalties and disabilities, and it left the common law exactly what it was. The Blasphemy Act, 1697, is really an Act directed against apostates from the Christian faith, and that Act again provides certain penalties, cumulative and severe on second conviction, for any person who, having been educated in, or at any time having made profession of, the Christian religion within this realm, shall by writing or advised speaking deny any one of the Persons of the Holy Trinity to be God, or who shall assert that there are more Gods than one, or

G shall deny the Christian religion to be true. This is a disabling statute still unrepealed, imposing penalties so severe that it is said no prosecution has ever been instituted under its provisions. Its terms, therefore, demand the narrowest and most jealous scrutiny. The fact that it has only incidentally been brought under judicial notice may explain the loose, and, as I think, erroneous, references

H made to its effect, as, for example, by LORD LYNDHURST in Shore v. Wilson (19), where he says that "those persons who by preaching denied the doctrine of the Trinity are subject to the penalties of the Act," and again by BRAMWELL, B., in Cowan v. Milbourn (2). This is not accurate; only those persons who have been educated in, or had at any time made profession of, the Christian religion within the realm could incur the statutory penalties.

I The Act 53 Geo. 3, c. 160 [Doctrine of the Trinity], repeals so much of the Toleration Act as provides that the exemption of the statute shall not extend so as to give its advantage or benefit to persons denying the doctrines of the Blessed Trinity, and for the purposes of making this exemption effectual it repeals the Blasphemy Act so far as was necessary. The Religious Disabilities Act, 1846, provided that persons professing the Jewish religion shall, in respect of their schools, places of religious worship, educational, and charitable purposes, and property held by them, be subject to the same laws as His Majesty's Protestant subjects who dissent from the Church of England. This means that they are freed from all disabilities imposed by statute and open to all existing at common law. This is the view expressly stated by LORD ELDON in A.-G. v. Pearson (30) (3 Mer. at p. 405), and is in agreement with the decisions in R. v. Carlile (29) and R. v. Waddington (10). So far as holding property is concerned, Jews are to be regarded as being in the same position as His Majesty's Protestant subjects who dissent from the Church of England. This must be taken to mean that they can hold property; for the common law—whatever its scope—did not specially safeguard what we now know as the established church, but the Christian faith. And there was never anything, apart from statutory disabilities, to prevent Protestant dissenters from holding property: A.-G. v. Pearson (30) (3 Mer. at pp. 309, 410). Of course, while any particular belief was made the subject of penalty by statute, a gift to further the purpose of that belief would be contrary to the statute law, but when once the statutory disability was removed, unless some disability could be found outside, there could be nothing to hinder the gift of money for the purpose of any such association.

It is this that explains the decision in West v. Shuttleworth (44) [overruled by the House of Lords in Bourne v. Keane [1918-19] All E.R. Rep. 167], which was a decision on the statute in relief of Roman Catholics similar to that in relief of Jews—the Roman Catholic Charities Act, 1832. Now, the Roman Catholic religion—whatever views may be taken of the Reformation—was certainly never contrary to the common law, and, therefore, when once the statutory prohibitions were taken away, difficulties as to receipt of money for the general purpose of their faith was not forbidden. In Shrewsbury v. Hornby (45) a gift in support of Unitarian doctrine was held good, and it is suggested that this was because 53 Geo. 3, c. 160, repealed the common law so far as it affected Protestant ministers. I am unable to find that the statute effects this purpose. If by implication any part of the common law is repealed there would appear to be no particular reason why it should be repealed so as to allow a special class of Protestant dissenters—but not other people—to deny the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. It would, indeed, be strange if the publication of a book, or the delivery of a lecture, would be legal or illegal according to the religious opinion of the person who wrote it and not according to its contents. If any repeal at all had been effected by these Acts it would, in my opinion, have been the repeal of the whole doctrine had it ever existed; but the true view, in my judgment, is that it did not exist. The common law throughout remains unaffected, and I cannot find any case except Briggs v. Hartley (1) where as a necessary step in the decision it is enunciated in terms as wide as are necessary to support the appellants' case. For example, in Thompson v. Thompson (17) (1 Coll. at pp. 381, 397), where it was held that a gift will be supported for the encouragement of the general doctrines advocated in a testator's writings if neither atheism, sedition, nor any crime or immorality is to be inculcated. Again, in Evans v. Chamberlain of London (43) LORD MAXFIELD defined the common law in these terms (2 Burn's Eccl. Law, 9th Edn., at p. 218):

"There was never a single instance from Saxon times down to our own in which a man was ever punished for erroneous opinions concerning rites and modes of worship but upon some positive law. The common law of England, which is only common reason or usage, knows of no prosecution for mere opinions. For atheism, blasphemy, and reviling the Christian religion there have been persons prosecuted and punished upon the common law."

It is unnecessary to determine whether and under what circumstances the promulgation of atheism is illegal, for by "atheism" in this connection I understand as a disbelief in one eternal and invisible God, and I have already stated my views that the respondents' objects do not properly include the advocacy of such a doctrine. Blasphemy is constituted by violent and gross language, and the phrase, "reviling the Christian religion," shows that without vilification there is no offence.

A I am glad to think that this opinion is supported by the carefully considered and weighty utterances of many learned judges. Shore v. Wilson (19), in its actual result, depended upon a question of construction of deeds of trust and upon special facts, and, so regarded, the decision could have but little application to other disputes; but when the case was before this House the opinions of the judges were taken on certain questions, and the sixth question was this:

B "Whether such (i.e., Unitarian) ministers, preachers, widows and persons are in the present state of the law incapable of partaking of such charities or any and which of them."

ERSKINE, J. (9 Cl. & Fin. at p. 525), COLERIDGE, J. (ibid. at p. 539), MAULE, J. (ibid. at p. 509), WILLIAMS, J. (ibid. at p. 545), GURNEY, B. (ibid. at p. 554),
 C PARKE, B. (ibid. at p. 565), and TINDAL, C.J. (ibid. at p. 578), all agreed in thinking that they were not. It is true that COLERIDGE, J., based his opinion upon the ground that Unitarians were Christians, but MAULE, J., stated that there was no authority to show that teaching Unitarian doctrine was contrary to the common law. And ERSKINE, J., stated that it was open to any man "without subjecting himself to any penal consequences soberly and reverently to examine and question the truth of those doctrines which have been assumed as essential to the Christian faith." There is, indeed, to be found in certain of these opinions indications of the view expressed in R. v. Woolston (6) that it is not illegal to deny any doctrine of the Christian faith, but that it is to deny them all collectively. I cannot accept this view of the law. The Christianity, offences against which are illegal at common law, is the Christianity known to the common law, and Unitarian Christianity
 D is opposed to the central doctrine of this faith. There remains Cowan v. Milbourn (2), in which the distinction urged by the appellants is clearly stated by BRAMWELL, B.; but it is equally clear that he misconceived the meaning of the Blasphemy Act, for he based his judgment on the statement that the hirer "proposed to use the rooms for purposes declared by the statute to be unlawful," but, as I have already shown, the statute had no such comprehensive scope.

F I am unable to ascertain what is the real reason upon which the distinction is supported. It appears to me that offences against Christianity, so far as they are recognised by law, are either statutory offences, leading to statutory penalties, or they are criminal offences at common law, punishable by the criminal courts, and I am unable to see how such offences, if not so punishable, exist at all, or how
 G in this connection an act can be illegal without being the subject of prosecution. for even if it be accepted that Christianity is part of the common law it does not follow that it is illegal to question its wisdom or its truth. The analogy of the cases with regard to restraint of trade and immorality of consideration does not appear to me to be sound. Restraint of trade, though contrary to the common law of England, never was a criminal offence; and, again, acts of immorality, though not criminal, cannot be made the consideration sufficient to support a contract, nor can a contract entered into to further such acts be enforced in the
 H courts. The latter of these classes of case are those which offend against good morals—the former are those contrary to public policy. The alleged offence in this case is neither one nor the other. The common law of England, in the words of LORD MANSFIELD, "knows no prosecution for mere opinion," and if the holding of opinion be not contrary to the common law, I cannot see why its expression
 I should be unlawful, provided such expression be kept within proper limits of order, reverence, and decency. If this be so, a society to propagate such opinions, if properly conducted, is not an illegal society.

I have only to add that, apart altogether from these considerations, I think that the respondents are well founded in arguing that since the company is a legal entity, and as some at least of its objects are on the face of them lawful, there is no ground upon which it is possible to prevent them from receiving money which has been the subject of a bequest in their favour. I cannot accede to the argument that the later purposes in the memorandum, which, taken alone, must be regarded as proper and lawful objects, become unlawful because they are associated with the first purpose of the memorandum. If an unequivocal act be lawful in itself the motive with which it is performed is immaterial; and, if it be said that all the later purposes are the instruments by which the first purpose may be effected, this, as it seems to me, may be an argument for showing that the first purpose is lawful, but it cannot establish that the later purposes are not. Even if all the objects of the company were illegal it would not follow that while the certificate of incorporation remained unrevoked the company would be unable to receive money. It is a mistake to treat the company as a trustee, for it has no beneficiaries and there is no difference between the capacity in which it receives a gift and that in which it obtains payment of a debt. In either case the money can only be used for the purposes of the company, and in neither case is the money held on trust. If, by oversight or mistake, a company were incorporated for wholly illegal objects, the right course to follow, where its capacity to receive money was questioned, in legal proceedings would be to direct an adjournment till proper steps had been taken to revoke the incorporation. This matter has been so fully dealt with by LORD PARKER, with whose views I entirely agree, that I do not desire to elaborate it further. For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

R. v. BASKERVILLE

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Viscount Reading, C.J., Scrutton, Avory, Rowlatt and Atkin, JJ.), May 29, July 31, 1916]

[Reported [1916] 2 K.B. 658; 86 L.J.K.B. 28; 115 L.T. 453; 80 J.P. 446; 60 Sol. Jo. 696; 25 Cox, C.C. 524; 12 Cr. App. Rep. 81]

Criminal Law—Evidence—Corroboration—Accomplice—Essentials of corroboration—Independent evidence implicating accused—Warning to jury—Review of verdict by Court of Criminal Appeal.

It has long been a rule of practice at common law for the judge at the trial of a person for a criminal offence to warn the jury of the danger of convicting the prisoner on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice or accomplices, and, in his discretion, to advise them not to convict on such evidence. In the absence of such a warning the Court of Criminal Appeal will quash the conviction, but will not do so if, after a proper caution by the judge, the jury nevertheless convict the prisoner, unless it thinks that the verdict is "unreasonable" or "cannot be supported having regard to the evidence" within s. 4 (1) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907. In considering whether or not the conviction should stand the Court of Criminal Appeal will review all the facts of the case, and will bear in mind that the jury had the opportunity of hearing and seeing the witnesses when giving their testimony.

The corroboration required must be independent testimony which affects the accused by connecting or tending to connect him with the crime. In other words, it must be evidence which implicates him, i.e., which confirms in some material particular not only the evidence that the crime has been committed, but also that the prisoner committed it. The corroboration need not be direct evidence that he committed the crime; it is sufficient if it is merely circumstantial evidence of his connection with it. Nor is it necessary that the accomplice should be confirmed in every detail of his evidence; if it were, his evidence would be merely confirmatory of the independent testimony and would not be essential to the case. The evidence given by one accomplice cannot be corroboration of the evidence of another accomplice, and where an accomplice gives evidence against two prisoners who are tried together corroboration of his evidence against one prisoner is not corroboration of his evidence against the other.

Appeal against conviction.

The appellant was convicted at the Central Criminal Court before the Recorder of London of gross indecency with male persons, contrary to s. 11 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (now s. 13 of the Sexual Offences Act, 1956: 36 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 223). The ground of the appeal was that he had been convicted on the evidence of accomplices which had not been corroborated.

July 31, 1916. The judgment of the court was read by

VISCOUNT READING, C.J.—The appellant was convicted of having committed offences under s. 11 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885. He appeals to this court on the ground that there was no such corroborative evidence as is required by law of the testimony of the three boys who were called for the prosecution at the trial and were accomplices in the crime. There is no statutory provision requiring corroboration applicable to these offences. At the close of the arguments we decided that there was abundant corroboration. In addition to the testimony of the accomplices, the following facts were given in evidence. A letter was proved to have been sent to one of the boys by the appellant in his handwriting, signed by him with his initial B., without any address on the letter, inclosing a note for 10s. to "Dear Harry," one of the boys, for himself and "Charlie," another of the boys, and making an appointment for them to meet the appellant "as arranged," without naming the place, and at a time stated. The prisoner had admitted to the police that the three boys had been at his flat, that he knew one as a pageboy at the Trocadero Restaurant, and that this boy had been to see him

A on several occasions with another boy, and the appellant suggested to the police that he belonged to a boys' club, and was entitled to invite any of the members to his place. The appellant was not a member of a boys' club. The appellant gave evidence at the trial and admitted that he had given money to two of the boys on various occasions, and that, on hearing a peculiar whistle outside his flat, he had gone downstairs to let the boys in. We entertained no doubt that this evidence afforded ample corroboration of the boys' testimony, even if we assumed that the corroboration required was corroboration "in some material particular implicating the accused." We were of opinion that in any event the direction given to the jury by the learned recorder regarding this matter gave no cause of complaint to the appellant. The warning by the recorder to the jury was sufficient, if indeed not more than sufficient. We, therefore, announced that the appeal would be dismissed.

C Having regard, however, to the arguments addressed to the court and to the difficulty of reconciling all the opinions expressed in the cases cited, and to the general importance of reviewing and re-stating the law applicable to corroboration of the evidence of accomplices, we took time to consider our judgment. There is no doubt that the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice is admissible in law: D see R. v. Atwood and Robbins (1). But it has long been a rule of practice at common law for the judge to warn the jury of the danger of convicting a prisoner on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice or accomplices, and, in the discretion of the judge, to advise them not to convict upon such evidence; but the judge should point out to the jury that it is within their legal province to convict upon such unconfirmed evidence: see R. v. Stubbs (2), and Re Meunier (3). This rule of practice has become virtually equivalent to a rule of law, and since the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, came into operation this court has held that, in the absence of such a warning by the judge, the conviction must be quashed: see R. v. Tate (4). If after the proper caution by the judge the jury nevertheless convict the prisoner, this court will not quash the conviction merely upon the ground that the testimony of the accomplice was uncorroborated. It can but rarely happen E that the jury would convict in such circumstances. In considering whether or not the conviction should stand, this court will review all the facts of the case, and will bear in mind that the jury had the opportunity of hearing and seeing the witnesses when giving their testimony. But this court, in the exercise of its powers, will quash a conviction, even when the judge has given to the jury the warning or advice above mentioned, if this court, after considering all the circumstances of the case, thinks the verdict "unreasonable" or that it "cannot be supported having regard to the evidence": Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 4 (1). G This jurisdiction gives larger powers to interfere with verdicts than had heretofore existed in criminal cases.

H In addition to the rule of practice above mentioned, there are, with regard to certain offences, statutory provisions "that no person shall be convicted of an offence under this section upon the evidence of one witness only, unless such witness be corroborated in some material particular by evidence implicating the accused."

I For example, the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 2, s. 3 [see now s. 2, s. 3, s. 22, s. 23 of Sexual Offences Act, 1956]. In these cases the law is that the judge, in the absence of such corroborative evidence, must stop the case at the close of the prosecution and direct the jury to acquit the accused. Where no such statutory provision is applicable to the offence charged, and the evidence for the prosecution consists of the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice or accomplices, the law is that the judge should leave the case to the jury after giving them the caution already mentioned.

As the rule of practice at common law was founded originally upon the exercise of the discretion of the judge at the trial, and, moreover, as it is anomalous in its nature, inasmuch as it requires confirmation of the testimony of a competent witness, it is not surprising that this rule should have led to differences of opinion as to the nature and extent of the corroboration required, although there are propositions of law applicable to corroboration which are beyond controversy. For example,

"Confirmation does not mean that there should be independent evidence of that which the accomplice relates, or his testimony would be unnecessary":

MAULE, J., in R. v. Mullins (5), 3 Cox, C.C. at p. 531.

Indeed, if it were required that the accomplice should be confirmed in every detail of the crime, his evidence would not be essential to the case; it would be merely confirmatory of other and independent testimony. Again, the corroboration must be by some evidence other than that of an accomplice, and, therefore, the evidence given by one accomplice is not corroboration of the testimony of another accomplice: R. v. Noakes (6). The difference of opinion has arisen mainly in reference to the question whether the corroborative evidence must connect the accused with the crime. The rule of practice as to corroborative evidence has arisen in consequence of the danger of convicting a person upon the unconfirmed testimony of one who is admittedly a criminal. What is required is some additional evidence rendering it probable that the story of the accomplice is true and that it is reasonably safe to act upon it. If the only independent evidence relates to an incident in the commission of the crime which does not connect the accused with it, or if the only independent evidence relates to the identity of the accused without connecting him with the crime, is it corroborative evidence? There are some expressions in the books which imply that it may be, and in R. v. Birkett and Brady (7) the judges were of opinion that an accomplice did not require confirmation as to the person he charged, if he was confirmed as to the particulars of his story. The case is very imperfectly reported and the evidence is not stated. It was not argued by counsel, but was stated verbally to a meeting of the judges by the judge who tried the case. There are other cases where it has been held that a conviction on such evidence could not be quashed by the court, but the ratio decidendi is that as an accomplice is a competent witness and the jury thought him worthy of credit, the verdict was in accordance with law. R. v. Atwood and Robbins (1) and R. v. Jones (8) may be referred to. There are other cases where it has been held that on such evidence the case cannot be withdrawn from the jury: e.g., R. v. Hastings and Graves (9) and R. v. Avery (10).

After examining these and other authorities to the present date, we have come to the conclusion that the better opinion of the law upon this point is that stated in R. v. Stubbs (2) by PARKE, B., namely, that the evidence of an accomplice must be confirmed not only as to the circumstances of the crime, but also as to the identity of the prisoner. The learned baron does not mean that there must be confirmation of all the circumstances of the crime; as we have already stated, that is unnecessary. It is sufficient if there is confirmation as to a material circumstance of the crime and of the identity of the accused in relation to the crime. PARKE, B., gave this opinion as a result of twenty-five years' practice: it was accepted by the other judges and has been much relied upon in later cases. In R. v. Wilkes (11) ALDERSON, B., said (7 C. & P. at p. 273):

"The confirmation which I always advise juries to require is the confirmation of the accomplice in some fact which goes to fix the guilt on the particular person charged. You may legally convict on the evidence of an accomplice, if you can safely rely on his testimony, but I advise juries never to act on the evidence of any accomplice unless he is confirmed as to the particular person who is charged with the offence."

In R. v. Parler (12) LORD ABINGER, C.B., said (8 C. & P. at pp. 107, 108):

"It is a practice which deserves all the reverence of law, that judges have uniformly told juries that they ought not to pay any respect to the testimony

A of an accomplice, unless the accomplice is corroborated in some material circumstance. Now, in my opinion, that corroboration ought to consist in some circumstance that affects identity of the party accused. A man who has been guilty of a crime himself will always be able to relate the facts of the case, and if the confirmation be only on the truth of that history, without identifying the persons, that is really no corroboration at all. . . . It would not
B at all tend to show that the party accused participated in it."

In R. v. Dyke (13) GURNEY, B., said :

"Although in some instances it has been so held, you will find that in the majority of recent cases it is laid down that the confirmation should be as to some matter which goes to connect the prisoner with the transaction."

C In R. v. Birkett (14) the prisoner was indicted for receiving stolen sheep. The evidence consisted of the statement of an accomplice, and, to confirm it, it was proved that a quantity of mutton corresponding in size with the sheep stolen was found in the house of the prisoner. PATTESON, J., said :

"If the confirmation had merely gone to the extent of confirming the accomplice as to matters connected with himself only, it would not have been sufficient D . . . but here we have a good deal more; we have a quantity of mutton found in the house in which the prisoner resides, and that I think is such a confirmation of the evidence of the accomplice's evidence as I must leave to the jury."

These cases lead to the view expressed later by PARKE, B., in R. v. Stubbs (2), and show that in his time, although there had been doubt in the past, the law as formulated by him was accepted as the correct opinion, and continued to be the E law to the time of the passing of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, and, in our judgment, to the present day.

We hold that evidence in corroboration must be independent testimony which affects the accused by connecting or tending to connect him with the crime. In other words, it must be evidence which implicates him—that is, which confirms in some material particular not only the evidence that the crime has been committed, but also that the prisoner committed it. The test applicable to determine the nature and extent of the corroboration is thus the same whether the case falls within the rule of practice at common law or within that class of offence for which corroboration is required by statute. The language of the statute "implicating the accused" compendiously incorporates the test applicable at common law in the rule of practice. The nature of the corroboration will necessarily vary according
G to the particular circumstances of the offence charged. It would be in a high degree dangerous to attempt to formulate the kind of evidence which would be regarded as corroboration, except to say that corroborative evidence is evidence which shows or tends to show that the story of the accomplice that the accused committed the crime is true; not merely that the crime has been committed, but that it was committed by the accused. The corroboration need not be direct evidence that the
H accused committed the crime; it is sufficient if it is merely circumstantial evidence of his connection with the crime. A good instance of this indirect evidence is to be found in R. v. Birkett (14). Were the law otherwise, many crimes which are usually committed between accomplices in secret, such as incest, offences with females, or the present case, could never be brought to justice.

I The decisions of this court upon the nature of the corroboration required call for some examination, and it is because they do not always appear to be to the same effect that this court was specially constituted in order that we might lay down rules for future guidance. In R. v. Everest (15) the court said (2 Cr. App. Rep. at p. 132) :

"The rule has long been established that the judge should tell the jury to acquit the prisoner if the only evidence against him is that of an accomplice, unless that evidence is corroborated in some particular which goes to implicate the accused."

We think "Tell the jury to acquit" should read "Warn the jury of the danger of convicting." There is no statement in the report of the exact warning given by the judge. In R. v. Wilson, Lewis and Havard (16) there was an abundant caution, and the court said (6 Cr. App. Rep. at p. 128):

"It must not be supposed that corroboration is required amounting to independent evidence implicating the accused."

If this means that the judge should not warn the jury to require independent corroboration of some part of the story which implicates or involves the accused, it goes too far. In R. v. Blatherwick (17) the court said: "R. v. Everest (15) goes too far. R. v. Wilson (16) is the correct statement of the law." We agree that R. v. Everest (15) goes too far in saying that the judge should direct the jury to acquit, but R. v. Everest (15) is the better statement of the law as regards the corroboration for which the jury should look. In Bradshaw v. Waterlow & Sons, Ltd. (18) ([1915] 3 K.B. at p. 534) PICKFORD, L.J., in the Court of Appeal was of opinion that the recent cases of R. v. Wilson, Lewis and Havard (16), R. v. Brown (19), R. v. Blatherwick (17), and R. v. Crane (20),

"show that it is not necessary to have corroboration directly implicating the accused if the corroboration which exists supports the truth of the story as a whole."

The learned lord justice was merely stating his view of these cases in regard to the case there before the court. He found, however, that in fact there was corroboration directly implicating the accused in the case then under appeal, and it was, therefore, unnecessary to consider further the cases cited. In R. v. Cohen (21) the court did not attempt to deal with the difference of opinion manifested by the decisions of R. v. Everest (15) and R. v. Wilson, Lewis and Havard (16), but, as explained in R. v. Willis (22), decided the case on the assumption that the view of the law more favourable to the appellant as laid down in R. v. Everest (15) was right. The court there said that it was the practice of this court to require corroboration before it could allow a conviction to stand. We did not intend to lay down such a rule of practice. It is too strongly expressed and is too general a statement. The correct view is that laid down earlier in the present judgment. The latest case is that of R. v. Willis (22). The court there stated ([1916] 1 K.B. at p. 937):

"There are certain statutes which provide that certain classes of evidence shall be insufficient to support a conviction unless corroborated by some other material evidence implicating the accused; but corroboration where required by the common law is not subject to any such qualification."

It follows from the law laid down in the present judgment that that is a correct view to the effect that the verdict of a jury properly warned would not be set aside merely because they had believed an accomplice without corroboration implicating the accused, but it must not be read as meaning that the corroboration need not be independent evidence implicating the accused. R. v. Cooper (23) was referred to during the course of the argument in the present case. That case turned upon special facts relating to the medical testimony. It did not alter the law. Now that we have stated the law to be applied in future cases, we trust that it will be unnecessary again to refer to the earlier decisions of this court.

The question was discussed on the hearing of this appeal whether the evidence of an accomplice against two prisoners, corroborated as to one prisoner's participation in the crime, but not as to the other, can be regarded as corroboration with regard to both prisoners. We think the law is correctly stated by ALDERSON, B., in R. v. Jenkins (24). The learned baron there said:

"Where there is one witness of bad character giving evidence against both prisoners, a confirmation of his testimony with regard to one is no confirmation of his testimony as to the other. If, therefore, you find there is a corroboration

A applicable to one prisoner, take it as against him, but, unless it exists with regard to both, it seems to me it would be unjust to give it a general effect."

B R. v. Jones (8) may appear at first sight to be in the contrary direction, but upon closer examination we do not think that LORD ELLENBOROUGH intended to decide more than that when two prisoners are tried and convicted upon the evidence of an accomplice corroborated as to the one but not as to the other, the conviction of the other must nevertheless be regarded as a conviction which was good in law. LORD ELLENBOROUGH was upholding the rule of law that a conviction founded upon the evidence of an accomplice only could not be treated as bad in law. His Lordship said (2 Camp. at pp. 132, 133) :

C "Judges in their discretion will advise a jury not to believe an accomplice unless he is confirmed, or only in as far as he is confirmed, but, if he is believed, his testimony is unquestionably sufficient to establish the facts to which he deposes. It is allowed that he is a competent witness, and the consequence is inevitable that if credit is given to his evidence it requires no confirmation from another witness."

D We see no reason in principle why a different rule as to corroboration should apply to a prisoner tried with another against whom there is corroborative evidence of the accomplice's story from that applicable if the first prisoner had been tried alone. In that case the uncorroborated evidence of the accomplice would be admissible against him, but it would be the duty of the judge to give the proper caution to the jury, and it would be equally incumbent upon the judge to give the warning to the jury when the prisoner is tried with another against whom there was corroboration of the story told by the accomplice. If the judge failed to give the warning, the court would be bound to set aside the conviction. If the judge gave the warning, this court would then have to consider all the circumstances of the case as already indicated. The appeal stands dismissed.

*Police—Emergency—Officers from other forces called in—Expense of maintenance

Protection of public—Right of party to dispute—County Police Act, 1839
(2 & 3 Vict., c. 93), s. 18—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict., c. 41),
s. 9, s. 100—Police Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict., c. 45), s. 25.*

Acting under s. 25 of the Police Act, 1890, during a time of special emergency the chief constable of G., with the authority of the standing joint committee, entered into agreements with other police authorities under which officers of those authorities came to assist the police force of G., these officers to be housed and maintained by the police authority of G. The need for assistance resulted from a strike of colliery workers at G. in which there had been rioting and an anticipation by the colliery owners of damage being done to their property. At the request of the chief constable members of the local police and also of the aiding forces were lodged on the colliery premises and maintained at the expense of the colliery owners. In an action by the colliery owners to recover the cost of such maintenance from the standing joint committee and/or the county council of G.,

Held: in view of the provisions of s. 9 and s. 100 of the Local Government Act, 1888, and s. 25 of the Police Act, 1890, the standing joint committee had power to enter into the contracts in question and to authorise the chief constable to enter into them on their behalf, and (PHILLIMORE, L.J., dissenting) were liable to be sued on contracts so entered into, but an order must be made against the county council, as the authority responsible for providing money for the maintenance of the police force, for payment of the sums claimed by the colliery owners.

Per CURIAM: Section 18 of the County Police Act, 1839, which provides that allowances shall be made to the chief constable of a county for extraordinary expenses necessarily incurred by him, does not limit the powers of the county authorities to give the chief constable authority to make contracts.

Per PICKFORD, L.J.: If one party to a dispute is threatened with violence by the other party he is entitled to protection from such violence whether his contention in the dispute be right or wrong, and to allow the police authorities to deny him protection from that violence unless he pays all the expense, in addition to the contribution which, with other ratepayers, he makes to the support of the police, is only one degree less dangerous than to allow that authority to decide which party is right in the dispute, and grant or withhold protection accordingly. There is a moral duty on each party to the dispute to do nothing to aggravate it and to take reasonable means of self-protection, but the discharge of this duty by them is not a condition precedent to the discharge by the police authority of their own duty.

Per BRAY, J.: It is not material to inquire whether the authority [by the standing joint committee to the chief constable] had been given antecedently or was ratified by conduct afterwards. The whole conduct of the standing joint committee is overwhelming to show one or the other, and the defendants' counsel were obliged to admit that, if it were the case of a private person instead of a public body, ratification could not be disputed. I know of no

A distinction between a private person and a public body in such a case, provided always that the public body has the power to contract and that power is not limited by provisions requiring that it shall be exercised in a particular way. No point has been raised in this case that the power had to be exercised in any particular way.

B Decision of BANKES, J. ([1915] 1 K.B. 471) affirmed on these points, but varied with regard to a further question of fact.

Appeal by defendants (other than Captain Lionel Lindsay) from an order of BANKES, J. ([1915] 1 K.B. 471), upon the trial of preliminary questions of liability raised on the pleadings in two actions brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants in which the plaintiffs sought to recover sums of money expended by them at the request of the defendant, Captain Lindsay, acting as chief constable of the county of Glamorgan, with the authority of the other defendants, the Standing Joint Committee of Glamorganshire Quarter Sessions and County Council, on the housing and feeding of police who had been brought into the county of Glamorgan during 1910 and 1911 in consequence of unrest and disorders arising from disputes between the plaintiffs and their workmen.

The facts are stated in the headnote and further referred to in their LORDSHIPS' judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 5, 1916. The following judgments were read.

PHILLIMORE, L.J. [after stating the facts in detail].—The Act under which the aiding agreements were made is the Police Act, 1890, s. 25 of which provides:

"(1) Where a police authority deem it expedient for any special emergency or under any exceptional circumstances to strengthen their police force (in this section referred to as the aided force) by constables belonging to another police force, such number of constables belonging to the latter force may be added to the aided force, and for such period as may be agreed on between the police authorities of the forces, and the constables so added, notwithstanding that they have not been sworn or taken any declaration as constables of the aided force, shall during that period be deemed, save as otherwise provided by the agreement, to be for all purposes constables of the aided force, and shall have the like powers, duties, and privileges. (2) The agreement may be made for a particular occasion or as a standing agreement, and with reference either to recurring or to unforeseen events, or otherwise, as may be thought expedient. (3) Any power conferred on a police authority by this section, or by any agreement made thereunder, may (subject to anything in the agreement to the contrary) be delegated by the authority to their chief officer of police by any general or special order and with or without any exceptions, restrictions, or conditions. (4) An agreement under this section may contain such terms as to the command of the constables added to the aided forces, and as to the expenses (including the pay and allowances of the constables so added and

A provision for pensions, gratuities, and allowances in the event of those constables being killed or injured) and otherwise, as may seem expedient."

B I shall have later to consider what authority, if any, there was for the chief constable to enter into these agreements with authorities other than those discussed in 1909, but before I part with the actual documents I may usefully make these remarks. The Police Act, 1890, defines "police authority" by s. 33 and the third schedule as follows—in a county "the standing joint committee of the quarter sessions and the county council," and in a borough the watch committee. The chief constables, therefore, have neither authority to let nor hire without the sanction of their standing joint committee in the case of counties, and the watch committee in the case of cities and boroughs.

C These being the facts, the two coal companies brought their actions, each in similar form. A writ was issued against "the standing joint committee of the quarter sessions and the county council of Glamorgan composed of"—and then all the names of the members were set out. Another writ was issued against the county council; and each pair of actions were afterwards consolidated. In the Glamorgan case there was a third writ against the standing joint committee (not expressing their names this time) and Captain Lindsay, which was also consolidated. This was unnecessary in the Powell Duffryn case, as he had been made a defendant along with the standing joint committee. The statements of claim and the pleadings generally need not be particularly referred to, except in respect of the prayer or claim. In each case a judgment was asked against the chief constable for the sum claimed. In the Glamorgan Coal Co. case a judgment was asked for the sum claimed against the defendant council, the standing joint committee, and Lindsay, jointly, severally, or in the alternative. In each case, as an alternative claim, damages were asked for against Captain Lindsay for breach of his warranty that he had authority to contract. In addition to these comparatively simple claims, there were alternatives and more unusual prayers which I need not set out, because towards the end of the trial the prayer for relief was amended substantially into the form in which judgment was ultimately given by the learned judge. At the conclusion of the trial judgment was given for Captain Lindsay with costs. There has been no appeal against this judgment, and he has not been brought before us.

F The trials came on before BANKES, J., under orders that the preliminary questions of liability be tried, reserving the question of damages, and the form of the judgment in either case was as follows: The judge

G "decided in favour of the plaintiffs against the defendants, the standing joint committee, on all questions of liability raised on the pleading, with costs, and directed judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs against the defendants for the amount of expenditure (when ascertained as hereinafter directed) incurred by the plaintiffs in respect of the police (other than the metropolitan police) referred to in the pleadings, and further declared that all the expenditure incurred by the plaintiffs and referred to in the pleadings, in respect of all the police referred to in the pleadings, including the metropolitan police, was extraordinary expenditure necessarily incurred by the defendant Lindsay; that the constables under his orders in the execution of his and their duty come within the meaning of the County Police Act, 1839; that the defendant Lindsay was entitled to payment thereof out of the county fund of the county of Glamorgan, subject to the examination and audit by the standing joint committee of his accounts relating thereto, as required by s. 18 of the last-mentioned Act; and that the defendant council were bound, subject to the said examination and audit, to pay the last-mentioned expenditure to the defendant Lindsay for the use and benefit of the plaintiffs."

H The learned judge further directed the defendant council to pay the last-mentioned expenditure when ascertained to the defendant Lindsay for the use and benefit of the plaintiffs, and directed the defendant Lindsay to pay over the same to the plaintiffs. A

Both the standing joint committee and the county council have appealed from these judgments, and it appears to me that there are five matters for our consideration, (i) (ii) and (iii), the authority of the chief constable to bind the county (using the phrase "county" as before in quite a general way) to pay for board and lodging or lodging of Glamorgan police, of generally aiding police, and of the metropolitan police; (iv) the liability of the standing joint committee and of the county council, either or both, to be sued upon a contract made by the chief constable within the scope of his authority; and (v) the form of the remedy or judgment. B

First, as to the authority of the chief constable in respect of feeding or housing Glamorgan police. The evolution of the county police has been a gradual one. Under the Special Constables Act, 1831, new or additional powers were given to the justices to appoint and swear in special constables, and by s. 13 the justices for the division may, at a special session, order reasonable allowances to be paid to special constables for their trouble, loss of time, and expenses, and the county treasurer is to pay on such order. From this probably developed the establishment of paid constables, which was made pretty general by the County Police Act, 1839, and universal by the County and Borough Police Act, 1856. Under the Act of 1839 the justices were empowered to appoint a chief constable, who was to appoint petty constables, and were to provide for their pay and clothing, and in some instances for stations and lock-ups, drawing for this purpose upon the county rate. It seems to me that this statute gave them authority to contract, either by the chief constable or by some other agent whom they might select, for all things necessary for the maintenance of their force. Contracts would have to be made with tradesmen for uniforms, probably with builders, and with each policeman for his pay. If it seemed desirable to give a policeman less money and to provide him with lodging the necessary contracts would be made, and if his pay was given him on the footing that he lived with his wife and family, and then he was on special duty removed to a distant part of the county, his food would have to be given him, and the necessary contract could be made either with him or with an innkeeper. The intermediary would be the chief constable, but his principals would be the justices. In the Act there is a s. 18 which has been ridden to death in this case. The defendants have said that, except in respect of pay and possibly uniform, it provides the only way by which the county can be bound, that for all other matters the chief constable must contract so as to bind himself, and then seek for repayment from the justices, who are to consider not what he has bound himself to pay, but what are his reasonable allowances. It seemed to be conceded that he need not actually make the disbursement before coming for repayment, as to which see The Feronia (1), but it was contended that the liability was his, and that there would be no primary contract between the tradesmen supplying and the county. On the other hand, the defendants use s. 18 as a warrant for the remarkable form of the latter part of the judgment, suggesting that in some way the court must determine what are just and proper allowances, or compel the county authorities to determine—and determine rightly—what are just and proper allowances to be made to the chief constable, and then that in some way the tradesmen should be subrogated to the chief constable and given in his name or through him a right of recovery, which he did not seek to exercise. C D E F G H I

This section is, to my mind, a very simple and harmless one. It is as follows:

"In addition to the salary to be paid to the chief constable of the county, reasonable allowances shall be made to him for extraordinary expenses necessarily incurred by him, and by the constables under his orders, in the apprehension of offenders, and in the execution of his and their duty under

A this Act; which allowances shall be examined and audited by the justices of the county in quarter sessions assembled."

B I think it means this. There are expenses which the chief constable, or, indeed, a petty constable, for the section applies to both, may have to incur on the spur of the moment. He may want to hire a vehicle to pursue an offender, or to carry him to the nearest lock-up, or before a justice. He may want, in order to lie in wait for or detect an offender, or to bring along a person to identify him, to incur small expenses for hiring a room or a disguise, or a vehicle. The chief constable may want to transport police and pay their railway fares. And as to some or all of these matters there may not be antecedent authority. The section provides that in such cases the justices may out of the county rate lawfully reimburse the constable. It means no more. It does not limit the powers which the county authorities have of giving an antecedent authority to make contracts. It does not give the person with whom the constable deals on his own credit any right as against the county. This being so, there is nothing in the section to prevent the county authorities from giving or being held by the mere virtue of his appointment to give to the chief constable authority to enter into necessary contracts for feeding and housing county police who are moved away from their stations or homes. Therefore, question No. (i) is answered, that the chief constable had authority to bind the county to pay the colliery companies, as the county has paid other tradesmen, for housing (if there was any housing) and feeding Glamorgan police.

E Now question No. (ii) as to the general aiding police. The statute of 1890 makes such police, if they have been brought in under a lawful agreement, peace officers and police of the county. The question of the chief constable's power to provide by contract for the feeding and lodging of such police must arise. There can be no question that part of the remuneration of the aiding police must take the form of housing them and feeding them, unless the agreement gives them lodging and subsistence money. Therefore, as regards Somerset police, possibly as regards F Bristol, possibly even as regards Swansea, Gloucester, and Cardiff, there is no difficulty. There remain the other counties and cities and boroughs. If there was authority to bring them in they stand on the same footing. The question therefore is: Was there authority? No doubt the statute states that the police authority is the chief constable empowered by his standing joint committee, by general or special order, and there is no recorded order. But the standing joint committee, G though I suppose it must be considered so much an association that it must meet to pass resolutions as if its members were capitulariter congregati (see Dean and Chapter of Fernes Case (2)) and could not give assent through the separate adhesion of its several members, has yet no rules or none bearing upon this matter, does not meet except at stated and remote periods, has no provision for summoning special meetings, and must in such matters be taken to authorise either its chairman H or its clerk or the chief constable to act in cases of emergency. The action of the sub-committee with regard to Bristol, the language of the chairman with regard apparently to Gloucester, Cardiff, and Swansea, show that formal agreements were not expected. I have noticed that, with the exception of London and Hertford, none of the agreements shows on its face that the chief constable of the aiding county had authority by order of his standing joint committee to make such an agreement, and I the authority is quite as necessary for the aiding as for the aided chief constable. In no case does the aiding authority seem to have required any proof that the aided chief constable had authority. All these agreements spring from the Home Secretary's circular. All appear to be based, with some variations, upon the form of agreement which he suggests, which of itself does not deduce title in the chief constables to make agreements. It may well be that, since the circular, a standing joint committee which appoints a chief constable, without expressly forbidding him to contract or reserving to itself the power of contracting, must be taken, by the mere fact of appointment, to authorise its chief constable not to make general agreements, not to make agreements lasting beyond the next meeting of the standing joint committee, but agreements binding in case of an emergency arising between two meetings. The conduct of the standing joint committee is good evidence of ratification if it could ratify. I see a difficulty about ratification because a lawfully introduced aiding policeman gets by the statute the privileges of a peace officer, and I do not understand how he could be without those privileges at the moment, say, of making an arrest, and get those privileges ex post facto to the detriment possibly of the person arrested, by reason of an unwarranted agreement being ratified. But the conduct of the standing joint committee in this case may be good evidence that it had delegated the power to its chief constable, and the fact that when these aiding agreements—other than those with the metropolitan police—were brought to its notice it passed no censure upon the chief constable for making them, and paid, though with a kind of internal protest, the smaller tradesmen's bills, and, what is strongest of all, has paid the various aiding authorities, seems to me strong evidence of some order, not, indeed, written or recorded in totidem verbis, giving authority to its chief constable to make these arrangements in case of emergency. This being so, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover for lodging and feeding the general aiding police.

The position as to the metropolitan police is different. They were not brought in under an aiding agreement, they were sent by the Home Secretary on his own motion; and the subsequent agreements made some days after their arrival are mere forms. The Home Secretary gave up the attempt to insist upon them. I have been prepared to go so far as to hold that the standing joint committee might have contemplated and by implication authorised the chief constable to enter into ordinary aiding agreements, but it would be wild to suppose that it ever contemplated an agreement for an introduction upon this scale of a body of substitutes for the military. As soon as ever it was known that there were agreements between the Chief Commissioner of Metropolitan Police and the chief constable, purporting to provide for the employment of the metropolitan police, the standing joint committee repudiated these agreements and any liability for the pay or maintenance of the metropolitan police. It is suggested that they were sworn in as special constables for the county. It may be doubted whether that was regularly done, but, assuming that it was, it would be almost fantastic to treat the application of the present plaintiffs as an enforcing of the right of special constables to have such compensation as is provided for them by the Act of 1831. There can be no direct remedy against the standing joint committee or the county council upon the contract supposed to be made to pay for the board and lodging of the metropolitan police, nor do I think that the judge thought there could be. The form of his judgment and his reasons seem to show this. The ingenious attempt was, however, made upon behalf of the plaintiffs to work s. 18 of the Act, 1839, by treating the chief constable as having made himself personally responsible to the colliery companies, giving him an indemnity and then vesting that indemnity in the plaintiffs by way of subrogation. This suggestion has commended itself to the learned judge, and results in his judgment in the form which it has taken. But it will not do. The chief constable did not bind himself. If he had, the judgment should have been given against him. He does not ask for any indemnity. He was a defendant and not a plaintiff, and never sought to be put in any other position.

Questions (iv) and (v) may be treated of together. The old county authority—the justices—could by common law make valid contracts. This is shown in R. v. Inhabitants of Essex (3). How they did it, in form and in what name, or through whom they could sue and be sued upon such contracts, has not been investigated during the arguments before us, and probably it is needless to inquire. So long ago as the County Rates Act, 1738, justices were given power by s. 1 to make one general rate to be raised, except in certain places, out of the poor rate, and paid

A to the county treasurer, who by s. 6 was to make payment thereout on the order of the justices. By s. 14 they could contract for re-building bridges and similar works, and provision was made for security for due performance being given by the contractor to the clerk of the peace, on behalf of the justices. By the County and Borough Police Act, 1856, s. 22, justices were given power to purchase station houses and strong rooms, and to use the Lands Clauses Act, but no provision was

B made, that I can trace, for nominating any particular person or officer to whom land could be conveyed. It is not unlikely, however, that the clerk of the peace had already been mentioned in some Acts of Parliament as a person with whom contracts could be legally made, or to whom lands could be conveyed.

C All this leads up to the statute which was in force till the Local Government Act, 1888, was enacted, and was in fact only repealed some years later by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1892. This statute (21 & 22 Vict., c. 92, relating to county property) provides by s. 1 that conveyances of land which the justices are authorised to purchase shall be made to the clerk of the peace upon trust for the public uses and purposes for which it is bought, and by s. 2 that, except where otherwise specially provided for by any Act of Parliament, contracts entered into by the

D justices shall be made on their behalf by the clerk of the peace, and may be sued upon by or against the clerk of the peace for the time being. In these circumstances the Local Government Act, 1888, by which the general government of the counties was transferred from the justices to the county council and the standing joint committee, was passed. The material sections are 9, 30, and 64. By s. 9:

E “(1) The powers, duties, and liabilities of quarter sessions and of justices out of session with respect to the county police shall, on and after the appointed day, vest in and attach to the quarter sessions and the county council jointly, and be exercised and discharged through the standing joint committee of the quarter sessions and county council appointed as hereinafter mentioned. . . .

F (3) Nothing in this Act shall affect the powers, duties, and liabilities of justices of the peace as conservators of the peace, or the obligation of the chief constable or other constables to obey their lawful orders given in that behalf.”

By s. 30:

G “(1) For the purpose of the police, and the clerk of the peace, and of clerks of the justices, and joint officers, and of matters required to be determined jointly by the quarter sessions and the council of a county, there shall be a standing joint committee of the quarter sessions and the county council, consisting of such equal number of justices appointed by the quarter sessions and of members of the county council appointed by that council as may from time to time be arranged between the quarter sessions and the council, and in default of arrangement such number taken equally from the quarter sessions and the council as may be directed by a Secretary of State. . . . (3) Any matter

H arising under this Act with respect to the police . . . and any other matter requiring to be determined jointly by the quarter sessions and the county council shall be referred to and determined by the joint committee under this section; and all such expenditure as the said joint committee determine to be required for the purposes of the matters above mentioned shall be paid out of the county fund, and the council of the county shall provide for such

By s. 64:

“(1) On and after the appointed day all property of the quarter sessions of a county, or held by the clerk of the peace, or any justice or justices of a county, or treasurer, or commissioners, or otherwise for any public uses and purposes of a county, or any division thereof, shall pass to and vest in and be held in trust for the council of the county, subject to all debts and liabilities affecting it, and shall be held by the county council for the same estate.

interest, and purposes, and subject to the same covenants, conditions, and restrictions, for and subject to which that property is or would have been held if this Act had not passed, so far as those purposes are not modified by this Act. (2) On and after the appointed day all debts and liabilities of the quarter sessions, or of the clerk of the peace, or any justice or justices, or treasurer, or commissioners, incurred for county purposes, shall become debts and liabilities of the county council, and shall, subject, to the provisions of this Act, be defrayed by them out of the like property and funds out of which they would have been defrayed if this Act had not been passed."

[See now amendment to these sections in Justices of the Peace Act, 1949.] It results that the county council can make contracts and can sue and be sued in respect, at any rate, of such matters as would not come within the cognisance of the standing joint committee; and that the standing joint committee can either itself enter into contracts, or direct the county council to enter into contracts for the standing joint committee. But as the standing joint committee is not a body corporate and has not a common seal it seems to me that all contracts requiring to be under seal and all conveyances by or to the county authorities must be made by or to the county council. I gather from the judgments of my colleagues that we are not quite in agreement on this point. They think that the contracts are the contracts of the standing joint committee. I think that the legislature intended, in the Act of 1888, to follow the principle of the Act 21 & 22 Vict., c. 92 [relating to county property], and that, as the unincorporated justices could make contracts through, and sue or be sued by, their clerk of the peace, so it was intended that the unincorporated standing joint committee should make contracts through, and sue or be sued by, their county council. I am somewhat assisted by the Police Act, 1890. This Act, enabling police authorities to make agreements, must have intended that these agreements should be enforceable, and, one would think, directly enforceable by ordinary process of law. Now the watch committee is the police authority in boroughs for the purposes of this Act, and the watch committee is a mere committee of the town council, a necessary committee where the borough has its own police, but not more necessary than the finance committee, the existence of which is also required by statute. Both are pieces of internal organisation, having no separate existence apart from the corporation, and no funds. The legislature never, I think, meant that disputing watch committees should sue or be sued in order to get a formal judgment, fruitless except as the basis of some ulterior procedure. I think it is intended in that statute that the corporation should be the parties to the action, and if, for instance, the police authority of Bristol had occasion to sue on its agreement, it would sue by the corporation of the city, and sue the county council of Glamorgan. It seems to me, therefore, that these actions were rightly brought against the county council.

I have more difficulty in understanding the joinder of the standing joint committee as a defendant or defendants. But, on the whole, I think it a convenient course that an action upon a contract made by the directing mind of the standing joint committee, even if through the county council as the actual contractor, should be decided in the presence of the standing joint committee. The standing joint committee has to determine, and its determination binds the county council. Though the form of writ is peculiar, enumerating, as it does, all the members of the standing joint committee by name, no relief is prayed against these members in their private capacity; and, after appearance and defence, it is not open to the standing joint committee or its members to contend that the standing joint committee is not a suable entity. The defence does not go far enough for this. My colleagues, I gather, think that the standing joint committee is the primary party to be sued, but that the action is also rightly brought against the county council. We all, therefore, agree that both are proper parties, and we agree to the form of the judgment. Why, as the two bodies agreed in resisting the

A claim, it was thought necessary to defend separately, I do not see, nor, I think, do any of us. Upon the whole, I think that the actions succeed as regards the claim for housing and feeding all the police other than the metropolitan police, and fail as regards the metropolitan police. I think that the orders or judgments of the court below must be varied, and that the proper form of order for this court to make in either action is as follows: Allow the appeal; vary order of the court below; decide in favour of the plaintiffs against the defendants, the standing joint committee and the county council, on the questions of liability raised on the pleadings so far as these relate to police other than the metropolitan police, and against the plaintiffs and in favour of the defendants so far as these questions relate to the metropolitan police. Declare that the defendants, the standing joint committee, are liable for the expenditure incurred by the plaintiffs as in the pleadings mentioned in respect of police other than the metropolitan police, but not in respect of the metropolitan police. Refer the claim of the plaintiffs to an official referee, unless otherwise arranged, to ascertain the true amount thereof. Direct judgment to be entered in favour of the plaintiffs against the defendants for the amount when ascertained. Order that the costs in the court below be the plaintiffs' in any event, and that the costs of the reference abide the order of the official referee, and that there be no costs of the appeal. Order the defendant county council to pay the claim of the plaintiffs, when so ascertained, and all costs awarded to them.

PICKFORD, L.J., stated the facts and continued: I think the result of these facts is that the county authorities knew quite well that the plaintiffs had incurred and continued to incur this expense on the footing of being repaid by the county any part of it which ought fairly to be considered a police expense chargeable to the county. The standing joint committee held a meeting on Dec. 12, 1910, and appointed a sub-committee to deal with the claims in respect of the police. The sub-committee and the standing joint committee held other meetings after that time, and the result was that they repudiated the aiding agreements made by the chief constable in respect of the metropolitan police and all expense connected with them, and accepted responsibility for the other aiding agreements and the expenses of the aiding police, with the exception of the amount claimed by the colliery companies, which they refused to pay. Their reason for repudiating any liability in respect of the metropolitan police was that no one had asked for them, but the magistrates had asked for an assistance which they considered would have been more effective and would not have been chargeable to the county, and, if the Home Office sent something not asked for, which they considered less effective, the Home Office could not ask the county to pay for it. I do not consider that it is for me to express any opinion whether the action of the Home Office in sending metropolitan police instead of soldiers was judicious or not, but I think the position of the standing joint committee was sound—that, as they had not asked for them, they could not be held liable to pay for them. Eventually, most of the expense of these police was paid by the government, without admitting liability, with the exception of the amounts claimed by the colliery companies, which they declined to pay. I have no information as to why this distinction was made.

The ground on which the standing joint committee refused to pay the plaintiffs' claim appears in a minute of June 25, 1911, and a letter from their clerk to the secretary of the Glamorgan Coal Co. of June 28, 1911. The minute is in these terms:

"The sub-committee directed the clerk to write repudiating any liability to pay any part of the above claims, and to inform them that, if they expect more than the ordinary protection that the police force of the county is able to give to their property, the committee expects them to do something on their part to protect their special property and interests."

The letter was in these terms :

"With reference to the bills your company sent to the chief constable, amounting to £20,997 11s., for lodging and maintenance of police, which he laid before the committee, I am to remind you of the interview to which your chairman, Mr. D. A. Thomas, was invited on the 18th November last, and which was had at these offices between representatives of the Powell Duffryn company and your company, with your solicitors, and the chairman of the county council and standing joint committee and myself on the special subject of the responsibility for expenses of this nature, which the respective companies suggested that the county should agree to bear, but which the representatives of the county quite distinctly refused to consent to."

That last statement has been found to be wrong by the learned judge, and his finding has not been disputed.

"The committee direct me to say that they decline to pay any part of the above bill or bills that may be presented by the company. Regarding the intimation contained in your letter that the company cannot continue providing for the lodging and maintenance of the police especially engaged in protecting the colliery premises, I am directed to say that the committee considers that it is incumbent on the owners of property to take reasonable precautions for its protection at all times, but most especially when disturbance of the pits is anticipated as a result of ill-feeling that has arisen between such owners and a numerous body of the inhabitants of the district in connection with the contractual relations between them. In the event of damage being done by rioters to your company's machinery I am to draw your attention to the provisions of the Riot (Damages) Act, 1886, which require the tribunal which will decide upon any claim to have regard to the conduct of the claimants and the precautions taken. The committee has imposed upon the ratepayers of the county a burden of very large amount in providing men to guard the property of the company and the collieries connected with them, and they consider that the share of the exceptional expenses that have resulted from the dispute between the company and their allies and the workmen in their collieries, which the company has hitherto incurred in lodging and maintaining some of these men who are more particularly stationed for the garrison or defence of the collieries, is not more than a moderate discharge of the company's duty of protecting their property and interests, and a refusal to do at least this much will compel the committee to consider the provision they are now making."

The letter was not accurate if by police specially engaged in protecting the colliery premises they meant specially requisitioned for that purpose. Both plaintiffs had asked for the services of special police, and had paid for them, and nothing arises in this case as to them. The police in this case had not been sent to the plaintiffs' collieries as special police engaged by the plaintiffs, but as the result of a meeting attended by the officer commanding the troops, the chief constable, stipendiary magistrates, and representatives of the Home Office and the colliery companies, in which these places were pointed out as the most vital points in the collieries which needed protection.

The position taken by the standing joint committee seems to me entirely untenable, and was not insisted on before us. They are the police authority, and have to make proper police arrangements to maintain the peace. If one party to a dispute is threatened with violence by the other party he is entitled to protection from such violence whether his contention in the dispute be right or wrong, and to allow the police authority to deny him protection from that violence unless he pays all the expense, in addition to the contribution which, with other ratepayers, he makes to the support of the police, is only one degree less dangerous than to allow that authority to decide which party is right in the dispute, and grant or

A withhold protection accordingly. There is a moral duty on each party to the dispute to do nothing to aggravate it and to take reasonable means of self-protection, but the discharge of this duty by them is not a condition precedent to the discharge by the police authority of their own duty. The Glamorgan Coal Co. did take some steps to protect themselves, but I have no information as to their extent. As I have said, the ground for non-payment alleged by the standing joint committee was not insisted on; indeed, before BANKES, J., the chairman of the standing joint committee stated that they were willing to pay all expense except that voluntarily undertaken by the plaintiffs, and one main contention at the trial was that all the expense claimed in this action had been so voluntarily incurred. This was decided against the defendants by the learned judge, and his finding was not questioned before us, but the defendants still refused to pay, on the ground that they had no power legally to do so.

C The defendants, on these facts, seem to me to have no defence on the merits, except as to the metropolitan police. With regard to the other aiding police, they have accepted the aiding agreements made by the chief constable, they knew perfectly well that those police were in the county at the invitation of the chief constable, and that, under these circumstances, the expense of housing and feeding them ought to fall on the county, and the request of the plaintiffs to house and feed them was made by the chief constable. If they cannot escape by virtue of some technicality arising from their statutory position, they clearly ought to pay. I do not think they are liable for the expense of the metropolitan police on the short ground that those police were not brought into the county by them or by anyone for whom they were responsible; they were sent by the Home Secretary, and the aiding agreements made by the chief constable were made by him without authority. He knew the provisions of the Act of Parliament under which such agreements were authorised, and believed that these police had not come into the county under those provisions. I have no doubt he acted for the best in the difficult position in which he was placed, but I think he acted without authority.

F This leaves only the question of the aiding police and those belonging to the county of Glamorgan. If the chief constable had authority to bring the aiding police into the county and to make the aiding agreements these two forces are on the same footing, because, under s. 25 of the Police Act, 1890, the aiding force are to be deemed part of the aided force. I think he had such authority. By sub-s. (3) of that section the police authority can delegate their power of making an aiding agreement to the chief constable by general or special order, and such general or special order is not required to be in writing or in any particular form. I think there is evidence upon which it can rightly be found that the standing joint committee in this case had delegated that authority to Captain Lindsay in case of emergency arising between its meetings. The chairman was clearly of that opinion, although he founded his opinion upon a resolution of 1909, which does not seem to go so far as he thought. When these agreements came before the standing joint committee no suggestion was made that the chief constable had in any way exceeded his authority, and the standing joint committee acted upon them, and paid the other police authorities the sums due under them. I think this authority also extended to obtaining the food and lodging which was part of the obligation under the agreements, for in none of them was there any agreement that the sums mentioned therein should include food and lodging; in some they were expressly excluded, and under all of them the aiding force became part of the aided force, and had to be supported like them by the county of Glamorgan. It was not denied that there was ample evidence of ratification, if the standing joint committee could ratify, but I agree with PHILLIMORE, L.J., that the chairman's evidence and the facts stated pointed to an antecedent authority having been conferred on the chief constable to bring aiding police into the county in an emergency, and to make the necessary arrangements for the fulfilment of the resulting obligations of the county.

This only leaves the question whether, under the statutes, the standing joint committee or the county council can be sued upon the agreements made by the chief constable. If, as I think, he had created an obligation upon the county to pay, the question whether it can be enforced by action or otherwise is purely technical, and would, I think, never have been raised but for the fact that the defendants were unwilling to pay, for the untenable reason which I have already mentioned. Still, if it is a good point, they are entitled to the benefit of it. The standing joint committee is a statutory body, and its duties and liabilities are in substitution for those of the justices before the Local Government Act, 1888. Before that Act, the justices under various statutes, chiefly the County Police Act, 1839, and the County and Borough Police Act, 1856, were the police authority, and were charged with the duty of supporting the police force. In order to discharge this duty they could, and did, make contracts for buildings, clothing, &c., for police purposes, and by s. 2 of 21 & 22 Vict., c. 92 [relating to county property], except where otherwise provided for, contracts were made on their behalf by the clerk of the peace, and he could sue or be sued upon them, payment being made out of the county fund. In 1888 the Local Government Act, s. 9, transferred these powers, duties, and liabilities to the quarter sessions and county council jointly, to be exercised by the standing joint committee. By s. 30 (3), any matter relating to the police shall be referred to, and determined by, them, and any expenditure which they determine to be required for the purposes of such matters shall be paid out of the county fund, and the council of the county shall provide for such payment accordingly. It seems to me that, if the duties and liabilities which required the making of contracts before are transferred to the standing joint committee, there must be implied a power of contracting, and this is consistent with s. 25 of the Police Act, 1890, which gives them the power of making a particular kind of contract. It cannot, I think, be a correct construction of this legislation that the standing joint committee had no power of contracting except in the one instance mentioned in that Act. It was necessary to give them that power expressly because it extended beyond the support of their own police.

A more difficult question is: Who is bound by a contract made by them? They are not an incorporated body, it could not have been intended that the members should be personally liable, and they have no seal under which they can contract when a seal is required. In ordinary cases no difficulty arises. The standing joint committee indent, so to speak, for what they want, and the necessary contract is made by the county council, who cannot object to the requirements of the standing joint committee, but there is no provision in the Acts that the county council shall be a party to all their contracts as the clerk of the peace was a party to those of the justices. I think that the agreements mentioned in s. 25 are intended to be contracts of the standing joint committee on their own behalf, and not as agents for the county council, and if that be so, I think that this section, considered in connection with the latter part of s. 30 of the Local Government Act, 1888, points to all contracts made by the standing joint committee being their contracts, payment for which is to be made by the county council. I think that, when the standing joint committee made a contract, by doing so they determined the proper expenditure under that contract, which must be ascertained, in case of dispute, by the ordinary tribunals to be necessary expenditure, and the county council must pay it, but that the contract remained that of the standing joint committee. The question is not, in my opinion, very important, as the same result is obtained in each case, and the only difference is that the form of recovery is by means of a declaration that the standing joint committee are liable for the amount, and an order on the county council to pay it, instead of by means of a direct judgment against the county council.

The result is that the plaintiffs are not, in my opinion, entitled to recover anything in respect of the metropolitan police, but they are entitled to recover such sums as may be found to be expenditure incurred in housing and feeding the

A Glamorgan police and the aiding police, other than the metropolitan, by reason of the request made by the chief constable. Some of the expenditure was said to be for meals supplied, not in consequence of that request, but generally and casually, and, if this be so, that should not be recovered. I have not discussed s. 18 of the County Police Act, 1889, upon which there was so much discussion before us, because I think it deals with matters quite different from those before us. It really only provides that the chief constable is not to be out of pocket by reason of having, either by himself or the constables under him, to make certain necessary expenditure for police duties, and has no relation to a case where expenditure has been incurred by reason of such a request as he has been found in this case to have made. I have also not considered what his position might be with regard to his request to house and feed the metropolitan police. Judgment has been given for him, and there is no appeal against the judgment. I think the plaintiffs were justified in joining the county council as defendants. If they decline to pay, it is necessary to get an order on them to pay, and I think it was convenient to have that question, as well as the liability of the standing joint committee, decided in one action, but I can see no reason for the two bodies being separately represented. The questions to be determined as against the two defendants are exactly the same, and could have been contested on behalf of both by the same solicitors and counsel. I agree with the terms of the order, and the terms as to costs mentioned by PHILLIMORE, L.J.

BRAY, J.—These two actions were brought to recover moneys expended by the two plaintiff colliery companies in housing and feeding police during the coal strike in Glamorganshire, which commenced in November, 1910, and lasted for many months. There were three defendants, the standing joint committee of the Glamorgan Quarter Sessions and the Glamorgan County Council, the county council, and Captain Lindsay, the chief constable of the county. There is, in my opinion, no distinction to be drawn between the two actions. In order to succeed against the first two defendants the plaintiffs had to establish the following propositions: (i) That Captain Lindsay requested the plaintiffs to expend these moneys under circumstances which created an implied promise to pay; (ii) that Captain Lindsay, in making this request, purported or intended to act as agent, and on behalf, of the standing joint committee; (iii) that the standing joint committee had power to authorise Captain Lindsay to make this contract on their behalf; (iv) that they did give him such authority, or, if they did not, they afterwards ratified his acts or are estopped from denying that he had such authority. If these propositions are proved, either the standing joint committee or the county council, or both, are, in my opinion, liable.

A broad distinction has to be drawn between the money expended in reference to the metropolitan police and the money expended in reference to the other police. I will deal first with the latter. As to point (i), the learned judge has found, in terms, for both plaintiffs. The defendants' counsel did not dispute these findings. With regard to point (ii), the learned judge found that the county were not mentioned as the authority who would pay in the conversation at which the requests were made, but with regard to the conversation with Mr. Hann, the manager of the Powell Duffryn company, on Nov. 5, the learned judge finds as follows:

"So far as the conversation related to the police, I am satisfied that Captain Lindsay made the statement he did in his character as chief constable, and believing that he had, or would in due course get, the authority of the standing joint committee for any expenditure that was incurred, and I am also satisfied that, when he directed that any particular body of police (including the metropolitan police) should occupy the Aberaman House accommodation, he was also acting as chief constable, and under the same belief."

In dealing with the conversations between Captain Lindsay and Mr. Llewellyn, the manager of the Glamorgan Company, there is a similar finding of the learned judge. In my opinion, these are findings that Captain Lindsay purported or intended to act as the agent of the standing joint committee, although there was no direct reference made in the conversations to the county. What was in Captain Lindsay's mind the finding clearly shows, and it was demonstrated by the fact that at this time Captain Lindsay was entering into written hiring agreements on behalf of the standing joint committee with other police authorities, binding his committee to pay. What was in the mind of the managers of the collieries is shown by the action they took in sending in accounts. Indeed, so far as the police, other than the metropolitan police, are concerned, there could be no other person or body on whose behalf Captain Lindsay could be acting. I think, therefore, the plaintiffs proved point (ii).

Point (iii) is a question of law, and it was the point mainly argued on behalf of the defendants. It was said that the standing joint committee were a body created by statute, and could have no powers other than those expressly given them by the statute, and s. 18 of the County Police Act, 1839, was referred to as confirming this view. It was said that they had no power to contract, but they might pay the chief constable the reasonable allowances for extraordinary expenses necessarily incurred. The standing joint committee was created by the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 30, and by s. 9 it was enacted that the powers, duties, and liabilities of quarter sessions and of justices out of session with respect to the county police should vest in and attach to the quarter sessions and the county council jointly and be exercised and discharged through the standing joint committee of the quarter sessions and county council, appointed as hereinafter mentioned. By the interpretation clause, s. 100, the expression "powers" includes "rights, jurisdiction, capacities, privileges, and immunities." The "capacities," therefore, of quarter sessions with respect to the county police have to be exercised through the standing joint committee. If, therefore, quarter sessions had the capacity to make contracts with respect to the police, it seems clear that that capacity vested in and attached to quarter sessions and the county council jointly, and had to be exercised through the standing joint committee. I again postpone the consideration of the question whether such contracts were to be in the name of the standing joint committee or in the name of the county council, or in the names of quarter sessions and the county council. In any event, it would seem that the standing joint committee would be the body to negotiate the contracts. Now, had quarter sessions at the time of the passing of the Act of 1888 the capacity to make contracts with reference to the police? They had power to appoint a chief constable (see s. 4 of the County Police Act, 1839); they had power to provide station houses and strong rooms (see s. 12 of the County Police Act, 1840); and by the County and Borough Police Act, 1856, they were empowered to purchase lands for that purpose. It was their duty to supply the police with uniforms, accoutrements, &c. It would have been impossible for them to exercise such powers and to perform such duties unless they had the power of making contracts. It does not seem open to doubt that quarter sessions could make contracts. It follows, therefore, that the standing joint committee could exercise the same power or capacity. Further, by s. 25 of the Act of 1890 express power was given to them to make aiding agreements. These agreements would, or might, involve making contracts for the housing and feeding of the aiding police. There is nothing in s. 18 of the Act of 1839 to negative or limit this power. It was obvious that extraordinary expenses might have to be incurred by the chief constable in carrying out his duties without the opportunity of obtaining instructions from quarter sessions, and the object of s. 18 was to enable quarter sessions to reimburse him for such expenses. In my opinion, the standing joint committee had the capacity to make and ratify the contract which Captain Lindsay purported or intended to make on their behalf.

The fourth and last point is whether the standing joint committee had not, in fact, given Captain Lindsay the authority to make the aiding agreements and to

A contract with the plaintiffs to house and feed the police. The learned judge, after setting out these facts, says :

"It appears to me that the only possible inference to be drawn from those facts is that either all parties considered that power had been delegated to the chief constable to enter into these aiding agreements, or that the standing joint committee approved of his action, and so fully and so entirely treated it as a matter of course that he should enter into these agreements that no reference to them was necessary unless they were for some reason disapproved of."

I entirely agree with this finding. Again, later on in his judgment, after dividing the police into three categories—(a) Glamorgan and county of Somerset police, (b) metropolitan police, (c) all other police—he says :

"I am satisfied, with regard to all these classes, that the expenditure was incurred at the request of Captain Lindsay, and under circumstances from which a promise to pay must be implied. If the doctrine of ratification applies to the standing joint committee, I am satisfied that they did ratify the action of Captain Lindsay in employing all the police (other than the metropolitan police), and in employing them upon the terms that their expenses for board and lodging should be paid by the police authority."

Again, after dealing with the question of the power to ratify, he says :

"As ratification relates back to the time when the act which is ratified was done, it follows that, in my opinion, the position is exactly the same with regard to all the police (other than the metropolitan) as if Captain Lindsay had received antecedent authority from the committee to enter into the aiding agreements. This authority, in my opinion, includes an authority to make the necessary arrangements for housing and feeding the police."

I think it is not material to inquire whether the authority had been given antecedently, or was ratified by conduct afterwards. I think, perhaps, the evidence points rather more to an antecedent authority than to a ratification. The whole conduct of the standing joint committee is overwhelming to show one or the other, and the defendants' counsel were obliged to admit that, if it were the case of a private person instead of a public body, ratification could not be disputed. I know of no distinction between a private person and a public body in such a case, provided always that the public body has the power to contract and that power is not limited by provisions requiring that it shall be exercised in a particular way. I may observe that no point was raised in the pleadings or before us that the power had to be exercised in any particular way.

As I thoroughly agree with these findings of fact of the learned judge and as I have no doubt as to the power of the standing joint committee to make the arrangements which Captain Lindsay made or purported to make on their behalf, and to ratify them if originally made without authority, it follows that the standing joint committee are liable (subject, of course, to an inquiry as to the amount in each case) to the following claims of the Glamorgan company—namely, £4,587, meals and other requisites supplied to the police who succeeded the metropolitan police in the occupation of the rink; £10,328 for meals and other requisites supplied to the police at the different collieries of the Glamorgan company at which they were housed and fed, or fed only, and for so much of the £3,750 for hire of rink as is referable to the police other than the metropolitan police. Counsel for the standing joint committee raised a separate question as to the £10,328, but this, I think, is clearly covered by the learned judge's findings of fact. On the same grounds, the standing joint committee are, in my opinion, liable to the claim of the Powell Duffryn company for £485 subject to an inquiry.

I now come to the much more difficult question of the plaintiffs' claim in respect to the metropolitan police. The learned judge has found that the defendants are liable in respect of these, but on a different ground from that on which he held them liable for the other police. He has found that they were extraordinary expenses necessarily incurred by the chief constable within s. 18 of the County Police Act, 1839, and, although the chief constable has not paid them, nor been held liable for them in these actions, he held that the defendants could be ordered to pay them to the plaintiffs. Having all parties before him he was of opinion that the order could be made to avoid circuity of action. I cannot agree with this. The only cause of action that the plaintiffs can have against the defendants is in respect of money paid under an implied contract by the defendants to repay. Section 18 creates no privity between the plaintiffs and the defendants. In my opinion, the plaintiffs' claim can only succeed if they can show that the defendants are responsible for the request made to the plaintiffs by the chief constable. The plaintiffs have to prove the same four points that they had to prove in the case of the other police. I proceed, therefore, to consider how far they have proved them. [His Lordship considered the evidence and said that the implied promises made by the chief constable covered the feeding and providing for the metropolitan police, and those promises were made by Captain Lindsay in his character of chief constable, and believing that he had, or would in due course get, the authority of the standing joint committee for any expenditure that was incurred, expressly including that of the metropolitan police; what he had already said on the point whether the standing joint committee had the capacity to contract, applied equally to the metropolitan police, for s. 25 of the Police Act, 1890, applied to all police forces, including the metropolitan, the police authority in that case being the Home Secretary; it could not be taken that the chief constable had any antecedent authority from the standing joint committee as regards the metropolitan police, but the plaintiffs had failed to prove that the standing joint committee knew, or ought to have known, the true facts, with the result that he could not find that the committee were estopped from denying that they had authorised or ratified the acts of the chief constable; accordingly, he thought that the appeal succeeded on the question of the liability of the standing joint committee in respect of the cost of the feeding and housing of the metropolitan police.] The last question is what should be the form of the judgments in favour of the plaintiffs as regards the claims in respect of police other than the metropolitan police, and whether it should be against the standing joint committee or against the county council, or both. This must depend partly on whether the promise made by the chief constable was a promise made on behalf of the standing joint committee or on behalf of the county council. The chief constable was not the servant or agent of the county council, and was not purporting to act as such. In my opinion, the promise was made on behalf of the standing joint committee, and it was their contract and not the contract of the county council. First, there is s. 9 of the Act of 1888, to which I have already referred. The powers given by that section are to vest in and attach to the quarter sessions and the county council jointly. They are to be exercised through the standing joint committee. If I am right in holding that "powers" includes the capacity to contract, I think the contract must be either the contract of the standing joint committee or the joint contract of quarter sessions and the county council. It seems impossible to suppose it was to be a joint contract. I think it was the standing joint committee who were to exercise the power of contracting, and the contract would be their contract. I think s. 30 (3), confirms this view. If the contract were to be a contract of the county council, the latter part of the section would be unnecessary and inapplicable. The meaning of this is, as CAVE, J., put it in Re Local Government Act, 1888, Ex parte Somerset County Council (4), that the county council have to pay the bills of the standing joint committee. The latter would have no bills if they could make no contracts. We were referred to s. 64. In my opinion, there is nothing in that section inconsistent with the view I have taken. All property and liabilities, which means existing property and liabilities, of the

A quarter sessions are to vest in the county council, and none in the standing joint committee. That is right, because by s. 30 they are the people to pay; the county council are to levy the rates; the rates produce the funds out of which they are to pay. Then there is s. 81. By sub-s. (4) the joint committees are given, subject to the terms of their delegation, the same power as the council appointing them, and by sub-s. (8) the same section applies to the standing joint committees. I had a doubt whether the sub-section included the standing joint committees appointed under s. 30, or whether it referred only to those appointed under sub-s. (7). There seems no reason for so limiting sub-s. (8), and it would be absurd that the standing joint committee of two or more counties, or county boroughs, should have different powers from those of a single county. If this be so sub-s. (4) gives the standing joint committee the same power of contracting as the quarter sessions and the county council had. Lastly, there is s. 25 of the Police Act, 1890, which gives express power to the police authority (in this case the standing joint committee) to make agreements with other police authorities, and it is out of these very agreements that these claims arise. I do not see how it can be said, having regard to the words of the section, that these aiding agreements were to be made, not with the standing joint committee, but with the county council. Then if the aiding agreements provide, as many of them did here, for the housing and feeding by the aided authority, it necessitates the aided authority entering into contracts for such housing and feeding. Are the aiding agreements to be made with the standing joint committee and the other agreements with the county council? Surely that is impossible. It seems to me that if the legislature had intended that all agreements of whatever kind negotiated by the standing joint committee should be in the name of the county council, it would have been so provided in terms. Mr. Franklen, in his evidence, stated that it was the practice in Glamorganshire to make some agreements (but not agreements of this kind) in the name of the county council, but it does not seem to me that any such practice can be looked at for the purpose of construing the Act, and it is within my own knowledge that in other counties the practice is quite different.

I think the judgment should declare that the standing joint committee are liable to pay all the claims of both plaintiffs in respect of all the police other than the metropolitan police (subject to the inquiry as to the items), and that they are not liable to pay the claims in respect of the metropolitan police. As regards the county council they were, in my opinion, proper parties to this action, for two reasons—one, because they, as the paymasters, are the persons really interested, and the other because I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to an order that the county council should pay to the plaintiffs the sums for which the standing joint committee are found to be liable. I do not feel pressed by the concluding words of s. 30 of the Act of 1888. If the standing joint committee enter into a contract they, by that very act, determine that their liabilities under that contract are an expenditure required for the purpose of the matters mentioned in the section. If there is any dispute between them and the other parties to the contract about the amount of liability that dispute has to be decided by the ordinary tribunal—namely, a court of law. If the standing joint committee incur debts or liabilities in relation to matters referred to them the county council must pay them. I am sorry that the standing joint committee and the county council should have severed in their defences and incurred the great cost of appearing by separate solicitors and separate counsel. The interest of the two bodies was precisely the same and the course they have taken is quite wrong, but I suppose the unfortunate ratepayers will have to pay these double costs. There is another point on which I should like to express an opinion. The real reason for the refusal of the county council to pay these claims seems to have been that they thought the colliery proprietors ought to pay for having the lives of their employees and their property protected. The colliery proprietors have to pay rates like other persons and have a right to have the same protection as other persons living and owning property in the county. I agree with what has been said by PHILLIMORE. A L.J., as to costs.

HUNT v. RICHARDSON

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Darling, Bray, A. T. Lawrence, Scrutton and Avory, J.J.),

Food—Milk—Deficiency in fat—Deficiency due to cows being fed on "watery" grass—No interference with milk after it came from cow—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict., c. 63), s. 6.

A purchaser who demanded "new milk each morning" or "new morning milk" was supplied by the farmer who produced the milk with milk from cows that had been milked that morning which milk was deficient in milk fat to the extent of nine per cent. Nothing had been added to or abstracted from the milk by the farmer or his servants, the deficiency in milk fat being due to the fact that owing to heavy rains in recent months there had been an unusually heavy growth of "watery" grass on the farmer's farm and after the farmer's cows had been fed on it they produced a much larger quantity than usual of milk which, however, was of a poorer quality. On a prosecution of the farmer under s. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 [now s. 2 (1) of the Food and Drugs Act, 1955] for selling to the prejudice of the purchaser milk which was not of the nature, substance and quality demanded by him,

Held by DARLING, J., A. T. LAWRENCE, J., and AVORY, J., BRAY, J., and SCRUTTON, J., dissenting: as the milk, when sold, was the morning product of healthy cows in its natural condition and had had nothing added to or abstracted from it, it was genuine new milk, and the prosecution failed.

Case Stated by justices for the borough of Cambridge.

An information was preferred by Ernest Richardson, the respondent, under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 6 [see now Food and Drugs Act, 1955, s. 2 (1)], against John Hunt, the appellant, for that on Sept. 9, 1915, at the borough of Cambridge he did unlawfully sell to the prejudice of the purchaser, one David Cox, a certain article of food, to wit, milk, of which a sample was taken by the respondent as an inspector under the Food and Drugs Acts at the place of delivery in the course of delivery to the purchaser and consigned in pursuance of a contract of sale to such purchaser, which milk was deficient in milk fat to the extent of nine per cent. and was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded.

At the hearing of the information it was proved or admitted that the appellant was a farmer and cowkeeper living on a farm three miles from Cambridge. He had kept cows there for twenty-five years, and it was his practice to sell all his milk to retail dealers. On Sept. 9, 1915, he had a herd of forty-one good Shorthorn cows, of which twenty-eight were then giving milk. The cows were under the charge of three men, all of whom were competent and experienced in the management and milking of cows. These men milked the cows and no one else interfered with the milk in any way at any time before the sale to the respondent. The cows were milked twice daily—at 5 a.m. and 1 p.m. The cows were milked into pails and the milk was poured from the pails into another pail from which it was strained into churns. When the quantity of milk ordered by each customer had been poured into the churn intended for that customer, all the churns were put into a cart and driven into Cambridge by one of the appellant's men and delivered to the customers. Nothing was added to or abstracted from the milk by the appellant or his servants beyond the abstraction of impurities by the straining. The morning milking was done rather hurriedly. Beyond the mixing required for making up the quantity needed in each churn, there was no general mixing of all the morning milk. In consequence of the heavy rains in the previous July and August the growth of grass on the appellant's farm on Sept. 9 was "phenomenal in quantity," but it was in a watery condition, and the appellant's cows being fed on it had given a much larger quantity of milk than usual. The cows were given 3 lb. of cake each per day throughout this season of the year, which was the usual allowance in normal circumstances, and no special steps were taken to counteract the effect on the quality of the milk of the watery state of the herbage or to test by technical means the effect of the watery herbage on the milk. The appellant and his men were well aware of what was taking place, and in spite of this, shortly before Sept. 9, the cows were given green maize, which was even more watery, in order to keep up the quantity of milk. The quality of milk is affected by the quantity, and also by the state of health of the animal, the method of milking and the manner of feeding, and the time that elapses between successive milkings. If cows are not thoroughly milked out on any occasion the quality of the milk at that particular milking is poorer. One of the appellant's customers in Cambridge was a retail dealer named Cox. On Sept. 9 the appellant's man drove a churn to Cox's premises and was there met by the respondent, who informed him that he was an inspector and intended to take a sample of the milk then in course of delivery. The respondent then stirred up the milk in the churn, and took a pint of milk, which he divided into three parts, one part of which he had analysed. The analyst certified that the milk was deficient in milk fat to the extent of nine per cent. The respondent had taken samples of the appellant's milk before and had found them genuine. Milk taken from a healthy herd and mixed should not show less than three per cent. of milk fat. Under the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901, issued by the Board of Agriculture, where a sample of milk contains less than three per cent. of milk fat it shall be presumed for the purposes of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act until the contrary is proved that the milk is not genuine by reason of the abstraction therefrom of milk fat or the addition thereto of water [see now Sale of Milk Regulations, 1939, regs. 1 and 2].

For the respondent it was contended that new milk deficient in milk fat to the extent of nine per cent. was an article of food which was not in accordance with the nature, substance, and quality demanded, and although the appellant had supplied it as it came from the cows he had not used proper care in regard to the abnormal conditions prevailing at the time in feeding the cows, but had

A endeavoured to get quantity without quality, and that, while the milk from a single cow might give less than three per cent. of milk fat, it was most improbable that the milk from a herd if properly mixed would do so. For the appellant it was contended that the milk was genuine milk as it came from the cows; that the cows had been properly milked; that morning milk was poorer in quality than afternoon milk; that the condition of this milk, which was morning milk, was due to the abnormal condition of the pastures; that, even if the appellant had fed the cows in a particular way so as to obtain a large quantity of milk, that was no offence, provided that he showed that the milk was supplied as it came from the cow, and that it was not of such poor quality as not to be legal milk at all, and that a mere deficiency of nine per cent. of milk fat did not warrant the justices in finding that this particular milk was not in fact milk. The justices were of opinion that the milk was deficient in fat to the amount of nine per cent., but that it was as it had come from the cows without abstraction or addition. They found that the deficiency in milk fat was due to the manner in which the appellant had fed his cows with the object of obtaining a very large supply of milk without regard to quality, and they held that the milk was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded. They, therefore, held that the offence was proved, and they convicted the appellant, fining him 40s.

The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 6, provided:

"No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food, or any drug, which is not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by such purchaser, under a penalty not exceeding £20. . . ."

Cur. adv. vult.

June 2, 1916. The following judgments were read.

DARLING, J.—The facts stated in this case as having been found by the justices, together with the justices' decision upon them, raise the question whether it is an offence against the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, to sell as new milk the natural product of the morning milk of several cows, such liquid being not otherwise than wholesome and pure, exactly as it was drawn from the cows.

In my opinion, the statute in question, as well as the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, [repealed] and the regulations made thereunder by the Board of Agriculture were designed to prevent the sale of milk "not genuine" or "injurious to health" even if genuine. This is to be gathered from the words of the Act of 1899, and from the Sale of Milk Regulations, 1901, as well as from the preamble of the Act of 1875. I do not think that these statutes were intended to provide a standard regulating the proportions in which various matters must be present in a natural product to justify the sale of it by its market name. "Genuine" does not mean rich, nor poor, nor thick, nor thin. The very case which we are considering shows that the evening milk from these same cows would have better satisfied the analytical test than that drawn in the morning, and it might, therefore, be possible to convince a chemist, and perhaps a court of law, that the evening draught was genuine milk and also the morning draught if qualified by the prefix "morning." So far as s. 6 of the Act of 1875 is concerned with milk, I think that it makes it an offence to sell milk not in its natural state, be it rich or poor, but with some alteration of its "nature, substance, or quality" due to the addition of something. This view is strengthened by consideration of the various subsections of s. 6. I think it is also worth while to observe that although the statute of 1899 deals with "impoverished" milk and other articles when imported, and enacts a standard for some of these articles, it nowhere gives any indication as to what are the proper proportions in which the natural ingredients should be present in milk. That statute, as it seems to me, would have provided the very occasion for creating the offence now contended for, had the legislature desired to decree it.

All the reasoning of the Lords of the Court of Session in deciding Scott v. Jack (2) is equally applicable to this case. They expressly stated that in their view Smithies v. Bridge (3) was wrongly decided. As to that, my own opinion may be thought not free from prepossession, but I am confirmed in it by a passage in the judgment of LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., delivered after my own, wherein he says ([1902] 2 K.B. at p. 20) :

"As to the recent order of the Board of Agriculture, I do not think it purports to set up a standard of what is or is not genuine milk, but only means to say that the want of a certain percentage of fat is to be prima facie evidence that the milk is not genuine, and it will still be open to the defendant to prove that the milk is genuine."

But the regulation which LORD ALVERSTONE quotes seems to me to lead to quite another conclusion, if only it be read to the end, for the word "genuine" is in the regulation amplified or explained by these words immediately following it, "by reason of the abstraction therefrom of milk fat or the addition thereto of water." Now, what should it profit the defendant to disprove that presumption, if he might yet be held guilty merely because he had milked his cow in the morning, or had allowed her to indulge too far her taste for aqueous herbage in pastures new? I think that this appeal should be allowed.

BRAY, J. (read by SCRUTTON, J.).—This was a Case stated by magistrates. The appellant was charged with having sold milk deficient in milk fat, and not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser contrary to the provisions of s. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. He was convicted, and the question for the court is whether, having regard to the findings of fact in the case, he was rightly convicted.

The main point raised by the appellant was that, in the case of milk from a healthy cow, if it were proved or found as a fact that the milk sold was milk which had come from the cow without any abstraction or addition, no offence against s. 6 can have been committed. It was further contended that, if the first point failed, the appellant still ought not to have been convicted on the facts stated in the Case. The Case came, in the first instance, before RIDLEY, J., AVORY, J., and myself, and, as we were asked by the appellant's counsel to overrule the decision of Smithies v. Bridge (3) and to adopt the decision of the Scottish Court in Scott v. Jack (2)—in other words, to decide that if the milk is genuine and unadulterated no offence can have been committed—it seemed to us that it ought to be referred to a full court as being a point of general importance and of considerable difficulty. Accordingly, the case was argued before us on April 17, when we reserved our judgment.

In my opinion, our decision on this main point must turn on the true construction of s. 6 of the Act of 1875. The important words of that section are :

"No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, under a penalty not exceeding £20."

The article ordered or demanded by the purchaser in this case was new milk each morning. Nothing turns upon the word "new," but something may turn upon the word "morning," as there was evidence that the morning milk is apt to be less rich in fat than afternoon milk. No particular quality was demanded, and the first question that arises is: What quality was the purchaser entitled to? This was a sale of goods by description, and seems to me clearly to come within the provisions of s. 14 (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, which is as follows :

"Where goods are bought by description from a seller who deals in goods of that description (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be of merchantable quality."

A I may observe that this was not new law. The cases decided before the Act of 1893 established that this was part of the common law. It is clear that the appellant was a seller who dealt in goods described as milk. If that be so, the quality demanded was merchantable quality. I think that in his reply his leading counsel admitted this, but I prefer to examine the contentions to the contrary put forward on the part of the appellant and the cases that have been decided on the point.

B First it was said that, at all events, as regards milk and any other natural product, there could be no offence if the article was pure and unadulterated. Reliance was placed on certain words in the preamble of the Act of 1875: "and that the law regarding the sale of food and drugs in a pure and genuine condition should be amended." But if the words in the Act itself are clear and unambiguous their meaning cannot be altered by the preamble. The word "quality" seems to be quite unambiguous. As regards drugs, this point was decided in Knight v. Bowers (4). In giving judgment in that case A. L. SMITH, J., said (14 Q.B.D. at p. 848):

C "I cannot escape from the terms of s. 6; and though I doubt whether the legislature meant to include the case of a man selling an article pure and unadulterated, but other than the article demanded by the purchaser, I can only say that they have included that case."

D That case was decided in the year 1885. It has never been questioned since, and though the Act of 1875 has been amended more than once, the wording of s. 6 has not been altered. This decision was in reference to a drug, but the words "of the nature, substance, and quality" apply also to any article of food. Nor can it make any difference whether such article is a natural product or not. Take another natural product, such as fruit. Could it be said that unripe or overripe fruit was of the quality demanded. In quite a recent case—Anness v. Givrell (5)—it was held that "quality" in s. 6 meant the commercial quality of the article sold. LORD READING, C.J., said ([1915] 3 K.B. at p. 691): "Quality means commercial quality, not the commercial description of the article." DARLING, J., said (ibid. at p. 693): "It is not equivalent to such a word as 'kind'." And LUSH, J., said (ibid. at p. 694) that if the article sold "was of the nature and substance and yet was not of the quality demanded an offence has been committed." I can come to no other conclusion than that under the Act of 1875 any article of food, whether natural product, such as milk, or artificial product, such as bread, must be of the quality demanded and that it is no answer to say that it is genuine and not adulterated.

G Then has the law been altered as regards milk by the Act of 1899? Section 4 provided that the Board of Agriculture might make regulations for determining what deficiency in any of the normal constituents of genuine milk should for the purposes of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts raise a presumption that the milk was not genuine or was injurious to health. The regulation made in 1901 provided that milk containing less than three per cent. of milk fat or less than 8·7 per cent. of non-fatty solids should be presumed not to be genuine. It is impossible to read this section or the order made under it as altering in any way the provisions of s. 6 of the Act of 1875. It merely affected the mode of proof, and provided that, if the ingredients of the milk did not reach the particular standard, it should be presumed until the contrary was proved that the milk was not genuine. I think that the word "genuine" means unadulterated, and that s. 4 of the Act of 1899 gives some colour to the contention that if the milk is genuine no offence has been committed, but it cannot alter the plain meaning of the words in s. 6 of the Act of 1875.

H Nor indeed was it so contended before us. It remains, therefore, that the milk must be of the quality demanded, and if no particular quality was demanded, as here, that the milk must be of merchantable quality. What is the meaning of the word "merchantable" in relation to milk? Counsel for the appellant contended that if the milk was genuine it must be merchantable, of however poor quality. On what ground is that contention put forward? He did not tell us. What is merchantable and what is not merchantable is a pure question of fact to be determined by the evidence of those who deal in the article, sellers and buyers. It is not a question of law at all. As soon as the quality gets lower than a certain point the article ceases to be merchantable. If the article be milk it ceases to be saleable as ordinary milk. I do not think that the standard of three per cent. set up by the Board of Agriculture implies that milk below that standard is not of merchantable quality, but the fact that that standard exists and that anyone selling milk below that standard runs the risk of prosecution, I have no doubt seriously affects the saleability of milk below that standard, and it may be in the opinion of sellers and buyers who know its real quality unsaleable. If a farmer advertised that he fed his cows so as to increase the quantity of milk at the expense of its quality and that in consequence it might not reach the standard of the Board of Agriculture, who would buy it as milk to be retailed at the ordinary way?

But, however that may be, it cannot be said as a matter of law that, however poor the milk may be, it must be of merchantable quality if it is genuine. If I am right in this conclusion Scott v. Jack (2) is wrong, and, in my opinion, it is wrong. I think the learned judges in that case were possibly misled by the arguments of counsel who supported the conviction. Their contention was that if the milk fell below the standard set up by the Board of Agriculture an offence had been committed, however genuine the milk was. The information was based on this contention. The court was quite right, in my opinion, in rejecting that contention. But they were wrong when they decided, as I think they did decide, that if the milk was genuine, i.e., not adulterated, no offence could have been committed. I think the judgment of CHANNELL, J., in Smithies v. Bridge (3) was right. He held that if the article sold as milk was not milk (by which I have no doubt he meant "not milk in the commercial sense") it was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded. I think perhaps LORD ALVERSTONE laid too much stress upon the abnormal treatment of the cows. That, in my opinion, did not of itself make the milk not merchantable milk, though it was evidence of it. I think the decision in Smithies v. Bridge (3) was right. The magistrates found as a fact that the milk was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded, and there is evidence to support the finding. The principle of law laid down in that case was followed in Wolfenden v. McCulloch (1), though the facts and findings of the magistrates being different, the conviction was quashed. LORD ALVERSTONE expressly adhered to what he had stated in Smithies v. Bridge (3), and neither of the other learned judges dissented from the judgments in that case. My answer to the main point is that Smithies v. Bridge (3) was rightly decided. Scott v. Jack (2) was wrongly decided. An offence may have been committed, although the milk is genuine and unadulterated.

I come, therefore, to the second point. I have to consider the facts and findings in this case. The magistrates have found as a fact that the milk was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded, but they have based their decision upon the finding that the deficiency in milk fat was due to the manner in which the appellant fed his cows with the object of obtaining a very large supply of milk without regard to its quality. I do not think they have addressed themselves to the real point—viz., whether the milk was merchantable milk. I think the case ought to go back to them to find this fact. As I have already said, this is a question of fact. It may well be that the fact that there was a deficiency of milk fat to the extent of nine per cent. makes the milk unsaleable as ordinary milk in the trade, or that it makes it unsaleable if in addition it is known to the buyer that this deficiency has been caused by the deliberate and abnormal treatment of the cow. On the other hand, it may be that in the trade milk however

A deficient in milk fat or milk solids, however caused, is saleable as milk provided that it is not adulterated, though I should be very much surprised if this were the fact. It must be remembered that for the purpose of deciding whether the milk is merchantable or not it must be assumed that the purchaser knows the facts, and, as I have said, it is extremely unlikely that a man knowing the facts would buy such milk to sell again for human consumption.

B It was said that if the magistrates have to find whether milk is merchantable they have a very difficult task, and one bench of magistrates may differ from another in their finding; but in respect to all goods sold without any special warrant the task is one which judges and juries have often to discharge and on which they may differ. But that is no answer. It may be a very good reason why the legislature should ask the Board of Agriculture to fix a standard and enact that all milk below the standard should not be considered as of merchantable quality. Provided the standard is fairly fixed so as to exclude milk from abnormal cows or cows treated abnormally, as well as adulterated milk, it would be very greatly to the advantage of both the producer and the consumer. There is no reason why the farmer who feeds his cows in such a way as to reduce the quality of the milk should not be prevented from selling such milk to customers who are ignorant of all the facts. The customer suffers just as much as if the quality were reduced by the addition of water. The whole object of the Act is to protect the consumer. If Scott v. Jack (2) is good law the consumer is not protected, even if the farmer has deliberately reduced the quality of the milk. In point of morality, I cannot distinguish between that case and the case where he adds water. It is said that there are cows which naturally give milk below the standard fixed by the Board of Agriculture. This may be so, but the sooner they are sent to the butcher the better. The keeping of such cows should not be encouraged. The customers ought not to suffer.

E I think the case should go back to the magistrates. They have found that the milk was genuine, but they have not expressly found whether it was of merchantable quality or not. They ought not to find in this case that the milk was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded unless they are satisfied that the milk is not of merchantable quality.

I
A. T. LAWRENCE, J. (read by AVORY, J.).—In this case it is found as a fact that the milk in question was when sold the morning product in its natural condition of a herd of good cows. It had nothing abstracted from it or added to it. It was genuine new milk. There was no suggestion that it was injurious to health. The only thing said against it was that according to the certificate of an analyst it did not contain quite three per cent. of butter fats. This was said to be due to the fact that the cows had fed upon herbage described as "washy"; and the "washy" herbage was said to be due to an unusually wet season. The statute the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, does not enact any standard of quality in milk, nor does the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, or the regulations made thereunder. Every species of cow differs in the quality of its milk, and it is probable that every cows differs slightly from day to day in the quality of the milk it produces. The regulations of 1901 when they prescribed three per cent. of butter fats as a test of genuineness seemed to have foreseen the facts of this case and to have provided a defence which this appellant has established. He satisfied the justices that the deficiency in butter fats shown by the certificate was not due to any addition to or abstraction from the milk, but that he was selling as "new milk" that which was in fact recently taken from a healthy cow. The justices appear to have convicted the appellant because he knew that the condition of the herbage would cause the cows to give a very large supply of milk, and continued to feed them on it without regard to its effect upon the quality of the milk. This does not constitute an offence. Section 6 is not aimed at the use of milk-producing foods.

still less at the dairy-keeper's not taking steps to counteract the natural effects of changes of climate. I think the appeal should be allowed.

SCRUTTON, J.—This Special Case, which in view of the differences of opinion between the English and Scottish courts and among English judges themselves, is brought before a court of five judges, raises questions of some difficulty as to the sale of milk. Hunt was summoned for selling milk not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchaser; the magistrates have found that the milk was not of the nature, substance, and quality so demanded, and have convicted him. They have, however, found that he did not abstract anything from or add anything to the milk after it left the cow. They apparently rest the conviction on a statement of the analyst that the milk is deficient in milk fat to the extent of nine per cent., a figure which is reached by comparing 2·73 per cent., the actual percentage of milk fat in the milk in question, with three per cent., a figure contained in certain regulations of the Board of Agriculture, as to which the Case finds that milk taken from a healthy herd and mixed should show not less than three per cent. of milk fat. They also seemed to have been influenced by a finding that the deficiency in milk fat was due to the manner in which the appellant had fed his cows with the object of obtaining a very large supply of milk without regard to its quality. Shortly and barely stated, the contention of the appellant appeared to be that when the vendor had admittedly neither added to nor abstracted from a natural product he could not be convicted of an offence against s. 6 of the Act of 1875, which really only dealt with adulteration. The contention of the respondents was that the offence under s. 6 was selling an article not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded, and adulteration was only relevant as one of the ways of proving this offence, but whether the article was or was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded was a question of fact for the magistrates and that there was evidence in this case on which they could find as they had done.

The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, repealed all previous Acts, but did not confine itself to codifying and consolidating them; it amended them. The special occasion of its enactment, as stated by GRANTHAM, J., in Pain v. Boughtwood (6) (24 Q.B.D. at p. 355), was the necessity of making clear when knowledge was or was not an ingredient in the offence. But opportunity was taken widely to vary the language of the Acts amended. I do not find that the expression "nature, substance, and quality" occurs in any earlier Act. The nearest words to it in the previous statute—the Act, passed in 1872, relating to the adulteration of food and drugs—are "every person who shall sell as unadulterated any article of food or drink which is adulterated," and these words are pointedly omitted in the Act of 1875. That Act has three classes of offences: (i) mixing in articles of food or drugs ingredients which make them injurious to health and selling such articles so mixed (ss. 3, 4, and 5) [see s. 1 (1) of Food and Drugs Act, 1955]; (ii) abstracting from articles of food any part so as injuriously to affect its substance, quality, or nature, or by selling such articles so treated (s. 9) [s. 1 (2) of Act of 1955]; (iii) selling any article of food or drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchaser, with certain exceptions (s. 6) [s. 2 of Act of 1955]. This offence, by s. 2 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Amendment Act, 1879, is committed if the article is defective in nature, substance, or quality. The true construction of s. 6 is of considerable public importance, as under it the great majority of prosecutions under the Act are instituted. It will be seen that while adding or abstracting so as to cause injury to health, are specifically dealt with in ss. 3 and 9, nothing is said about addition or abstraction in the definition of the offence in s. 6, though certain additions are excused in the exceptions to that section. It seems, therefore, to be clear that if the article sold is not of the nature, or substance, or quality demanded, it is immaterial that the vendor has not

A adulterated or tampered with it. For that reason the English Court in Knight v. Bowers (4) convicted a man of supplying unadulterated saffron when saffron was asked for, it not being of the nature and substance demanded. MATHEW, J., said that the preamble to the Act of 1875 did not show that every subsequent action was to be limited to adulteration and adulteration only, and A. L. SMITH, J., doubting whether the legislature meant to include the case of a man selling an article pure and unadulterated, but other than the article demanded by the purchaser, held that they had included that case. This decision is clear authority, unless it is overruled, for the proposition that it is an offence under s. 6 to supply an article not of the nature demanded, though the article is a natural product with nothing taken away or added by the vendor. Indeed, this is only what the statute says in plain words. On the other hand, where the substance sold, though not technically that demanded is generally known to the trade and public by the description demanded, no offence is committed. Thus in Sandys v. Rhodes (7) a sort of tapioca known to the trade and the public as sago and supplied as sago, and in Anderson v. Bitcher (8) cane sugar from Mauritius supplied in answer to a demand for "Demerara sugar" and found to possess the qualities now connoted to the trade and to the public by the term "Demerara sugar," were held of the nature, substance, and quality demanded.

I should take it to be an offence to supply, under a demand for milk or cow's milk, ass's or goat's milk; and I notice that DARLING, J., in Smithies v. Bridge (3) said ([1902] 2 K.B. at p. 18):

"I understand by the word milk, cow's milk; and I do not think that a person asking for milk would expect to get ass's milk or that of any other animal."

I gather that he would have convicted a vendor of milk who supplied ass's milk of supplying goods not of the nature demanded, though he had added nothing to or abstracted nothing from the natural product. The same view would apply to a man supplying chicory in answer to a demand for coffee, plaice in answer to a demand for soles, margarine with no butter in it in answer to a demand for butter. He has not supplied goods of the nature demanded, whether he has adulterated the goods supplied or not. It is not necessary to consider here what meaning "substance" has as distinct from "nature." Perhaps Reginald Picard of Stamford, who was convicted at the Fair of St. Ives in 1275 (see SELECT PLEAS IN MANORIAL COURTS, Selden Society, 1889, at p. 139), for selling a ring of brass for 5½d., saying that the ring was of the purest gold, and that he and a one-eyed man found it in the churchyard of St. Ives near the cross, could be convicted at the present day, among other offences, of selling an article not of the substance demanded.

There remains the word "quality." Again, it appears that a vendor commits an offence who sells an article not of the quality demanded, whether he has added anything to or taken anything from the article he sells. Where natural products are sold as "firsts" or "seconds" according to quality, it would be, in my view, an offence to sell seconds when asked for firsts, though nothing had been done to the seconds by the vendor. This would apply to different qualities of coal or of eggs. A man who asked for new laid eggs and received cooking eggs—as those terms are understood in the market—would be convicted of supplying goods not of the quality demanded, though he had not adulterated the eggs by addition or abstraction. On the meaning of the word "quality" we have the guidance of the court in Anness v. Grivell (5). LORD READING, C.J., says ([1915] 3 K.B. at p. 691):

"Quality means commercial quality and not the commercial description of the article."

DARLING, J., says (ibid. at p. 693):

"I quite agree that the word quality means the commercial quality and is not equivalent to such a word as 'kind.' I do not think we can limit it to the sort of use suggested on behalf of the appellant in the illustration that a purchaser would ask for Scotch or Irish, Lowland or Highland whisky. I think it means quality in the sense which my Lord has indicated."

LUSH, J., agrees and contrasts the most expensive and best quality with the cheapest and inferior quality. If this is so, the question for the magistrates in this case would be, was the article supplied of the nature, substance, and commercial quality demanded by the purchaser? This would be a question of fact for the magistrates.

This and the questions they have to consider have been laid down in numerous cases. In Pashler v. Stevenitt (9) gin was supplied containing seventy per cent. of water, forty-four degrees under proof. There was evidence that gin was sold of a strength down to twenty degrees below proof. A witness said he would describe the article supplied as "gin whose alcoholic strength was very low." The magistrates convicted, and the High Court said (35 L.T. 864):

"The justices have come to the conclusion that this mixture is not of the quality of gin as known commercially . . . it is impossible for us to say they were wrong."

That case was followed in Webb v. Knight (10). The purchaser asked for gin, and being told there was gin at 2s. a pint and gin at 1s. 4d. a pint, selected the latter. A spirit 43 per cent. under proof was supplied. The magistrate convicted, and the High Court upheld the decision. MELLOR, J., said (2 Q.B.D. at p. 535):

"I agree with the observations of the judges in Pashler v. Stevenitt (9) that the question whether the article is that demanded by the purchaser is one of fact for the justices . . . the appellant was at liberty to prove that gin like his own was commonly sold in the neighbourhood."

LUSH, J., said (ibid.):

"I think it must always be a question for the magistrates whether the amount of dilution is in excess of what is reasonable, or in other words it was for them to say what quantity of water a purchaser may reasonably expect to find mixed with gin."

Parliament then by the Act of 1879, s. 6, helped the magistrates by providing it should be a good defence to prove that the admixture of water had not reduced the spirit more than thirty-five per cent. under proof for gin. But in cases where Parliament has not provided a statutory standard for the magistrates, the prosecution must provide evidence to show that the article supplied is not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded. Thus in Roberts v. Leeming (11) dealing with margarine the court, while differing on the facts, agreed on the law.

"The justices had to make their own standard according to the evidence before them and to say was this article in accordance with the standard or not."

In White v. Bywater (12) the demand was for tincture of opium, which, says A. L. SMITH, J., is the article known in commerce as "tincture of opium"; and, as the article supplied, though a tincture of opium, was of very inferior substance and quality to tincture of opium of commerce, the conviction was upheld. In the arsenic-in-beer case, Goulder v. Rook (13), the judgment of the court concludes ([1901] 2 K.B. at p. 298):

"I must not be understood to suggest that every accidental introduction of deleterious matter into an article sold for food of necessity makes it different in nature, substance, and quality from the article demanded. It is for the magistrates in each case to find whether in fact the article supplied is of the nature, substance, and quality demanded."

A At this stage, applying the above remarks to the construction of s. 6 in regard to milk, it would seem that the magistrates have to find as a fact on evidence whether the article supplied is of the nature, substance, and quality demanded. They must ascertain the terms of the demand, interpreting those terms by evidence as to their commercial meaning when necessary, and by the implied warranties following from s. 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, reasonable fitness for consumption as human food under sub-s. (1), and merchantable quality, if the goods are brought by description, under sub-s. (2). They must then find as a fact whether the article supplied complies with the demand so interpreted. Before seeing how far this statement of the law is consistent with the cases on milk it is necessary to deal with the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, and the regulations made thereunder. Section 4 empowers the Board of Agriculture to make regulations for determining what deficiency in any of the normal constituents of milk or what proportion of water in milk shall raise a presumption until the contrary is proved that the milk is not genuine or is injurious to health. Regulation 1 of the regulations of 1901 made under this section provides that less than three per cent. of milk fat or 8·5 per cent. of milk solids other than fat raises a presumption that the milk is not genuine, by reason of abstraction of milk fat or solids other than milk fat or the addition thereto of water. It will be observed (i) that the regulation is not directed to injury to health as mentioned in s. 4 of the Act of 1901, or ss. 1, 2, and 9 of the Act of 1875; (ii) that there is an enactment in terms making it an offence to sell milk which is not "genuine," but that genuine must be used as equivalent to "of the nature, substance, or quality demanded." The only place where the word genuine is used in the preamble of the Act of 1875, where the words "pure and genuine" are used together, presumably having different meanings; (iii) that the only effect of the regulation is in the case of milk containing a smaller percentage of milk fat than the regulation to throw the burden of proof that nothing has been abstracted or added on the vendor; (iv) that if the vendor proves that nothing has been abstracted or added the prosecution under s. 6 must then prove that the article is not of the nature, substance, or quality demanded in some other way, or fail: they may, for instance, prove that the article sold as cow's milk is really goat's milk; (v) that if the vendor does not prove that nothing is abstracted or added there is a presumption that the milk is not genuine in the sense explained, i.e., not of the nature, substance, or quality demanded, and the vendor can be convicted; (vi) that the Act of 1899 and the regulation create no new offence, but only deal with burden of proof. The offence is still that of the Act of 1875, selling an article not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded.

I now proceed to consider the cases decided by the English and Scottish courts as to milk. In Davidson v. M'Leod (14) the majority of the High Court of Justiciary, four judges against two, held in a case of sale of cream (i) in the case of two of the majority that the article supplied must be deficient in nature, substance and quality, (ii) the case of all the majority that the official purchaser could not be prejudiced so that there was no offence under s. 6 in the case of an official purchaser. The two judges who took view (i) also held that you could not convict under s. 6 unless there was adulteration. The two judges who dissented held that the sheriff had found deficiency of quality as a fact, and they could not interfere. This view of the majority which made the Act a dead letter was dissented from by the English court in Hoyle v. Hitchman (15), and the legislature by the Act of 1879 gave statutory authority to the view of the English court. But in Hoyle v. Hitchman (15), LUSH, J., pointed out that the actual decision in Davidson v. M'Leod (14) might be supported, because, while the unadulterated cream was of an inferior quality to that ordinarily sold in Glasgow, "cream is not an article having any standard of quality. This was genuine cream though of inferior quality. It appears to me that the sale in such a case was not an offence within the Act at all." It is possible that the word "genuine" in the Act of 1899 came from the judgment. Whether there is a standard of quality for cream implied in asking for cream is, in my view, a question of fact and evidence, not of law. If there was a commercial standard of cream or merchantable cream, I think an offence would be committed in supplying cream below that standard though no adulteration took place. If no evidence is given of any standard of quality the prosecution would apparently fail, unless on similar lines to R. v. Field, etc., Justices, Ex parte White (16) and Shortt v. Robinson (17), as limited by Preston v. Redfern (18), the magistrates were allowed for some reason to act either on their own knowledge or on documents not admissible as evidence. I note that LUSH, J., expressly declined to decide whether the Scottish judges were right in holding that s. 6 applies only to an admixture of foreign ingredients. He says also (4 Q.B.D. at p. 241):

"I do not decide whether if a person sold Indian rice when he was asked for Carolina rice such a case as that would be within the section."

I think it is admitted that it would be.

In Lane v. Collins (19) a seller was asked for milk and supplied skimmed milk, sixty per cent. deficient in butter fat. The magistrate dismissed the summons. MATHEW, J., and DAY, J., affirmed his decision on the ground that it was not shown that what was supplied was not what according to the ordinary use of the term a purchaser might reasonably have expected to get from the vendor under the designation of milk. If this decision proceeds on the ground that the analyst's certificate was not sufficient evidence of a commercial standard, I understand it though I cannot agree with it; if on any other ground I do not understand it and respectfully dissent from it. But the Act of 1899 and regulation of 1901 appear to deprive it of any effect, as under that statute on a sale of skimmed milk a vendor will not be able to prove that he has not abstracted milk fat, and so may have difficulty in overcoming the statutory presumption.

In 1900, in Banks v. Wooler (20), the analyst's certificate found ten per cent. of water added and the magistrates found the milk exceptionally good and held it was inexpedient to inflict any punishment. The court (CHANNELL and BRICKNILL, JJ.) remitted the case with the intimation that if the milk was exceptionally good after adulteration the magistrates might consider the offence too trifling to convict, but if the milk was only exceptionally good before adulteration the offence was not trifling, and the magistrates should convict. I should have thought the question was whether the milk was of the nature, substance, and quality demanded—that milk and water might not be a substance of the nature demanded, or it might be that the resultant fluid was not of the quality demanded, and the magistrates should have been asked to decide the question. This view agrees with that of the court in Goulder v. Rook (13).

In Smithies v. Bridge (3) new milk was asked for; milk with only 2.09 per cent. of fat was supplied, the analysis saying that the milk was deficient in the fat proper to genuine milk. The magistrates found that there had been no adulteration of or abstraction from the milk, but there was a long interval between the milkings, which increased the quantity of milk and decreased the percentage of fat in it. They found as a fact that the article supplied was not of the nature, substance, and quality of "new milk," without, as I understand, specifically finding in what respect it was defective. LORD ALVERSTONE and CHANNELL, J., took the view that the magistrates had to find as a fact whether the article was of the nature, substance, and quality of milk, and that the deficiency of fat, with the reason why it was deficient, was evidence on which the magistrates might come to their finding. CHANNELL, J., was, I think, inclined to say that the article was not of the nature of milk, "the cow was not in fact producing milk, but was producing another liquid which had not the constituent parts of milk." I should have preferred, if I had to find the fact, to say that the milk was not of the quality demanded, being milk so poor as to fall below the commercial standard, and I do not think that the previous treatment of the cow is material, except that it explains why the milk

A falls below the commercial standard either as to nature or quality. While I think the question for the magistrates is correctly stated, I think there might have been a clearer direction to them of what they should consider. I state my view of that direction hereafter. DARLING, J., in dissenting, says ([1902] 2 K.B. at p. 18):

"I do not think that I should have taken the trouble to differ in this case if I thought that our decision would only apply to milk, because of the Departmental Order to which I have referred."

B I do not understand this passage, in view of the importance which the learned judge attaches to the Departmental Order, as freeing the appellant in the present case. The earlier part of his judgment seems to treat the Order as setting up a fixed standard for milk instead of, as I think, a burden of proof. The learned judge continues (ibid. at pp. 18, 19):

C "I cannot help foreseeing the difficulties that might arise in such cases where no standard is in existence if it were to be held that a natural product was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded because it did not contain all the elements and in the same proportions in which those elements were usually present in normal examples of the natural product."

D I agree if no evidence of "commercial quality," merchantableness, or fitness for purpose can be given there can be no conviction in respect of "quality." I confine my dissent to cases where such evidence is available. The learned judge further says (ibid.):

E "In the case of other things than milk I think it would be highly dangerous for us to lay down that a man may be convicted under s. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, for selling a natural product in the state in which he gets it. For example, a purchaser who had demanded apples and had received them as they were plucked from the tree might complain that they contained less malic acid or other essential than some analyst might prove to be usual in apples. Poor in quality they might be, but they would still be apples, and as nature produced them."

F But I understand the earlier part of the judgment to agree that the supplier of a natural product, "ass's" milk in the state in which he gets it, in response to a demand for milk or cow's milk, could be convicted—I suppose for supplying an article not of the nature demanded; and I think a man who when asked for apples supplied rotten apples could be convicted of supplying apples not of the quality demanded. I respectfully dissent from this judgment, though I should

G word the majority judgment somewhat differently.
H In Wolfenden v. McCulloch (1) milk was asked for; the analyst reported 2·81 per cent. of fat; the magistrates found milking at usual hours and no adulteration or abstraction, but held they were bound by the decision in Smithies v. Bridge (3) to convict. They did not specifically find anything about the nature, substance, or quality of the article supplied. LORD ALVERSTONE said that the justices might have considered for themselves whether the milk was of the nature, substance, and quality demanded, and that there was no evidence to connect the small deficiency in milk fat with anything abnormal, the milking hours being usual. LORD ALVERSTONE adhered to what he had said in Smithies v. Bridge (3), and neither of the other judges dissented.

I In 1912 a milk case came before the Scottish Courts in Scott v. Jack (2). The article demanded was sweet milk; the analysis showed only 2·57 per cent. of milk fat; the milk was found to be not tampered with or adulterated, but the vendor fed the cows so as to produce the largest yield of milk, and paid no attention to its quality. The sheriff found the deficiency in milk fat was due to a method of feeding intentionally adopted. He did not find whether the milk was of the nature, substance, and quality demanded, but dismissed the complaint. For some reason the vendor was charged with an offence against the milk regulations, which, as I understand them, create no offence, as well as against the statute. I think the Scottish judges accept the view of DARLING, J., in Smithies v. Bridge (3). They seem to treat the regulation of 1901 as providing the only way in which an offence under s. 6 can be proved; they treat the question as one of law, dissenting from the English view laid down in numerous cases that it is a question of fact for the magistrates. Some of them hold that there can be no offence if there is no adulteration or abstraction, though they do not state their view of such English cases as Knight v. Bowers (4), where there was no adulteration or abstraction, but a conviction. For the reasons I have stated I respectfully disagree with these positions.

Lastly, in Marshall v. Skelt (21), in December, 1912, milk was asked for; the analysis showed 26 per cent. deficiency; other evidence was given except that another sample of that milking showed just three per cent. of milk fat; and a sample taken a month later a very slight deficiency. The magistrates found that the milk was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded, but, as they were satisfied that the milk was as it came from the cow, they did not convict. The court directed the magistrates to convict unless the respondent adduced further evidence. This is a decision that if the milk was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded it is immaterial that it was as it came from the cow; with this I agree.

I agree with my brother DARLING in Smithies v. Bridge (3) that the principles laid down in this case cannot be limited to milk. For the Act of 1899 and the regulations of 1901 do not, in my view, alter the offence in s. 6, but only give one way of proving that it has been committed, which one way of proof can be negated or defeated in a specified way. The principles apply to all natural products. The first question is: Is the natural product of the nature demanded? The only materiality of the question whether the article supplied has had substances added or abstracted is in helping to show whether the article supplied is of the nature demanded. Milk and water may not be "milk." Gin and water may be "gin." But the offence may be committed though no addition to or subtraction from the article supplied be made. Savin supplied for saffron; pure ass's milk for cow's milk; neither adulterated, but both not of the nature demanded. The question is the same when quality is demanded. What has happened to the milk, whether by intentional faulty feeding or by subsequent addition or abstraction, may explain why the article supplied is not of the quality demanded; but the real question is: What is the quality demanded? Has it been supplied? If it has not, it is immaterial that there has been no adulteration or abstraction. New laid eggs asked for, bad eggs supplied—an offence against s. 6. The quality demanded is a question of fact; it may be the interpretation of a trade description; it may be evidence of the commercial quality spoken of by the court in Anness v. Grivell (5); it may be evidence of merchantable quality implied by the Sale of Goods Act in goods sold by description. But it is a question of fact for the magistrates, not of law for the court, who are not judges of fact and may not know accurately what they think they know about it. A natural product may be so poor in quality, though the genuine product of nature, that it does not possess the commercial or merchantable quality required by the custom of buyers and sellers, which is a question of evidence. It is, I think, common knowledge that some milk is so poor from the poor condition of the animal that it will not nourish; some meat so poor from the poor condition of the animal that no consumer except the poorest would have it on his table. In my view, to supply such products would be an offence though the products have not been tampered with.

It remains to apply these principles to the facts of the present case. The magistrates found a herd of good cows milked at the usual hours in the district, and nothing added to or abstracted from the milk. They found a deficiency of milk fat of nine per cent. from the standard of the Board of Agriculture (three per cent.) and that milk taken from a healthy herd and mixed should show not less than three per cent. of milk fat, and they find that the deficiency in milk

A fat was due to the manner in which the appellant had fed his cows with the object of obtaining a very large supply of milk without regard to its quality. The demand was for "new milk each morning." On this evidence they determined that the milk was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded. I cannot help suspecting that they have been influenced by the fact that the milk is below the B standard of the Board of Agriculture and that the appellant has fed his cattle so as to make it so, without addressing their minds to the question whether the milk supplied is of the commercial or merchantable quality required by the usage of buyers and sellers of milk. It may be of that quality though it is below the Board of Agriculture standard, or though the seller has fed his cows to get quantity; it may not be of that quality though it is not adulterated. It is a C question of fact depending on evidence. If there is no evidence of such a standard of commercial and merchantable quality there can, in my view, be no conviction where the article is of the nature demanded. In my view, the case should go back to the magistrates to answer the question of fact whether the milk supplied was of the nature, substance, and quality demanded in view of the principles laid down in this judgment.

D AVORY, J.—The offence alleged in this case was the sale of milk to the prejudice of the purchaser which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser, contrary to s. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. The article demanded was, as appears by the contract with the appellant, "new morning milk"; the article supplied contained, according to the E certificate of the analyst, 2·73 per cent. of milk fat and was in his opinion deficient in milk fat to the extent of nine per cent. The justices found that it was deficient in milk fat to the extent of nine per cent., but that there had been no abstraction of milk fat or any addition of water after it had come from the cow, and that the deficiency in the milk fat was due to the manner in which the appellant had fed his cows. They do not find that the article supplied was not milk, nor do they F find that it was not new morning milk. If it was milk at all it was clearly new morning milk. They must be taken, I think, to have accepted the evidence that the morning milk from a healthy herd of cows frequently contained less than three per cent. of milk fat, and the only ground suggested in the Special Case for the finding that there was a deficiency and that the sale was to the prejudice of the purchaser is the regulation made by the Board of Agriculture under s. 4 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, set out in the Case. This section does not G authorise the Board of Agriculture to define what is milk or to fix a standard of the normal constituents below which an article shall be deemed not to be milk, and the regulation providing that where a sample of milk contains less than three per cent. of milk fat it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, not to be genuine of necessity implies that it may be proved to be genuine although it contains less than three per cent. of milk fat. It is to be observed that s. 1 of the H Act of 1899, which deals with the importation of adulterated or impoverished milk, provides in sub-s. (7) that for the purposes of that section milk shall be deemed to be adulterated or impoverished if it has been mixed with any other substance, or if any part of it has been abstracted so as in either case to affect injuriously its quality, substance, or nature. This I think confirms the view implied in the regulation that milk which has not been so treated although it be deficient in milk
I fat is none the less deemed to be milk for the purposes of s. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act.

In my opinion, the milk supplied in this case was proved to be genuine milk and there was no evidence upon which the justices could find it was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded. Milk may vary in quality according to the breed of the cow, the nature of the feed, and the season of the year, and a purchaser may demand a particular quality, but in this case there was no demand by the purchaser of any particular quality, but only of "new morning milk," which was in fact supplied, and if, as BRAY, J., decides, there is on every purchase of new milk an implied demand that it shall be of merchantable quality—which I take to mean saleable in the market as new milk (Jones v. Just (22))—there was not, in my opinion, in this case any evidence that the milk in question was not of merchantable quality; and there is no ground for suggesting that it was not fit for human consumption.

As to the previous decisions of this court cited in argument, I think Woljenden v. McCulloch (1) governs the present case, and I doubt if Smithies v. Bridge (3) is consistent with it. If it is, it can only be supported, I think, on the ground that there was evidence in that case upon which the justices could find that the article was not milk at all, which is the ground of the decision of LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., as I understand it. I agree with the decision of the Scottish judges in Scott v. Jack (2) and adopt the passage in the judgment of LORD SALVESEN, where he says (1912 S.C. (J.) at p. 100):

"If the purchaser had demanded sweet milk containing three per cent. of milk fat or upwards, and had got milk of a poorer quality, an offence might have been committed, but the only demand here made was for sweet milk, and sweet milk unadulterated and not in any way tampered with was what was supplied."

Anness v. Grivell (5) is also an authority for the same proposition that if the purchaser gets what he asks for there is no sale to his prejudice. I do not decide that anything drawn from the udder of a cow is necessarily milk, but in the absence of any statutory enactment that an article shall not be deemed to be milk unless it conforms to a certain standard I do not think the farmer who contracts to supply new milk is bound to feed his cows artificially, or prevent them from drinking too much water, in order to maintain or produce milk of a particular quality. With all respect to the judgments of BRAY, J., and SCRUTTON, J., an obligation on the farmer, who contracts merely to supply new milk to customers in different parts of the country, to supply milk of a particular quality which is to be determined to be merchantable or otherwise, according to the varying views of magistrates in different parts of the country where it may be delivered, the farmer having no means of knowing beforehand in which district proceedings may be taken, or to what standard the milk must conform, would, in my opinion, render the provisions of the Act of 1899 and the regulations made thereunder quite illusory, and the enforcement of this penal statute under such conditions unjust and impracticable. I think the appeal should be allowed and the conviction quashed.

HORLOCK v. BEAL

HOUSE OF LORDS (Earl Loreburn, Lord Atkinson, Lord Shaw, Lord Parmoor and Lord Wrenbury), December 6, 7, 1915, January 21, 1916]

[Reported [1916] 1 A.C. 486; 85 L.J.K.B. 602; 114 L.T. 193;
21 Com. Cas. 201]

Contract—Frustration—Implication of term—Impossibility of performance—Cause beyond control of either party—Knowledge of parties that performance impossible if cause occurred—Seaman's wages—Termination of employment—Capture of ship by enemy—"Loss" of ship—Meaning of "loss"—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict., c. 60), s. 158.

If the performance of a contract has become impossible by a supervening cause beyond the control of either party, and neither party has taken on himself the risk of such a supervening cause, and from the nature of the contract it appears that the parties from the first must have known that its fulfilment would become impossible if such a supervening cause occurred, on such a cause occurring both parties are excused from performance. In such a case a condition is implied that, if performance becomes impossible, the contract shall not remain binding.

By a contract of service dated May 21, 1914, the respondent's husband was employed to serve as a seaman in the appellant's ship, the C.H., for a voyage not exceeding two years in duration. An allotment note allotting half his wages to the respondent was issued to the respondent under s. 141 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. On Aug. 2, 1914, the C.H. entered the port of Hamburg, and on Aug. 4 she was detained, war having been declared between Great Britain and Germany. The crew, including the respondent's husband, were kept as prisoners on board the ship until Nov. 2 when they were taken ashore and interned.

Held by EARL LOREBURN, LORD ATKINSON, LORD SHAW, and LORD WRENBURY, LORD PARMOOR dissenting: as from Aug. 4 (per EARL LOREBURN, Nov. 2), 1914, the appellant lost the use of his ship; that loss, having arisen through a declaration of war, must be considered to have been caused for a period of indefinite duration; and, therefore, the contract of service then became impossible to perform, there had been a failure of something which had been at the basis of the contract in the minds and intention of the contracting parties, namely, the continued availability of the ship, and there must be implied in the contract a term that in such circumstances the contract would end, with the result that the respondent was not entitled to any payment under the allotment note in respect of wages payable to her husband after Aug. 4, 1914.

Per CURIAM: Section 158 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which provides for the termination of a seaman's service "by reason of the wreck or loss of the ship" had no application, for "loss" in that section means physical loss and not merely the loss of a ship to the owner owing to a prolonged detention by a third party.

The House took time for consideration.

Jan. 21, 1916. The following opinions were read. C

EARL LOREBURN.—This is a case of great importance at the present time. A seaman had the misfortune to be serving on a British ship which entered the port of Hamburg on Aug. 2, 1914. The ship was detained by the German authorities when, on Aug. 4, war broke out. Ever since that date the ship and the crew have been detained in Germany. We do not know whether the ship has been condemned or not, but we know that she has been kept and her crew imprisoned. From Aug. 4 till Nov. 2 they were kept as prisoners on their own ship, and on Nov. 2 they were removed to other places of confinement. In these circumstances this seaman's wife sues on an allotment note. Her right to recover admittedly depends on the question: Was the seaman entitled to his wages for the period from Aug. 2, 1914 to April 10, 1915? His contract of service required him to serve on the ship Coralie Horlock for a voyage not exceeding two years in duration. These articles were signed on May 21, 1914. An allotment note was issued in favour of the present plaintiff for a monthly payment of £4 15s. D

In my view, the first question to be decided is whether or not, and at what date, the performance of this contract of service became impossible, which means impracticable in a commercial sense. It was at first possible that she might be released in accordance with a practice which has been common in former wars and is recommended, though not required, by the Hague Convention. But the removal of the crew from their ship and their imprisonment elsewhere, and the lapse of time, made it clear that, whatever hope there may have been of restoration, could no longer be entertained. Looking back upon what happened, we may think that there was never any hope. Or we may think that there was a period of suspense during which it was not determined whether there should be, in accordance with common practice, a release on both sides of ships so situated. There is hardly anything to help us, except the fact that the men were detained on their own ship until Nov. 2. On the whole, it seems to me that there was a period of suspense, and judging as best I can, I take Nov. 2 as the date. It is a surmise, but the opposite view also is a surmise on what is a question of fact. Assuming this to be so, does that impossibility of performance dissolve the contract of service and disentitle the seaman to wages from that time onwards? The law, both as it is found in the Statute Book and as it has been administered in Admiralty courts, has always been in some respects peculiarly tender and benevolent towards seamen in regard to their contracts of service, though in earlier days with a notable exception embodied in the maxim that freight is the mother of wages. That was a cruel exception, which has been removed now by Act of Parliament. Yet it has always to be remembered in scrutinising the older decisions, because what prevented freight from being earned might prevent wages from being recoverable. E

Is there, then, either in any Act of Parliament or in Admiralty law, any rule which prescribes the effect of such a detention by the enemy as makes the performance of a contract of service impossible? There is no proof of condemnation

A by a court. We were referred to s. 158 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894
[amended by s. 1 of the Merchant Shipping (International Labour Conventions) Act, 1925]. That section tells us what is to be done in regard to wages if there is a wreck or loss of the ship. In my opinion, these words refer to physical loss.
B It is true that a ship is lost to her owner in a real sense when she has been captured and condemned by a competent court. It was argued that she may be equally lost to her owner by a prolonged detention. I should be disposed to say that where the property remains his, and ultimate recovery is to be expected, she is not lost even to him. But if I am right in thinking that both the words used in this section —namely, "wreck" and "loss"—refer to the ship herself and to her physical condition, then they have no bearing on this case. I will merely add that the C Court of Appeal in The Olympic (1) did not decide anything inconsistent with this view. They merely used the frustration of the voyage as a test by which to determine whether or not the physical injury inflicted amounted to "wreck."

Coming to the law as administered in Admiralty, three cases were cited with a view of showing that prolonged detention of a ship and its crew by a foreign Power did not dissolve a seaman's contract of service. Two of these authorities are in 4 EAST—namely, Beale v. Thompson (2) and Pratt v. Cuff (3)—the former of which D was affirmed in this House more than 100 years ago, but there is no record to show on what grounds. The third is a case at nisi prius. Delamainer v. Wintringham (4). All of them are cases in which ships and crews were confined for a long time, but were ultimately released, and the interrupted voyage completed so as to earn freight, and, therefore, wages. It was held that wages continued to be payable throughout. This could be supported, and was supported, in the judgments on E the ground that both employers and employed treated the service as not terminated by the temporary interruption, though there are passages in the judgments which admit of a broader interpretation. There is no distinct authority for the proposition that if a seaman is willing to fulfil his contract he is still entitled to wages, though the performance of it has been made impracticable on both sides by a prolonged captivity.

F Accordingly neither statute nor Admiralty law provides special guidance, and I must recur to common law. The contract was for service on a ship for a voyage within a period of two years. Both ship and crew were forcibly detained, the contemplated service became impracticable, so far as I can judge, on Nov. 2, 1914.
Had the ship and crew been released on Nov. 2 I do not think common law would G have treated the contract of service as ended, and I do not think the chance of her release was ended before Nov. 2. In my opinion, neither party was any longer bound by that contract from that date. If they were bound, it must mean that wages were to be paid, without any service in return, for the entire duration of this war, or, in the present case, till the expiry of two years from the commencement of the service. The Napoleonic war after the rupture of the Peace of Amiens H lasted for eleven years. I think it was an implied term of this service, subject to any special law affecting seamen, that it should be practicable for the ship to sail on this voyage, in that sense which disregards minor interruptions and takes notice only of what substantially ends the possibility of the service contemplated being fulfilled. Both employer and employed made their bargain on the footing that I whatever temporary interruption might supervene, the ship and crew would be available to carry out the adventure. Accordingly, I think that the appeal should be allowed in respect of the period after Nov. 2. I learned with satisfaction that provision is to be made for cases of this kind from public funds. It cannot, of course, affect the decision of a court of law, but it is in accordance with the spirit which has always influenced both courts of law and the legislature in dealing with a deserving class of men. The shipowner in this case has brought it before the courts in order to settle the law, which has been in doubt, and is not open to any reflection.

LORD ATKINSON.—The sole question for decision on this appeal is whether the admitted facts establish satisfactorily that the respondent's husband, Thomas Beal, ceased to be entitled to £9 10s. per month on Aug. 4, 1914, or if not then at what later date if at all. The ancient doctrine that freight was, as it was said, the mother of wages, that the crew and the owners of the ship were co-adventurers in the enterprise of earning freight out of which the seaman was to be paid, has been abolished by s. 157 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and the seaman is now entitled to be paid his wages whether freight be earned or not. Still his contract is a contract to render his service for the achievement of the adventure or adventures upon which it is contemplated by both parties to his contract the ship is to embark, and though, undoubtedly, many provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act are framed to protect sailors from the result of their well-known improvidence, still there is no reason whatever why a rule of law applicable to contracts in general should not be applied to the contracts of seamen, where these latter are not expressly or impliedly excluded from its operation.

The rule I refer to is laid down by BLACKBURN, J., in Taylor v. Caldwell (5) in these words (3 B. & S. at p. 833):

“Where there is a positive contract to do a thing, not in itself unlawful, the contractor must perform it or pay damages for not doing it, although in consequence of unforeseen accidents, the performance of his contract may become unexpectedly burdensome or even impossible. . . . But this rule is only applicable where the contract is positive and absolute, and not subject to any condition express or implied; and there are authorities which, as we think, establish the principle, that where from the nature of the contract, it appears the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrived some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that, when entering into the contract they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what there was to be done; there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible by the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor.”

This principle applies not only to contracts in their executory stage, but when they have been in part performed.

In Appleby v. Myers (6) the rule was, by the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, applied to the case where the plaintiff contracted to erect certain machinery on the defendant's premises, and to keep it in repair for two years, the price to be paid on the completion of the work. After some portions of the work had been finished, and others were in the course of completion, the premises and all the machinery and materials were destroyed by an accidental fire. It was held that both parties were excused from the further performance of the contract, and that the provision as to the payment of the price only after completion, disabled the plaintiff from recovering anything in respect of the work done by him. In Howell v. Coupland (7) it was applied to a case where a crop which was sold perished by disease. In Baily v. De Crespigny (8) the performance of a covenant was rendered impossible by an Act of Parliament, and the covenantor was held to be discharged. In Krell v. Henry (9) it was applied to a case where a flat in Pall Mall was hired in order to see the contemplated procession on the occasion of the coronation of his late Majesty King Edward VII, which ceremony was postponed. The contract of hiring did not contain any express reference to the procession, but it was held that the proper inference to be drawn from the surrounding circumstances was that both parties to the contract contemplated the taking place of the procession along the proclaimed route as the foundation of the contract. In Melville v. De Wolf (10) the impossibility arose from an act of A State as the primary cause. The plaintiff in the action was a seaman who had signed articles to serve on a voyage to the Pacific and back to a port in the United Kingdom for a term of three years at £7 per month. The captain was sent home from Monte Video by a naval court, constituted under the Mercantile Marine Act, 1850 [repealed by Merchant Shipping Repeal Act, 1854], to be tried for shooting one of the crew. The plaintiff was sent home by the same court as a witness against him, and he attended the trial in this country in that capacity. When the trial was over the ship was in the Pacific, and it was practically impossible for him to return to her. The plaintiff claimed wages at the above rate up to the time the trial terminated. The defendant paid into court a sum sufficient to cover the plaintiff's wages up to the time he left his ship. It was held that he was not entitled to any wages after he left the ship. LORD CAMPBELL, in delivering judgment,

C said (4 E. & B. at p. 849):

"After he was sent home from Monte Video to England he neither served under the articles actually nor constructively, and as from that time the relation of employer and employed could not be renewed within the scope of the original hiring, we think that the contract must be considered to be dissolved by the supreme authority of the State, which is binding on both parties."

D

It will be observed that the contract so dissolved was not a mere executory contract, but a contract in part performed. In The Friends (11) the impossibility was the result of the act of a hostile State. The plaintiffs' ship, a British ship, manned by a British crew, was, in the course of a voyage from London to Newcastle and back, captured by a French privateer. The plaintiff and some members of the crew were taken, as prisoners of war, to France, not because of their special connection with this particular ship, but because they were British subjects. While they were in custody the ship was recaptured, which as far as possible, according to law, restored the antecedent condition of things, but a new hand had been hired to fill the plaintiff's place. The ship continued her homeward voyage and reached the port of London. The plaintiff sued for the wages which would have been due to him had he served on the homeward journey. SIR WILLIAM SCOTT, in giving judgment, said (4 Ch. Rob. at pp. 144, 145):

"Nothing can be better settled than that the act of capture defeats all rights and interests, but it is contended that the former interests revive upon recapture . . . The claimant was not on board at the recapture, but had been sent a prisoner to France, whilst the owner was obliged to hire another person in his place, to work the vessel on the returned voyage. Under these circumstances the utmost that could be demanded, with any show of reason, would be the small portion earned prior to the capture, two days' service, and that subject to salvage. Beyond this it is impossible to advance a pretension; for what right can a person in captivity have to demand the benefit of the labour of those who carried the ship on to London, or still more of those who were hired in his place for the returned journey?"

H

The contract in that case also was in part performed, but the service in aid of the adventure which the parties to the contract contemplated the seaman should render in return for his wages was made impossible by his incarceration, and each party to the contract was held, therefore, to be relieved of the obligation it imposed.

I

In my opinion, the provision contained in the 158th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, to the effect that the service of a seaman and his title to wages cease when his ship is lost is but a statutory application of this same principle. I think that the loss referred to in this section does not mean merely the loss of the use of the ship, but physical loss. Physical loss, however, is not to be confined to the foundering of the ship, or such like but physical loss as defined in the judgment of MAULE, J., in Moss v. Smith (12), applicable generally to mercantile contracts, and approved of by LORD BLACKBURN in Dahl v. Nelson, Donkin & Co. (13) (6 App. Cas. at p. 52). MAULE, J., said (9 C.B. at p. 103):

"It may possibly be physically possible to repair the ship, but at an enormous cost, and then also the loss would be total; for in matters of business a thing is said to be impossible when it is not practicable, and a thing is impracticable when it can only be done at an excessive or unreasonable cost. If a ship sustains such extensive damage that it would not be reasonably practicable to repair her, seeing that the expense of repair would be such that no man of common sense would incur the outlay, the ship is said to be totally lost."

LORD BLACKBURN points out that, though these words were used in the case of a policy of insurance, they were spoken generally of mercantile contracts, and that it was on the principle thus laid down that Geipel v. Smith (14), and Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (15), were decided. It was contended that this s. 158 is exhaustive, and that no loss other than the physical loss there referred to can terminate the seaman's contract, or his right to wages. In my opinion, that is wholly erroneous. It leaves out of consideration effective capture by a belligerent which transfers the property in the ship from its owners to the captor and enables that captor to give an effective title to his vendee, and it also leaves out capture by pirates, which transfers the possession and custody of the ship, though not her ownership.

The above-mentioned cases are clearly distinguishable from Beale v. Thompson (2) as was pointed out by LORD CAMPBELL in Melville v. De Wolf (10). In the former case the ship went out in ballast from England to St. Petersburg to bring cargo from thence to London, and was to be paid freight by the ton. The Emperor Paul of Russia, though at peace with England, had this ship, with others, seized and her crew imprisoned. On his death, in six months, the ship and crew were released. They were taken back on board their ship, got her cargo, navigated her back to England, and earned the proper freight. LORD ELLENBOROUGH, in delivering judgment, approved of, and relied upon the doctrine laid down in different words by LORD HARDWICK, in R. v. Castlechurch (Inhabitants) (16), and in R. v. Eaton (Inhabitants) (17), respectively, to the effect in the first place,

"that where a servant returns and the master receives him, it is always esteemed a dispensation of the master, and helps the discontinuance, and works in the nature of a remitter," and in the next:

"the absence of the servant for three weeks was purged by the master's receiving him again, which ought to be received in that case as a dispensation, and in strictness of law, he still continues in the service of the master, notwithstanding such absence."

LORD ELLENBOROUGH held that, owing to the terms upon which the ship was released, and the property belonging to the ship and the crew restored or compensated for, under the order of the Russian government, there was no capture, notwithstanding the hostile nature of the seizure, and laid it down that the right of a mariner to wages depends, first, on his earning freight for his owners on that voyage for which he was hired, and secondly, upon the performance by the mariner of the service he has agreed to perform, in respect of his owners during the voyage. The jury found that the plaintiff had performed his services properly, and the freight was admittedly earned. Taking these three facts into consideration, the reception back of the plaintiff by the owners into their service, the earning of the freight, and the proper performance by the plaintiff of his service it was held that he was entitled to his wages during the time of his captivity and until he reached London on the return voyage. Delamainer v. Winteringham (4) is to the same effect. In the present case the owners have not taken back

A the seaman, Beal, into their service. On the contrary they insist that the contract with him is at an end, and that his right to wages has been determined.

B In Wiggins v. Ingleton (18), a seaman, after serving three months on a voyage from Carolina to London, was impressed, under the Queen's authority, before reaching the delivery port. It was held that, even though the ship reached that port, he was only entitled to wages pro tanto for the time he actually served. In Dahl v. Nelson, Donkin & Co. (13), LORD BLACKBURN said (6 App. Cas. at p. 53) that it was

C "held in Geipel v. Smith (14) by the whole court, and in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (15), by the majority in the Common Pleas, and in the same case in error by a majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber that a delay in carrying out a charterparty caused by something for which neither party was responsible, if so great and long as to make it unreasonable to require the parties to go on with the adventure, entitled either of them, at least while the contract was executory, to consider it at an end."

D LORD WATSON (ibid. at pp. 61 and 62) analysed these two cases at length, and approved of the decisions in them, and LORD SELBORNE stated he had read the judgments of his two colleagues and concurred in them. In the first of these cases the defendant vessel had been chartered by the plaintiff to load at a particular place a cargo of coals to be taken to Hamburg. Before any breach of the agreement the port of Hamburg had been blockaded by the French fleet, and the Queen of England had by proclamation enjoined her subjects to strict neutrality and not to commit any violation of the law of nations. Thereupon the voyage to Hamburg became illegal. The defendant refused to load his ship, and it was held he was justified in so doing, as the charterparty was for a single adventure to commence at once, and, the contract being executory, the further performance of it within a reasonable time was prevented by an excepted cause—the blockade, which was a restraint of princes. LUSH, J., in giving judgment, put the pith of the case thus. He said (L.R. 7 Q.B. at p. 414):

F "If the impediment had been in its nature temporary I should have thought the plea bad, but a state of war must be presumed to be likely to continue so long, and so to disturb the commerce of merchants as to defeat and destroy the object of a commercial adventure like this."

G It is not necessary, therefore, in such a case to wait till the delay has occurred. It is legitimate to come to the conclusion that the delay caused by war will be long, and so disturbing to commerce as to defeat the adventure and to act accordingly at once. In the second case, the plaintiff, a shipowner, entered into a charterparty dated in November, 1871, by which his ship was to proceed with all despatch from Liverpool to Newport and there load a cargo of iron rails for San Francisco. The plaintiff effected an insurance on the chartered freight. The ship sailed from Liverpool on Jan. 2 and ran aground on the following day in Carnarvon Bay. On Feb. 15, while she was aground, the charterers threw up the charterparty and chartered another ship. On the 18th she was floated, but the necessary repairs could not be effected till August. The plaintiff sued on the policy for the chartered freight. The jury found that the time necessary for getting the ship off, and repairing her, was so long as to put an end to the adventure in a commercial sense. This, according to BRAMWELL, B., amounted to finding that the voyage the parties contemplated had become impossible, and that a voyage undertaken after the ship had been repaired would have been a different voyage, a different adventure, and held that there was an implied condition precedent in the contract that the ship should arrive at the port of loading in a reasonable time, the non-performance of which not only gave the charterer a cause of action, but released him from the contract, that he was not bound to load the ship, and that there was, therefore, a loss of the charterer's freight by perils of the sea. The charterer did not wait till a reasonable time had elapsed before he repudiated the contract.

He did that at once when a long delay in the process of repairing was reasonably probable. A

In a case tried before SIR WILLIAM SCOTT he practically applied, many years earlier, the same principle to an executed contract, namely, The Elizabeth (19). This vessel sailed from London to St. Petersburg, took in cargo there, and started on her return voyage. She grounded on a reef of rocks at Gothland, was floated, and brought to Ostergman, where she was beached in order to examine her injuries. B She was so damaged that she could not be repaired within the Baltic season—i.e., when the Baltic was sufficiently free from ice to be navigable. Though it is a general rule that a captain cannot discharge his crew in a foreign port, it was held that, under these circumstances, and having regard to the anticipated delay, he was clothed with authority in this case to do so. He did discharge them against their will (as it was taken to be), at once, making provision for their passage home C to England. The ship returned to England in the month of April following, manned by a new crew. The plaintiff sued for wages up to the time of the return of the ship to the home port. It was held that he was only entitled to wages up to the date of his discharge. The learned judge, LORD STOWELL, said (2 Dods. at p. 408):

“The ship proceeded on the original voyage under the expectation entertained on both sides that she would return in the ordinary course of such voyage. A total loss by wreck happens. This operates as a total loss of wages. There may be cases much short of this semi-naufragium which were not occasioned by the default of either party, but where it has originated from vis major, the act of God, which neither party had in contemplation at the time of the contract. . . . I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that they have no right to claim, as they have done, wages up to the time of the return of the Elizabeth. If they had obstinately stayed with the ship they would have done wrong, both with respect to the owners and to themselves. I think the master had a right to dismiss them under this extreme pressure.” D E

Here the contract of the seamen was not executory; it was in part performed. The time necessary to make the repairs had not elapsed. The delay had only been anticipated when the dismissal took place. It was the prospect that a long time must elapse before the ship was rendered fit for use, not the actual lapse of that time, which justified the captain in treating the adventure for which the crew contracted to serve as at an end, and their contracts as terminated. F

This case was cited in The Olympic (1), and commented upon by BUCKLEY, L.J. In that case, as in The Elizabeth (19) and as in the present case, the contract of the seamen was in part performed. The Olympic, though very seriously injured, was well worth repairing, but it was the prospect of the delay necessary to effect the repairs required to render her seaworthy which in the opinion of the court rendered her a wreck within the meaning of this s. 158 of the Act of 1894 and justified her owners in treating the particular adventure for which the crew contracted to serve as ended, and justified their dismissal. In my view the provision touching wreck contained in s. 158 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, is merely a statutory application of the principle first laid down in The Elizabeth (19) to cases when the ship sustains physical injury, not so grave as to amount to loss, yet sufficiently serious to render her unseaworthy until repairs, requiring a substantial time to effect, are carried out upon her. In the present case it does not appear that the ship is physically injured. Once interned by this enemy power, the prospect of being interned for a length of time to which nobody can place a limit opened up to her owners. Moreover, any day something may be done which would transfer the property in the ship from them to her captors. G H I

In Beale v. Thomson (2) LORD ELLENBOROUGH said (4 East. at p. 561):

“Seizure, even hostile seizure, is not necessarily capture, though such is its usual and probable result. The ultimate act or adjudication of the State by which the seizure has been made assigns its proper and conclusive quality

A and denomination to its own original proceedings. If it condemn in such case it is a capture ab initio. If it award restitution as an act of justice as the order of June 5, 1801, expressly does, it pronounces upon its own act as not being a valid act of capture, but as an act of temporary seizure and detention upon grounds not warranting the condemnation of the property or the dealing with it as captured. It seems to make no material difference for B this purpose whether the restitution were awarded by the government of the country as an act of State, as in this case it was, or by any of the ordinary courts of civil judicature to which the administration of justice on these subjects is usually delegated."

The meaning of that passage I take to be this, that seizure per se is an equivocal
C act that whether it shall amount to capture or not depends upon the intention of the captor in making it, that this intention may be shown by acts subsequent, namely, either the condemnation in the proper judicial tribunals of the State of the property taken as lawful prize, or by an act of the government of the country of the captors as an act of State, and that when that intention is shown it operates by relation back to the original seizure, turning it either into a capture ab initio, or D into a temporary detention ab initio not amounting to capture. Thus the circular of June 5, 1801, was held to determine the character and purpose of the seizure made over six months previously. In Goss v. Withers (20), LORD MANSFIELD (2 Burr. at pp. 693-695), deals with the principles adopted and practices followed by different European countries on this question of prize. He leaves the matter, in many respects, quite undecided. And consistently with everything that has E been laid down in these two authorities, it may well be that any act of the government of a belligerent Power indicating that they have treated a seized ship as their own property, such as the sale of it, for instance, would be sufficient to determine the character and purpose of the original act of seizure so as to make it either a capture proper with all its consequences or mere detention. We are deciding this case without knowing whether anything of the kind has occurred in this F instance. The fact, however, that it might occur at any moment after seizure, renders it all the more reasonable, just, and natural for the owners to have come to the conclusion on Aug. 4, 1914, that the adventure upon which their ship was embarked was put an end to, and the contracts of the crew, and their right to wages determined. They acted upon that conclusion in the only way, and to the only extent possible under the circumstances, by refusing to pay the allotment.
In reference to Hadley v. Clarke (21), it has been already pointed out that the G embargo imposed by the Order in Council appeared only to contemplate a temporary detention, as it was made till "further order." The point was never made that an embargo, even if originally intended to be temporary, might not put an end to the contract of affreightment if it were prolonged (see LORD KENYON (8 Term Rep. at p. 265)). All that was, in fact, decided was the abstract point that a H temporary interruption of a voyage by an embargo does not put an end to such a contract. Moreover, the judgments of GROVE, J., and LAURENCE, J., especially that of the latter, rather indicate that they treated the contract to carry the goods to Leghorn as a positive and absolute contract to do so within a reasonable time—the dangers of the seas only excepted. The latter learned judge says (ibid. at
p. 267) they

I "absolutely engaged to carry the goods, the dangers of the seas only excepted:
that, therefore, is the only excuse which they can make for not performing the contract. If they had intended that they should be excused for any other cause they should have introduced such an exception into the contract."

Of course, if the contract of the parties be thus positive and absolute, they are bound by it, however impossible the performance of it may become. The contract with the crew in this case was not a positive and absolute contract, and the above case does not appear to me to touch the present case. Section 134 of the Act of 1894 does not, I think, touch this case. It obviously does not refer to the forcible act of an enemy. No point was raised as to the two days which elapsed between Aug. 2, the day of arrival, and Aug. 4, the day of the outbreak of war. In my opinion, therefore, the judgment of the Court of Appeal, as well as that of ROWLATT, J., was erroneous and should be reversed.

LORD SHAW.—The question in the case, accordingly, is whether Beal has become entitled to wages from and after the time when a state of war existed between Great Britain and Germany. The declaration of war took effect as from 11 p.m. on Aug. 4, 1914. The Coralie Horlock was then in the port of Hamburg, where she had arrived on the 2nd. The ship still remains there. Apart from exceptional or provisional rules or directions agreed to by the belligerent States, for her owners or master to trade with the enemy was, of course, illegal; for her crew it was equally illegal to assist in trading with the enemy; to attempt an escape, whether with or without cargo, may have been physically impossible; in any case it would have exposed the ship to risk of destruction.

In Esposito v. Bowden (22), WILLES, J., reviewing the case law and referring especially to Potts v. Bell (23), and to the judgment of LORD STOWELL in The Hoop (24), stated the law in terms which have never since been doubted (7 E. & B. at p. 779):

"It is now fully established that, the presumed object of war being as much to cripple the enemy's commerce as to capture his property, a declaration of war imports a prohibition of commercial intercourse and correspondence with the inhabitants of the enemy's country, and that such intercourse, except with the licence of the Crown, is illegal."

Without fault on the part of either party to the contract of service, law and force combined to stop the prosecution of this voyage, and the adventure was consequently lost. In my humble opinion, that stoppage and loss, having arisen from a declaration of war, must be considered to have been caused for a period of indefinite duration, and so to have effected a solution of the contract arrangements for and dependent upon the completion of further continuance of the adventure. I say this advisedly, in consequence of the argument presented to the House, and founded on the possibility that after a declaration of war peace may be concluded within a short time, ships may be released, and voyages and shipping adventures be resumed. As the cases show, such resumption does of consent take place, and courts of law pay respect to the terms upon which the resumption was made. But apart from the private arrangements of parties, the contracts are, in my opinion (and subject to the point as to a period of grace hereafter dealt with), brought to an end by a declaration of war, and all interested are entitled to have affairs settled upon that footing. I am further of opinion that the contract of service between owners and crews is also terminated in the same way, because it is a contract whose incidents stand or fall with the adventure with which it was bound up. I do not think that any other rule would be in accord with law or would work. When a ship is put under detention by a declaration of war, I cannot see room for a condition of affairs which would leave parties in suspense, feeling that they are bound if the war be short but free if the war be long. In the case of a vessel in an enemy port, the war descends upon master and crew alike, taking no regard of either contract right or obligations, but putting all alike on the common footing of British citizens, and as such placing their liberty completely at the disposal of the enemy Power. Germany made no lesser claim in the present case. From Aug. 4, 1914, the owners "were deprived of the possession of this said vessel, and the said Tom Rea Beal, with the officers and other members of the crew, were on or about Nov. 2 removed from the said vessel to a lodging ship in Hamburg, and on or about Nov. 8 were interned at Ruhleben, near Berlin," where they still remain. While the general question as to

A the effect of a declaration of war should, in my opinion, be resolved as stated, I should also feel entirely free to hold that the circumstances of the present case leave no doubt as to disruption of the contract relations of parties and the loss of the adventure.

B Germany allowed no period of grace for loading or unloading, or for departure with freedom from capture on transit. The practice of nations in this particular has greatly varied. I refer with much satisfaction to the treatment of this subject in Mr. HIGGINS' valuable work on THE HAGUE PEACE CONFERENCES. On the outbreak of the Crimean War in 1854, enemy trading ships were allowed a period of six weeks, by Russia on the one hand and Britain and France on the other. In 1866 Prussia made the same allowance to Austria. Very liberal concessions on this head were made by the United States of America to the ships of Spain on the outbreak of war between those countries in 1898. Since that time the instances show less indulgence to peaceful commerce. On the occurrence of the Russo-Japanese War in 1904, Japan allowed a week, Russia forty-eight hours. In the present instance no allowance was made. The circumstances are specially notable. Great Britain was manifestly willing that the spirit of the Hague Convention should be obeyed and that days of grace should be allowed. On the day of the declaration of war—namely, Aug. 4, 1914—an Order in Council was issued referring to the practice in the past and to the terms of the Convention. It provided that a period of grace for loading, unloading, and departure should be allowed to all German vessels in British ports—namely, until midnight of Aug. 14. This was subject to information being received not later than the 7th, that “the treatment accorded to British merchant ships and their cargoes which, at the date of the outbreak of hostilities, were in the ports of the enemy, or which subsequently entered them, is not less favourable than the treatment accorded to enemy merchant ships” by the Order in Council. Germany did not accept this overture. The uncertainties and hesitations of nations upon the question are reflected in art. 1 of the Hague Convention of 1907, in which the international consent was reduced to the mere proposition that “it is desirable” that a merchant ship in an enemy port should “be allowed to depart freely, either immediately or after a reasonable number of days' grace.” As applied to the case of the Coralie Horlock at Hamburg the enunciation of this sentiment has proved worthless. I observe, however, that s. 2 of the Convention is also founded on in the courts below. It provides that such a ship “may not be confiscated. The belligerent may detain it, on condition of restoring it after the war, without payment of compensation, or he may requisition it on condition of paying compensation.”

G I am not in a position to say whether this head of the Hague Convention will be respected by the government of Germany. That learned judge, SWINFEN EADY, L.J., says that

H “in the absence of any evidence to the contrary it must be presumed that she is merely detained on condition of being restored after the war.”

I It is not necessary, in the view which I take, to discuss the point at length. I have already referred to the action of Germany in regard to the subject of days of grace. Other circumstances might also have to be considered on the point whether the Hague Convention afforded any presumptive aid in the construction of rights or obligations, or in regard to the action of the present belligerents. Whether even conventions having been disregarded—rights would have to be determined as in pre-convention days—the days, according to LORD MANSFIELD (2 Douglas, 614a), of confiscation “if no reciprocal agreement is made”—on such points no opinion need be indicated. But they do bear on the question of presumption from the terms of the Hague Convention, which is referred to in the courts below. I must express the gravest doubt whether any such presumption is in place in the present case. Speaking for myself I should not feel justified upon the terms of this international convention in allowing my mind to be swayed by such presumptions as would be appropriate to an inviolate document or to one which is backed by the sanctions of municipal law. What, in short, during the course of the war or under the stress of circumstances, may happen to this ship, no one can foresee: destruction, confiscation, or return—any of these things may occur; and all are involved in the overwhelming uncertainty both as to time and circumstance which follows from the present state of war. With regard to the effect of a declaration of war there is certainly, however, one presumption. It has been expressed in various decisions, but was clearly stated by LUSH, J., in Geipel v. Smith (14) (L.R. 7 Q.B. at p. 414):

“A state of war must be presumed to be likely to continue so long, and so to disturb the commerce of merchants, as to defeat and destroy the object of a commercial adventure like this.”

The judgments of the courts below proceed upon the two propositions—(i) that the ship is in esse—she is neither wrecked nor lost, and (ii) she is temporarily detained, and, therefore, that the principle of the old embargo cases applies. I again take leave to refer to this second point. I think an analysis of the embargo cases shows that they depended largely if not altogether on these considerations. In the first place, in the working of the old rule that freight is the mother of wages, the question whether wages were due could not be adjusted until after the voyage was over and the freight was earned. Accordingly, in the leading case of Beale v. Thompson (2), the essential fact founded on was that after an embargo laid on by the Tsar Paul had been taken off by that erratic Sovereign the voyage was resumed, the same ship and the same men employed, and all the men taken on to complete the same voyage, under circumstances which showed “a recognition on the part of the master that he and the sailors then stood in their original relative situation to each other under the articles by which that relation was constituted”: 4 East, at p. 565.

The rule as to the dependency of wages on freight has long ago been abolished by statute; and while, of course, it might be possible under special bargain to continue or resume contract relations upon special terms, I have great doubt whether the embargo cases to which I have referred can be now relied upon in support of any part of the modern law of seaman's wages. These observations apply in terms to other cases cited—e.g., to Delamainer v. Winteringham (4). Upon, however, the proposition that the ship is neither wrecked nor lost, I agree with the learned judges in the courts below. Upon the other hand, I cannot see my way to hold that there is, therefore, an indefeasible right to recover, under s. 158 of the Act, unless and until such wreck or loss occurs. I venture respectfully upon that subject to adopt the judgment of my noble and learned friend, SWINFEN EADY, L.J., now LORD WRENBURY.*

I now come, accordingly, to what is by far the most important point in the case. Granted that a state of war exists, with consequences which include the stoppage of the voyage and the internment of officers and crew, are wages due for

* On this point SWINFEN EADY, L.J., in the Court of Appeal said: “It was then contended that there had been a ‘wreck or loss’ of the ship within s. 158 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and that the word ‘loss’ ought to bear a meaning somewhat similar to that of the word ‘wreck’; and for the purpose of showing the meaning of the word ‘wreck’ in the section, reliance was placed upon a passage in the judgment of BUCKLEY, L.J., in The Olympic (1). He there said ([1913] P. at p. 107): ‘The wreck of the ship in this context, I think, is anything happening to the ship which renders her incapable of carrying out the maritime adventure in respect of which the seaman's contract was entered into.’ It was urged in the present case that by the detention of the ship for nearly twelve months there was a loss of adventure. But in this passage BUCKLEY, L.J., is obviously referring to something physical happening to the ship which injures and damages her, so as to make her unserviceable for so long a time as to make a continuance of her voyage useless as a commercial adventure. In my judgment, there has not been any loss of this ship within s. 158 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.”

A a period subsequent to the declaration of war, the ship itself having been neither wrecked nor lost, and being still in the port of Hamburg? It may be conceded that the continued existence of the subject-matter of the contract has formed a large part in the consideration of such a question. Under the law of Rome the illustration of the solution of a contract obligation was frequently given from the case of a promise with regard to a slave. In such a case, if the slave died or was manumitted before being handed over, the contract was at an end. The vendor, however, remained, of course, answerable if he was responsible for what had occurred—if he had himself killed the slave or set him free. In all cases, however, where no fault attached, the failure of the corpus certum released the contracting parties. Several of the citations from the Digest on this subject are made by BLACKBURN, J., in the leading case of Taylor v. Caldwell (5), and one can entirely assent to that very learned judge's view that the principle is adopted in the civil law as applicable to every obligation of which the subject is a thing certain. He cites POTHIER in support of a definition of much precision as follows (3 B. & S. at p. 835):

D "The debtor corporis certi is freed from his obligation when the thing has perished neither by his act nor his neglect, and before he is in default, unless by some stipulation he has taken on himself the risk of the particular misfortune which has occurred."

In another passage of this judgment BLACKBURN, J.'s, remarks (ibid. at p. 839):

E "In none of these cases is the promise in words other than positive, nor is there any express stipulation that the destruction of the person or thing shall excuse the performance: but that excuse is by law implied, because from the nature of the contract it is apparent that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of the particular person or chattel."

In the course of laying down these principles the cases which had occurred in the English courts were referred to, and that of Williams v. Lloyd (25), was especially founded on.

F It is manifest that the principle last adumbrated was capable of a wider practical and logical application than to the failure of a certum corpus. The underlying ratio is the failure of something which was at the basis of the contract in the minds and intention of the contracting parties. This ratio has, I am humbly of opinion, been properly developed in recent years. I do not go through all the decisions, but I think it right to mention that of Krell v. Henry (9), in which I desire to attach my respectful and pointed concurrence in the opinion delivered by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in these passages ([1903] 2 K.B. at p. 748):

H "Whatever may have been the limits of the Roman law, the case of Nickoll and Knight v. Ashton, Edridge & Co. (26) makes it plain that the English law applies the principle not only to cases where the performance of the contract becomes impossible by the cessation of existence of the thing which is the subject-matter of the contract, but also to cases where the event which renders the contract incapable of performance is the cessation or non-existence of an express condition or state of things going to the root of the contract."

I This view is fully discussed by the learned judge. I think it to be in entire accord with that doctrine of frustration of voyage which has become fully accepted since Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (15), with the doctrine underlying Taylor v. Caldwell (5), and with sound legal principle.

BLACKBURN, J., in Taylor v. Caldwell (5), in discussing the civil law, only cited Digest 45, 1, 33 and Digest 45, 1, 23, and confined his survey of that law to the failure of a corpus certum, developing the doctrine, as it were from that point. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., in Krell v. Henry (9), reasons upon the same limited premises, stating that "the Roman law dealt with obligations de certo corpore." The passages cited are from the book "de verborum obligationibus." The subject is too large for treatment here, but it may be said that the same principle appears in book 18, "de contrahendâ emptione." Even in regard to book 45, however, another text shows that the development and wider application of the principle was not unknown to Roman jurists and was approved. It is DIGEST 45, 1, 91. After dealing with the case of a slave, the ordinary illustration of a certum corpus, and of his death, the review of the principle is broadened thus:

"Si sit quidem res in rebus humanis, sed dari non possit, ut fundus religiosus (puta) vel sacer factus, vel servus manumissus, vel etiam ab hostibus si capiatur"

—then in each of these instances liability under the obligation flies off, if the occurrences do not arise from the promissor's fault. MR. HUNTER in his invaluable work thus paraphrases the dictum as to the sale of a piece of land (ROMAN LAW, p. 638):

"Sempronius promises to give a small plot of ground to Maevius. After doing so he buries a dead body in the place and thus makes the land extra-commercium. Sempronius must pay its value. If the land had belonged to another who had buried a body in it, he would have been released."

The illustration is not inapt even to the present case, for it shows that it was no answer to say "the land, the certum corpus, is there," for the land having through no fault of the promisor become extra-commercium, by burial of the dead, then the basis of the transaction, the root of the contract as that had been contemplated by the parties, had gone, or had suffered such an alteration as to release them from the obligation itself. This was a case analogous to that of the slave who was still alive but had been manumitted or had been captured by the enemy. It is thus not without interest to observe that not only had the principle been laid down, but its modern development had been foreshadowed in Roman times. The application of the principle in the present case can, in my opinion, lead to only one result, namely, that a dissolution of the relation of master and servant occurred in the case of the Coralie Horlock upon the declaration of war between Germany and Britain. The vessel being then in the port of Hamburg, remains there; her master, officers, and crew are interned as prisoners; the voyage and adventure contemplated have been brought to an end. No light is thrown upon the question by illustrations of contracts of service which have been terminated, say, by a bankruptcy or a cessation of business; in such cases the servant, having lost his employment, is able to say: "I am here, willing and able, to render the service contracted for." In the present case these ideas would be fictional: the ship cannot be navigated, no orders in that regard by the master could be obeyed, and the crew, unhappily, is prevented by hostile force from rendering the ship any service whatsoever. In such circumstances I do not see my way to hold the seaman to be entitled in law to wages which, through no fault of the owners, he is entirely unable to earn by service. Such cases, no doubt, will take their rank among the many desolating circumstances which demand remedial attention at the hand of Parliament or the executive power. I think that the appeal should succeed.

LORD PARMOOR.—In this appeal, involving a question of great general importance, I agree with the decision of ROWLATT, J., and of the majority in the Court of Appeal.

In the course of the argument arts. 1 and 2 of the Hague Convention, No. 6 of 1907, were referred to. They are as follows:

"When a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent Powers is at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately or after a number of days' grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass, direct to its port of destination or any port indicated to it. The same principle applied in the case of a ship which has left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war and has entered a port belonging to the enemy while still ignorant that hostilities have broken out."

Then art. 2 :

"A merchant ship which, owing to circumstances beyond its control, may have been unable to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the preceding article, or which was not allowed to leave, may not be confiscated. The belligerent may merely detain it on condition of restoring it after the war without payment of compensation, or he may requisition it on condition of paying of compensation."

The case appears to have been argued on the footing that the vessel was detained in accordance with the conditions of these articles. These articles could not be referred to if they contained provisions inconsistent with the agreed statement of fact, but I think that they are in accord with the said statement, and that there is no objection to the reference which has been made to them in the judgments of the courts below. The respondent has proved, pursuant to s. 143 (2) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, that she is the person mentioned in the allotment note, and that the note was given by the owner or by the master or some other authorised agent. Her husband, therefore, is to be presumed to be duly earning his wages, unless the contrary is shown under sub-s. (2) (d) :

"by such other evidence as the court in their absolute discretion consider sufficient to show satisfactorily that the seaman has ceased to be entitled to the wages out of which the allotment is to be paid."

The question is whether this onus has been discharged. The writ was issued on April 10, 1915, and judgment has been given in favour of the respondent for the amount of the allotment note up to the date of the writ. It is important that this limitation should be observed. My opinion is based on the conditions as they then existed—namely, a detention which had operated from Aug. 4, 1914, to April 10, 1915, and of which the subsequent length was indeterminate and not capable of exact definition.

The first question to be decided is whether, under the conditions stated in the agreed statement of facts, the matter is determined by statutory enactment. It is not suggested that Tom Rea Beal has been discharged abroad under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1906, or that his right to wages has been suspended under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. The relevant section is s. 158, which enacts that where the services of a seaman terminate before the date contemplated in the agreement by reason of the wreck or loss of the ship, or of his being left on shore at any place abroad under a certificate granted as provided by that Act of his unfitness or inability to proceed on the voyage, the seaman shall be entitled to wages up to the time of such termination, but not for any longer period. If there has been a loss of the ship within the meaning of this section the appellant is not liable. It is not necessary to attempt to define exhaustively all the cases which might be included within the term "loss of the ship," but, in my opinion, it does not include such a case as that of the Coralie Horlock, of the possession of which the appellant has been deprived since Aug. 4, 1914, by reason of its detention in the port of Hamburg. The ship has not been lost by any physical accident, such as might have caused a wreck, and there is no evidence that it has been requisitioned by the German authorities, or that there has been any confiscation of ownership. The use of the vessel has been lost for an indeterminate time. I doubt whether the loss of the use of the vessel comes in any sense within the words "loss of the ship" in s. 158 of the Act, 1894. It is not necessary to decide this point. There is no finding in the agreed statement of facts which could justify the inference that, owing to its detention, the ship has no longer a commercial value, or that the expense incurred, or to be incurred, in not abandoning her, is such that no man as a matter of business would incur the outlay.

I am in agreement with ROWLATT, J., when he said ([1915] 3 K.B. at p. 208):

"Now, what I have stated with regard to the position of the ship in Hamburg under the Hague Convention, if it is right, negatives any question as to the loss of the ship. She is there; the property in her has not changed; she is simply detained, and apart altogether from what was said in Sivewright v. Allen (27), which was cited to me, it is impossible to hold that the ship is lost."

It was argued on behalf of the appellant that, although s. 158 was not exhaustive of the cases in which a seaman was entitled to wages up to a given time, but not for any longer period, yet that the section did cover and was intended to cover, a case such as the present, in which if the seaman is no longer entitled to his wages it is by reason of the alleged loss of the ship. I think that there is good reason for this contention, but I prefer to place my opinion on wider grounds. Assuming that s. 158 has no application, Tom Rea Beal was, in my opinion, entitled to the payment of his wages up to the date of the issue of the writ on the construction of the contract of service, and the respondent succeeds in her claim as allottee.

The articles, which contain the contract of service, make no express reference to the contingency which has happened, and which is said to have dissolved the contract and to have defeated any claim to wages. The detention of the vessel, and the imprisonment of the mariners, did render it impossible in fact for Tom Rea Beal to be in a position to perform the duties of his service as a mariner, but this condition was not brought about by any default on his part, and there is no suggestion of disobedience to any command or to any refusal on his part to do his duty. Whether under such circumstances the contract is dissolved, or a claim to wages under the contract is defeated, depends on the bargain of the parties as expressed or implied in the contract which they have made. If the events which have happened subsequent to the date of the contract, and operate to make its performance no longer possible, are of such a nature and character that they can reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the contracting parties at the time when the contract was made, then the subsequent contingency does not dissolve the contract or release either party from a continuing liability under the contract. Even though the general liability under the contract continues, the claim of a plaintiff may be defeated by proof of non-compliance with any one or more of the special contract stipulations. An illustration arises in the leading case of Beale v. Thompson (2). One of the arguments urged on behalf of the defendant in that case was that the articles contained a special stipulation against mariners going on shore, under any pretence, before the voyage was ended, without the leave of the commanding officer on board, and that the plaintiff had gone on shore in contravention of this stipulation. LORD ELLENBOROUGH having found that the freight had been earned, and that the contract had not been dissolved, says (4 East, at p. 562) that "the only remaining question necessary to be decided in order to perfect the plaintiff's claim to have his wages paid out of that fund [i.e., freight] is:

Has his service as a mariner under his articles been duly performed by him?"

The special verdict of the jury had found that the plaintiff did his duty as a seaman during the voyage, but it was said that the facts stated in the special verdict showed that during a considerable period of the time, for which the wages are claimed, the master was out of possession of the vessel, and the crew were all marched up the country and detained as prisoners. LORD ELLENBOROUGH held that the stipulation in the articles that the plaintiff should not be on shore under any pretence before the voyage was ended without the leave of his commanding officer on board did not apply to a case of imprisonment, and must be understood as being on shore by the party's own unauthorised act. In the present case there is no question of the breach of a special stipulation in the articles, such as would defeat the claim to wages, if the contract is not dissolved. It was further held in Beale v. Thompson (2) that if the imprisonment on shore could be considered as a breach of the stipulations in the articles, such breach had been remedied by the subsequent action of the master, but this alternative finding does not affect the principle of the decision, and is not applicable in the present case.

The question, therefore, to be determined is whether the detention of the vessel and the imprisonment of the mariners have dissolved the contract of service. The general rule of the common law is that a contract is not dissolved, or the parties excused from their obligations, in cases in which the performance has become impossible, owing to conditions which have only become operative subsequent to the contract date. The object of this rule of construction is to give effect to the intention of the contracting parties as expressed in their contract, and it is not applicable if a contrary intention is expressed or implied in a particular contract. In a mariner's contract for wages it has been held in a decision confirmed in this House (Beale v. Thompson (2)) that the hostile detention of the vessel and the internment of the crew do not of themselves dissolve the contract of service, and this decision appears to have been uniformly recognised. In Beale v. Thompson (2) the vessel was detained by hostile seizure for a period of about six months and then released. The voyage was continued, and the freight had been specifically earned and received by the owners of the vessel. At this date the doctrine that freight was the mother of wages prevailed, and it was necessary that freight should be earned before a claim to wages could be made good. This condition having been fulfilled, it became necessary to decide whether the detention of the vessel and the imprisonment of the mariners dissolved the contract of service on which the seaman relied for his claim. LORD ELLENBOROUGH, in his judgment, draws a distinction between detention and capture, and holds that detention, as distinguished from capture, did not defeat the plaintiff's claim to wages. It should be noted that this decision was given in reference to a detention which had lasted for a period of about six months and had terminated; but if the detention of the vessel and the imprisonment of the mariners had of themselves operated to dissolve the contract, such contract would have been dissolved as at the date of the commencement of the detention and imprisonment, and there would have been a severance between such contract and any contract subsequently entered into by the master when the vessel was released. This decision was brought before this House by writ of error, and confirmed. The Journals of this House contain the order made:

"That the said judgment be in all things affirmed, and that it stand in full force and virtue notwithstanding the causes and matters aforesaid as above assigned in error."

I am unable to draw any material distinction between the relevant facts in Beale v. Thompson (2) and the agreed facts of this case. In Beale v. Thompson (2) the vessel was unable to leave the port and continue her voyage by reason of hostile detention by the Russian authorities, and in this case by reason of hostile detention by the German authorities. In each case there is a hostile seizure, which LORD ELLENBOROUGH distinguishes from capture. In Beale v. Thompson (2) the mariners were removed from the ship and imprisoned on land; in the present case the crew were first removed to a lodging ship at Hamburg, and subsequently, on or about Nov. 8, were interned at Ruhleben, near Berlin.

The earlier case of Pratt v. Cuff (3) is referred to in Thompson v. Rowcroft (28). In this case a vessel was captured by the Dutch and carried to Delfzeil. The plaintiff was confined on board ship for seven months and subsequently in Haerlingen prison until Jan. 23 in the following year, when the vessel and the plaintiff were released. The jury found in favour of the plaintiff for wages during the period of his imprisonment, subject to the opinion of the court. At a subsequent trial the jury found that the freight had been received by the defendant. LORD KENYON is said to have expressed so strong an opinion for the plaintiff that the case was never afterwards pressed by the defendant.

In Hadley v. Clarke (21) the defendants had contracted to carry goods from Liverpool to Leghorn. On the arrival of the vessel at Falmouth an embargo was laid on her for an indeterminate period, "until the further Order of Council." It was held that even after two years, when the embargo was taken off, the defendants were answerable in damages for the non-performance of the contract. The report shows that it was argued on behalf of the defendant that the case fell within the rule that when a contract which was possible and legal at the time of making it became afterwards impossible by the act of God, or illegal by an instrument of the State, the obligation is discharged. This argument was not accepted by the court as referable to a contract of this character, and LORD KENYON bases his judgment on the general proposition "that a temporary interruption of a voyage by an embargo does not put an end to such a contract as this." LORD KENYON further expresses the opinion that no line can be drawn dependent on the duration of the embargo; but it is not necessary to indorse so wide a proposition in the present instance. This decision was given on a contract of carriage, and not on a contract of service, but the principle and reasoning are equally applicable to a contract of service.

This case was referred to both in the judgment of BRAMWELL, B., and the dissentient judgment of CLEASBY, B., in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., but its authority is not impugned. In the judgment of BRAMWELL, B., it is said: "It may safely be said that there the question was wholly different from the present." CLEASBY, B., quotes with approval (L.R. 10 C.P. at p. 135) a passage from the judgment of BOVILL, C.J., in the court below:

"I have no difficulty in subscribing to the doctrine laid down in Hadley v. Clarke (21) that a common embargo does not put an end to any contract between the parties, but is to be considered as a temporary suspension of the contract only, and that the parties must submit to whatever inconvenience may arise thereon, unless they have provided against it by the terms of their contract. . . . The principle of Hadley v. Clarke (21) is that an embargo is a circumstance against which it is equally competent for the parties to provide as against dangers of the sea, and, therefore, if they do not provide against it, they must abide by the consequences of their contract."

In Delamainer v. Winteringham (4), the plaintiff claimed to receive wages during a hostile embargo in a foreign port, while he was imprisoned on shore on proof—which was then necessary—that the voyage had been completed and the freight earned. Objection was taken that the nature of the embargo had not been proved. LORD ELLENBOROUGH, however, gave judgment for the plaintiff, presuming the fact that the embargo was not of such a nature as to put an end to the contract between the master and owners of the ship and the mariner, and finding that there was no severance of service.

I am unable to find any case in conflict with the principle laid down by LORD ELLENBOROUGH and confirmed in this House in Beale v. Thompson (2), but I have not overlooked the cases quoted in the argument before your Lordships. In Melville v. De Wolf (10), it was held that where a seaman had been sent home as a witness against his captain on a trial for shooting one of the crew, there was a complete dissolution of the contract of service, and no claim for wages could be maintained. In this case, however, a distinction was drawn between such a dissolution of the contract of service and a temporary detention. LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., in his judgment (4 E. & B. at pp. 849, 850), expressly approves Beale v. Thompson (2):

"We are certainly bound by the case of Beale v. Thompson (2) . . . we entirely approve of that decision; for there nothing had occurred to dissolve the

A contract, and the relation constituted between the parties when the ship's articles were signed might well be considered as enduring till the return of the ship to England. The ship was only detained under an embargo, which in its nature is only a temporary act, and it might have been removed at any time from day to day."

B In The Friends (11), SIR WILLIAM SCOTT says in his judgment (4 Ch. Rob. at p. 144):

C In The Governor Raffles (29), SIR WILLIAM SCOTT says (2 Dods. at p. 17):

"The moment the capture is effected by an enemy the crew are discharged from their duty to their employers."

D It is not necessary, however, to refer to further cases of a similar character, since, whatever may be the result of a hostile capture, LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Beale v. Thompson (2) draws the distinction between the case of capture and the case of detention.

The opinion above expressed finds strong confirmation in a passage from the judgment of KENNEDY, L.J., in The Olympic (1) ([1913] P. at p. 111), which is quoted in the judgment of SWINFEN-EADY, L.J.:

E "The embargo which prevents a laden ship from proceeding from port on her voyage does not dissolve the mariner's engagement, any more than it dissolves the contract between the shipowner and the merchant whose cargo has been loaded."

KENNEDY, L.J., then refers to a passage in LORD TENTERDEN'S LAW OF MERCHANT SHIPS AND SEAMEN (5th Edn., 1827), p. 450; (14th Edn., 1901), p. 252, and says:

F "In this sentence one of the greatest of judicial authorities, on matters of shipping, clearly indicates his opinion, even in the case of the embargo of a laden ship, i.e., in the case of an obstacle to the prosecution of the voyage imposed by the Government, an obstacle of indefinite and unascertainable duration (which the detention for repairs is not), that, while in his own interest, and in order to save himself the risk of expense, it may be a reasonable, and, indeed, a very prudent, step on the part of the shipowner to discharge the greater part of the crew, yet, if that step is taken, the shipowner must compensate those whom he so discharges for the loss of the wages during the unfulfilled residue of the contract period, unless, as is likely enough, they find equally remunerative employment in another ship. And I may add that what is true of an embargo by the government to which the ship belongs is true also of the seizure for a temporary purpose by a hostile Power."

H I think that the claim of the allottee is good, and that, up to the date of issue of the writ, there was no severance of service under the contract, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

I LORD WRENBURY.—The respondent is entitled to one-half her husband's wages if any. The question for decision is whether after Aug. 4, 1914, or some later date, the husband is entitled to wages. The appellant denies that he is entitled to wages after Aug. 4, 1914. He founds himself upon either s. 158 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, or upon the common law or the law merchant as applicable to the case of a seaman if, as he contends, the statute has not rendered that law inapplicable.

I may dispose of the question upon s. 158 in few words. It was decided in The Olympic (1) that there is a "wreck of the ship" within the section where the vessel has suffered such physical damage by a casualty in the nature of wreck as that she has ceased to be in a seaworthy condition to continue with a reasonable time the adventure as a commercial adventure. The same, I think, is true of the word "loss" in the section. If there have been such a loss as that the adventure has failed as a commercial adventure the section, I think, applies. But it remains to determine the meaning of the word "loss." It is confined, I think, to physical loss. The wreck and the loss referred to in the section I understand to be a physical injury if it be a wreck and a physical loss if it be a loss. Upon the evidence in this case the ship was at Hamburg on Aug. 4. She was still there on Nov. 2; there is no evidence as to what has happened to her since. She may be there, she may not. She may be in existence, she may not. She has not, so far as appears, been confiscated. If Germany has obeyed the Hague Convention she will not have been confiscated. I make no assumption that Germany will have obeyed the Hague Convention. It suffices to say that the appellant has not proved confiscation. The result is that the appellant has proved, not that the ship has been physically destroyed, or injured, or that the property in the ship has been taken from him, but only that from Aug. 4, 1914, to the present time he has been deprived of the use of her. In my judgment detention or deprivation of use is not loss within s. 158. It follows that, in my opinion, s. 158 does not apply. So far I think the respondent is right.

The respondent next began by contending that s. 158 is exhaustive—that if that section offer no defence the seaman is entitled to his wages. This seems to me an impossible contention. When a statute provides that in certain events a certain result shall ensue, it is plainly not enacting what is to result in other events. The contention was then modified, and was that the section is exhaustive in the cases with which it deals. This may be, and I think is true, but it leaves the matter where it was. Upon my view of the word "loss" the section does not deal with the case before the House. It follows that the section does not exclude the common law or the law merchant in the case of seamen.

Where a contract has been entered into, and by a supervening cause beyond the control of either party its performance has become impossible, I take the law to be as follows. If a party has expressly contracted to do a lawful act, come what will—if, in other words, he has taken upon himself the risk of such a supervening cause he is liable if it occurs, because by the very hypothesis he has contracted to be liable. But if he has not expressly so contracted, and from the nature of the contract it appears that the parties from the first must have known that its fulfilment would become impossible if such a supervening cause occurred, then upon such a cause occurring both parties are excused from performance. In that case a condition is implied that if performance becomes impossible the contract shall not remain binding. The leading case on the subject is Taylor v. Caldwell (5). Krell v. Henry (9) is an illustration of the application of the principle. On Aug. 4, 1914, there occurred, in the case of this ship, a supervening cause which resulted in the impossibility of continuing that adventure which was the subject of the seaman's contract of May 21, 1914, and that impossibility has continued for such a time as that its character, which might have proved to be temporary, is now known to be for a time so indefinite and so long that the adventure which was the whole basis of the contract has failed. The case falls, I think, within the principle of Taylor v. Caldwell (5). Melville v. De Wolf (10) is a like case. The plaintiff there was taken from his employment and sent home by the order of a court, and, as LORD CAMPBELL, C.J., put it, the contract was "dissolved by the supreme authority of the State." The plaintiff was not entitled to wages from the date when he was taken away from the ship and his services closed.

The respondent's counsel was, I think, not prepared to contend that if this had been the case, not of a mariner, but of a commercial traveller, subsequent wages could have been claimed. But the case of a mariner, he contends, stands in a different position. Chandler v. Grieves (30) was a case of a seaman disabled by accident while on board, who was held entitled nevertheless to payment of

A his wages for the whole voyage. The case establishes very little for the present purpose. Section 160 of the Act of 1894 seems to assume—and, I think, to assume rightly—that a seaman incapable by illness to perform his duty is nevertheless entitled to his wages during the continuance of the adventure in which, by the terms of the employment, he took part. On the other hand The Friends (11) is authority that when the ship is captured and the seaman taken from the vessel his wages cease, and that even if the ship be recaptured his case is not bettered if he has been taken from the vessel and renders no service after the recapture. Wiggins v. Ingleton (18), which was the case of a seaman taken by the press gang, and The Governor Raffles (29), where the ship had been taken by mutineers, are authorities to the same effect, although the latter is in point only for the dictum of SIR WILLIAM SCOTT (2 Dods. at p. 17) that

C “the moment capture is effected the crew are discharged from their duty to their employers, and the contract between the parties is at an end.”

D Reverting to the statute, the respondent relies on s. 134. I fail to see that the section helps her. Section 134 (a) speaks of the event that the seaman “lawfully leaves the ship at the end of his engagement.” These words do not cover the event of the seaman being forcibly removed by the enemy from his employment and from the ship. Section 134 (c) provides that the seaman’s wages shall continue to run unless the delay to make payment of his wages is due “to any other cause not being the wrongful act or default of the owner or master.” The cause here was an extraneous and supervening cause, and was not any wrongful act or default of the owner or master. Then s. 143 is cited. By sub-s. (2) of that section it is provided in favour of the allottee of wages that

E “the seaman shall be presumed to be duly earning his wages, unless the contrary is shown to the satisfaction of the court . . . (d) by such other evidence as the court in their absolute discretion consider sufficient to show satisfactorily that the seaman has ceased to be entitled to the wages out of which the allotment is to be paid.”

F This simply throws the onus of proof on the employer.

G Beale v. Thompson (2) was a case decided when the doctrine prevailed that “freight is the mother of wages,” a doctrine which has been brought to an end by statute: see s. 157 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894; and it was a case in which the seaman—after the detention of the vessel was over—took part in her voyage home. The decision involves no more than this, that if the adventure is ultimately carried to a conclusion the seaman is entitled to his wages for the whole period. Delamainer v. Winteringham (4) is similar. In Hadley v. Clarke (21) there was no finding that the adventure had been frustrated. For the purpose of the decision I may take it that the plaintiff did not care when his goods reached Leghorn so long as they got there. The defendants contracted to take them there and failed to do so. The plaintiff, therefore, recovered damages. In Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (15) BRAMWELL, B., points out the grounds upon which the decision can be supported. It is, I think, no authority for the general proposition that a contract of marine adventure remains binding when a supervening cause has rendered it impossible to perform it within such a time as that the adventure can be fulfilled as a commercial adventure. When this vessel was detained at Hamburg on Aug. 4, 1914, the owner was deprived, and he has ever since remained deprived, of the use of her. On Aug. 5, if her current charter had been at an end, he could not have offered her to a new charterer for he could not have ensured that he could deliver possession of her under the charter, and events have shown that in fact he could not have done so. The contract with the seaman for employment on the ship for not exceeding two years from May 21, 1914, was a contract while the owner from no fault of his own was unable to fulfil. As from Aug. 4 the adventure had become impossible and the contract, in my judgment, ceased to be binding. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider the latter date of Nov. 2, when the seaman was removed from the vessel to another vessel for detention, or that of Nov. 8, when he was removed to Ruhleben. If anything more was wanted, I think it clear that the seaman (for no fault of his own it is true) was at those dates taken by superior authority from the place of his employment and from the possibility of performing his service. Melville v. De Wolf (10) is authority against his claim as from those dates. From what I have said it follows that I cannot agree with the learned judge who tried the case or with the majority in the Court of Appeal. In my judgment, this appeal must be allowed.

F. A. TAMPLIN STEAMSHIP CO., LTD. v. ANGLO-MEXICAN PETROLEUM PRODUCTS CO., LTD.

32 T.L.R. 677; 13 Asp. M.L.C. 467; 21 Com. Cas. 299]

Contract—Frustration—Charterparty—Implication of term—Continued existence of thing or state of things—Impossibility of performance going to root of consideration.

PER EARL LOREBURN: A court can, and ought to, examine a contract and the circumstances in which it was made, not to vary, but to explain, it, to see whether or not from its nature the parties must have made their bargain on the footing that a particular thing or state of things would continue to exist. If they must have done so, a term to that effect will be implied, though it be not expressed in the contract. Such a term can only be implied where the discontinuance is such as to upset altogether the purpose of the contract.

PER VISCOUNT HALDANE: When people enter into a contract which is dependent for the possibility of its performance on the continued availability of a specific thing, and that availability comes to an end by reason of circumstances beyond the control of the parties, the contract is regarded as dissolved. The contingency which has arisen is treated, in the absence of a contrary intention made plain, as being one about which no bargain at all was made. The principle applies equally whether performance of the contract has not commenced or has in part taken place.

PER LORD ATKINSON: If the impossibility to perform or continue to perform the contract goes to the root of the consideration, both parties are released from their engagements.

PER LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON: The principle which underlies all cases in which a contract has been held to determine on the happening of some event which renders its performance impossible or otherwise frustrates the objects which the parties to the contract have in view is one of contract law depending on some term or condition to be implied in the contract itself and not on something entirely dehors the contract which brings the contract to an end.

It is, of course, impossible to imply in a contract any term or condition inconsistent with its express provisions, or with the intention of the parties as gathered from those provisions.

By a charterparty dated May 18, 1912, the owners of the tank steamer F. A. Tamplin chartered the steamer to charterers for sixty calendar months, i.e., from Dec. 4, 1912, until Dec. 4, 1917, at a specified hire for voyages between named ports. The charterparty provided that the owners would provide officers and crew, with their provisions and wages, and would maintain the ship in an efficient state. The captain was put under the order and direction of the charterers, and was to be furnished by them with all requisite instructions and sailing directions. By cl. 19, if the vessel be lost, the hire was to cease, and by cl. 20, inter alia, arrest and restraint of princes, rulers, and peoples, were excepted. On Feb. 15, 1915, the ship was requisitioned by the British government for war service, and the requisition was continuing in July, 1916.

Held by LORD BUCKMASTER, L.C., EARL LOREBURN, and LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON, VISCOUNT HALDANE and LORD ATKINSON dissenting, applying the above principles to the construction of the charterparty, the requisition of the steamer did not put an end to the charterparty.

Appeal by the shipowners from the decision of the Court of Appeal (LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., and BANKES and WARRINGTON, L.J.J.), which affirmed a

A judgment of ATKIN, J., upon an award stated in the form of a Special Case by an arbitrator.

The facts are stated in the headnote and their Lordships' opinions.

Sir R. Finlay, K.C., MacKinnon, K.C., and R. A. Wright for the respondents.

B The House took time for consideration.

July 24, 1916. The following opinions were read.

C EARL LOREBURN.—The tank steamer, F. A. Tamplin, was chartered by the respondents for five years. She was to be managed and controlled by the owners, but the use to be made of her in carrying merchandise within prescribed limitations depended upon the direction of the charterers. From December, 1912, till December, 1914, she was employed accordingly. From that date till the hearing of the case she has been employed by His Majesty's government for purposes connected with the war. There are, therefore, nineteen months of the five years unexpired. No one knows how long the government will continue to use this vessel, but, so long as they do use her, neither party to the contract can carry out their common adventure. It may be as well to say that the first requisition of this ship was in December, 1914, and the second in February, 1915, but she was not released from the day she was first taken over. In these circumstances the owners maintain that the award of the arbitrator, MR. LECK, K.C., holding that this charterparty came to an end when the steamer was requisitioned in February, 1915, is right.

E In order to decide this question it is necessary to ascertain the principle of law which underlies the authorities. I believe it to be as follows. When a lawful contract has been made and there is no default, a court of law has no power to discharge either party from the performance of it unless either the rights of someone else or some Act of Parliament give the necessary jurisdiction. But a court can, and ought to, examine the contract and circumstances in which it was made, not, of course, to vary, but only to explain, it, in order to see whether or not from the nature of it the parties must have made their bargain on the footing that a particular thing or state of things would continue to exist. If they must have done so, then a term to that effect will be implied, though it be not expressed in the contract. In applying this rule it is manifest that such a term can rarely be implied except where the discontinuance is such as to upset altogether the purpose of the contract. Some delay or some change is very common in all human affairs, and it cannot be supposed that any bargain has been made on the tacit condition that such a thing will not happen in any degree. In Horlock v. Beal (1) this House considered the law upon this subject, and previous decisions were fully reviewed, especially in the opinion delivered by LORD ATKINSON. An examination of those decisions confirms me in the view that, when our courts have held innocent contracting parties absolved from further performance of their promises, it has been upon the ground that there was an implied term in the contract which entitled them to be absolved. Sometimes it is put that performance has become impossible and that the party concerned did not promise to perform an impossibility. Sometimes it is put that the parties contemplated a certain state of things which fell out otherwise. In most of the cases it is said that there was an implied condition in the contract which operated to release the parties from performing it, and in all of them I think that was at bottom the principle upon which the court proceeded. It is, in my opinion, the true principle, for no court has an absolving power, but it can infer from the nature of the contract and the surrounding circumstances that a condition which is not expressed was a foundation on which the parties contracted.

I When this question arises in regard to commercial contracts, as happened in Dahl v. Nelson, Donkin & Co. (2), Geipel v. Smith (3), and Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (4), the principle is the same, and the language used as to

"frustration of the adventure" merely adapts it to the class of cases in hand. In all these three cases it was held, to use the language of LORD BLACKBURN (6 App. Cas. at p. 52),

"that a delay in carrying out a charterparty, caused by something for which neither party was responsible, if so great and long as to make it unreasonable to require the parties to go on with the adventure, entitled either of them, at least while the contract was executory, to consider it at end."

That seems to me another way of saying that from the nature of the contract it cannot be supposed the parties, as reasonable men, intended it to be binding on them under such altered conditions. Were the altered conditions such that, had they thought of them, they would have taken their chance of them, or such that as sensible men they would have said: "If that happens, of course it is all over between us"? What, in fact, was the true meaning of the contract? Since the parties have not provided for the contingency, ought a court to say it is obvious they would have treated the thing as at an end?

Applying the principle to the present case, I find that these contracting parties stipulated for the use of this ship during a period of five years, which would naturally cover the duration of many voyages. Certainly both sides expected that these years would be years of peace. They also expected, no doubt, that they would be left in joint control of the ship, as agreed, and that they would not be deprived of it by any act of State. But I cannot say that the continuance of peace or freedom from any interruption in their use of the vessel was a tacit condition of this contract. On the contrary, one at all events of the parties might probably have thought, if he thought of it at all, that war would enhance the value of the contract, and both would have been considerably surprised to be told that interruption for a few months was to release them both from a time charter that was to last five years. On the other hand, if the interruption can be pronounced, in the language of LORD BLACKBURN already cited, "so great and long as to make it unreasonable to require the parties to go on with the adventure," then it would be different. Both of them must have contracted on the footing that such an interruption as that would not take place, and I should imply a condition to that effect. Taking into account, however, all that has happened, I cannot infer that the interruption either has been or will be in this case such as makes it unreasonable to require the parties to go on. There may be many months during which this ship will be available for commercial purposes before the five years have expired. It might be a valuable right for the charterer during those months to have the use of this ship at the stipulated freight. Why should he be deprived of it? No one can say that he will or that he will not regain the use of the ship, for it depends upon contingencies which are incalculable. The owner will continue to receive the freight he bargained for so long as the contract entitles him to it, and if, during the time for which the charterer is entitled to the use of the ship, the owner received from the government any sums of money for the use of her he will be accountable to the charterer. Should the upshot of it all be loss to either party, and I do not suppose it will be so, then each will lose according as the action of the Crown has deprived either of the benefit he would otherwise have derived from the contract. It may be hard on them as it was on the plaintiff in Appleby v. Myers (5). The violent interruption of a contract always may damage one or both of the contracting parties. Any interruption does so. Loss may arise to someone whether it be decided that these people are or that they are not still bound by the charterparty. But the test for answering that question is not the loss that either may sustain. It is this: Ought we to imply a condition in the contract that an interruption such as this shall excuse the parties from further performance of it? I think not. I think they took their chance of lesser interruptions and the condition I should imply goes no further than that they should be excused if substantially the whole contract became impossible of performance, or.

A in other words, impracticable, by some cause for which neither was responsible. Accordingly I am of opinion that this charterparty did not come to an end when the steamer was requisitioned and that the requisition did not suspend it or affect the rights of the owners or charterers under it, and that the appeal fails. If it were established that this ship would be used by the government for substantially the remainder of the five years, I should be of a different opinion. LORD BUCKMASTER, L.C., desires me to say he concurs in the judgment prepared by LORD PARKER.

C VISCOUNT HALDANE.—The general principles by which this appeal must be decided do not appear to me to be difficult of ascertainment. The real uncertainty in the case lies in their application. As to this it is with reluctance that I find myself differing from the conclusions at which others of your Lordships have arrived.

D When people enter into a contract which is dependent for the possibility of its performance on the continued availability of a specific thing, and that availability comes to an end by reason of circumstances beyond the control of the parties, the contract is regarded as dissolved. The contingency which has arisen is treated, in the absence of a contrary intention made plain, as being one about which no bargain at all was made. The principle applies equally whether performance of the contract has not commenced or has in part taken place. There may be included in the terms of the contract itself a stipulation which provides for the merely partial or temporary suspension of certain of its obligations, should some event (such, for instance, as in the case of the charterparty under consideration, restraint of princes) so happen as to impede performance. In that case the question arises whether the event which has actually made the specific thing no longer available for performance is such that it can be regarded as being of a nature sufficiently limited to fall within the suspensory stipulation, and to admit of the contract being deemed to have provided for it and to have been intended to continue for other purposes. Although the words of the stipulation may be such that the mere letter would describe what has occurred, the occurrence itself may yet be of a character and extent so sweeping that the foundation of what the parties are deemed to have had in contemplation has disappeared, and the contract itself has vanished with that foundation. If the course of events can be regarded as consistent with the continuance of the contract, it will follow that when the event possesses the more limited character there will, under the terms of the special stipulation be mere suspension of particular rights and duties which would otherwise arise under the general terms agreed on. The circumstance that the contract is one, not for a single service, but for a succession of such services, to continue for a definite time, is a relevant fact in considering whether there is a mere temporary suspension. And where the interruption is simply one of an interim character and likely to cease so soon as to leave the rest of the period stipulated free for the revival of the rights and duties of the parties after what amounts to no more than a temporary cessation of the power of performance, then, not only where there is an express stipulation covering the case which has occurred but possibly even where there is no such stipulation, the contract may be regarded as not destroyed, but only suspended. The question must always turn mainly on the facts. But if the facts be such that it appears that the power of performance has been wholly swept away to such an extent that there is no longer in view a definite prospect of this power being restored, then the contract must be looked upon as being wholly dissolved, and the courts cannot take any course which would in reality impose new and different terms on the parties. On the general principle there is a long series of authorities, extending from the decision of Paradine v. Jane (6), more than two centuries ago, through such cases as Taylor v. Caldwell (7) down to the recent appeal to this House in Horlock v. Beal (1), in which last case many of the previous authorities were considered and classified.

In the main the decisions given are consistent, although there are dicta which are not everywhere easy to reconcile. But the differences in expression which these authorities disclose do not affect the fundamental principles which they recognise, and I think that what I have ventured to state as the law is in accordance with the weight of judicial opinion. It is important to endeavour to formulate these principles in a case like the present, where the task of the tribunal is essentially one of ascertaining the true bearing on the particular facts of the case.

To these facts I now turn. By a charterparty dated May 18, 1912, on which the question arises, the owners of the tank steamer F. A. Tamplin agreed to let the steamer to the respondents as charterers for sixty calendar months from the date at which she was placed at the disposal of the latter, a term which would expire on Dec. 4, 1917. The steamer was to be employed "in such lawful trades for voyages between any safe port or ports in the United Kingdom and/or continent of Europe and/or any safe port or ports in the United States of America and/or Mexico and/or North and South America and/or Africa and/or Asia and/or Australasia and back, finally to a coal port in the United Kingdom, for the carriage of refined petroleum and/or crude oil and/or its products, but warranted no B.N.A. or Atlantic except for coaling; warranted no Baltic between Oct. 1 and April 1; warranted no White Sea between Oct. 1 and April 1, as charterers or his agents shall direct,"

on certain conditions. Among these was that the charterers should pay £1,750, reducible later on to £1,700, a month, that on the last voyage the charterers should, if the vessel had been carrying other than refined oil or spirit, clean the vessel, and load a cargo of refined oil or spirit on that voyage under the charter; that no goods contraband of war were to be shipped, and the vessel was not to be required to enter any port which was blockaded or where hostilities were in progress; that no voyage was to be undertaken or goods or cargoes loaded which would involve risk of seizure, capture, or penalty by British or foreign rulers, and no acids or cargoes injurious to the steamer were to be shipped; that the charterers were to have the option of subletting the steamer to the Admiralty or other service without prejudice to the charterparty, but the charterers to remain responsible. The owners were to provide and pay the crew and for stores and maintenance. Any dispute arising during the execution of the charterparty was to be settled by arbitration. It is, of course, obvious that, although the contract was described as one of lease, there was and could have been no lease properly so called. The real relation was that the owners retained through the officers and crew the possession of the vessel, and that the charterers were entitled to use it for certain purposes and under certain restrictions during a term of five years. There was another important clause in the charterparty to which I have to refer. This was the usual one providing that certain perils should be excepted. These perils included "arrests and restraints of princes, rulers, and people." The effect of the clause was that if and to the extent to which the perils mentioned interfered with the fulfilment of their obligations the parties were exempted from liability for non-performance.

Early in December, 1914, the steamer was requisitioned by the British government for Admiralty transport service and was engaged in such service until about Feb. 10, 1915. No question has been raised as to this requisition, which appears to have been accepted by both parties as a merely temporary burden upon their rights under the charterparty. But about the latter date notice was given by the Admiralty Director of Transports to the charterers that the steamer was again requisitioned and that she would be specially fitted by the government for the service on which she was to be employed. This was done shortly thereafter, and the government made structural alterations, and used her for the transport of troops. She has since then, according to what was stated at the Bar, been in part at all events restored to something resembling her original condition, and

A has been used for the carriage of oil. But I think it is clear that the Admiralty neither regarded their powers as in any way restricted, nor had any intention of limiting the period during which they claimed to use the steamer. Had the charterers done what the government has done, their action would have constituted such a breach of contract as would have entitled the owners to treat the contract as at an end.

B In these circumstances a dispute arose between the owners and the charterers as to their rights, and this dispute was, under the arbitration clause, referred to Mr. LECK, K.C. The owners claimed that what had happened could not be treated as a subletting under the contract, but that the basis of the contract was gone, inasmuch as the steamer could no longer be made available under the charterparty, which was therefore either entirely at an end or was indefinitely suspended under the restraint of princes clause. The charterers argued that in reality there had been what was tantamount to a subletting to the Admiralty, and that the uses by the latter for purposes outside those prescribed by the charterparty, and the making of the structural alterations, did not amount to breaches of contract by the charterers, inasmuch as they were covered by the restraint of princes clause. If the charterers were right it would no doubt follow that they would be entitled to retain the largely increased monthly payment which the government has been making for the use of the steamer, paying to the owners only the monthly sum stipulated for by the charterparty. If the owners, on the other hand, were right, the charterers would be able to claim compensation from the government for loss of rights under the terms of a general proclamation issued by the latter, but the owners would be the persons entitled to the hire paid by the Admiralty for the steamer to the use of which the charterers would no longer be entitled. The question of compensation was not, however, raised before the arbitrator, and it is not before us. The only point referred was whether the charterparty was brought to an end or at all events fully suspended by the second requisition and what was done under it. The arbitrator decided this question in the affirmative, but stated a Special Case. On the argument of this Special Case, ATKIN, J., and the Court of Appeal differed from him, and gave judgments to the effect that the contract remained in existence, and that the restraint of princes clause kept the contract alive while precluding the owners from insisting that the diversion of use and alteration of structure were breaches for which the charterers could be held responsible.

G It may well be that, at all events where there is such a clause, in the case of a time charter with a substantial period yet to run, an event might occur which, while it temporarily interfered with its performance, would not destroy its existence. On the other hand, in the case of a charter for a single voyage, the same event might be sufficient to destroy the very basis in the case of voyage charter when it would not have been sufficient to destroy that of a time charter. The question in each case is one of the application of the general principles to which I referred earlier to the facts and circumstances of the particular case, and I think that similar considerations must govern the question whether what has happened in the present case can be regarded as falling within the meaning of the restraint of princes clause. That clause may apply to mere structural alterations made by a government. It is a more difficult question whether it can cover a taking possession which may, so far as appears, outlast the period of the charter. In one aspect the act of the government may come within the clause, but in another and equally important aspect it may mean so much more that by destroying the possibility of performing the contract as a whole it destroys the applicability of the clause. In the case before us I am, accordingly, of opinion that, if the conclusion is once reached that the requisition was of such a character that it would otherwise supersede or indefinitely suspend the contract, the special clause cannot assist the charterers. Now it is no doubt true that the charter was to remain in force until Dec. 4, 1917. But the requisition by the Admiralty was one which enabled it to use the steamer for purposes altogether outside the contract, and that for a time to which no limit could be assigned. The time might extend until after the period of the charterparty had run out. It is impossible for any court to speculate as to the duration of the war on which the Admiralty requirements may depend. It is enough that events which are of public notoriety indicate the duration as one about which there is no apparent certainty as to a speedy close of which a court of justice can take cognisance. The question whether the contract was brought to an end must be judged in the light of events as they were in February, 1915. The requisition was of a character so sweeping that I think the burden of showing that the purposes of the charter could continue to subsist concurrently with its operation rested on those who maintained the affirmative. Prima facie the entire basis of the contract, so far as concerned either performance in February, 1915, or performance at any calculable period in the future, seems to me to have been swept away. It might thereafter have proved possible to make a fresh start within what turned out to remain over of the time of the charter. But it equally might not.

I am, therefore, unable to see how the contract can be properly looked on as only temporarily interrupted. Such interruption has a meaning if the restraint of princes clause covers the interrupting event. The clause is introduced for the very purpose of saving the foundation of the contract. But if that foundation is gone the contract is gone and the clause with it. Now the basis of the contract here was that the owners should provide a steamer to be used by the charterers for certain purposes only. The use of the ship and the fulfilment of the purposes are swept away by vis major for a period to which no limit can be assigned. It is possible that under different circumstances and with a period as to which there was an obvious inference of fact that it would in all probability outlast the duration of the war the vis major might have been regarded as a mere temporary interruption which the special clause covered. But it seems to me that the charterers cannot bring their case up to the point at which it is legitimate to draw such an inference. I am, therefore, driven to the conclusion that there was here no mere temporary suspension of a subordinate obligation of the charterers. I think that the entire contract was avoided, and with it the clause providing for restraint of princes, and that the appellants were consequently entitled to judgment.

LORD ATKINSON.—This case came before ATKIN, J., upon an award in the form of a Special Case stated by an arbitrator, and the question for the court to determine was stated to be whether, on the facts stated in the Case, the arbitrator was right in holding that the charterparty dated May 18, 1912, came to an end when the steamer (i.e., the tank steamer F. A. Tamplin) was requisitioned by the British government on Feb. 15, 1915. Your Lordships were informed that this is a test case, and the parties on both sides desired that the House should not confine its attention to the facts found by the arbitrator, but should consider in addition all relevant matters which have taken place since the hearing before him, with a view of determining whether or not this charter has come to an end.

By the charterparty the British tank steamer F. A. Tamplin, in process of being built at the date of the document, was chartered to the respondents for a period of sixty calendar months, commencing from Dec. 4, 1912, and expiring on Dec. 4, 1917, at the hire of £1,750 per calendar month for the first twelve months and £1,700 per month for the remaining forty-eight months. Under the terms of the charterparty the steamer, described as a tank steamer, was to be placed at the disposal of the charterers at Newcastle-on-Tyne, in a dock or place in which she could safely lie afloat, as the charterers should direct immediately on being ready, she being then tight, staunch, and strong, fully equipped with a full complement of officers, seamen, engineers, and firemen necessary for that service. The service for which she was rendered fit and for which she was delivered was this— for voyages between any safe port or ports in the United Kingdom, the continent of Europe, or the seven other countries named, and back finally to a coal port in

A the United Kingdom, for the carriage of refined petroleum or crude oil or its products. It is quite true that the charterers are not, according to the letter of this clause, bound to employ this vessel on the particular service named, but they are bound not to employ her on any other service. They might possibly retain her in dock during the entire period of five years, or any part of it, at a cost of £1,750 or £1,700 per month. But if the parties were not business people, as they are, but merely rational beings, they could not when they entered into the charter-party have contemplated anything of the kind. Whether that be so or not, the contract had secured to the charterers the power to determine whether or not the vessel should be employed in the trade authorised on such voyages as they might select between the ports named, and one of the assumptions upon which I think the contract must have been based was that the charterers should remain free to exercise, as and when they deemed fit, the powers secured to them by their contract. Else why enter into it at all. The same remark applies to the owner. The parties have, no doubt, in one article—art. 20, with which I shall presently deal—specified several instances in which the will and intentions of each of them might be overborne by force majeure, but if one looks through the conditions upon which the contract was made, it will plainly appear that neither party could perform his side of the contract unless he be left a free agent. For instance, the first condition requires that the owners shall provide all provisions and wages for the crew and maintain the ship in a thoroughly efficient state in hull, machinery, and equipment for and during the service. Article 6 requires that the crew, the servants of the owners, for whom they are responsible, shall do certain work in a particular manner, in the process of loading the ship. By art. 2 the charterers are bound to provide and pay for oil fuel, galley coals, port charges, pilotage, &c. By art. 3 the hire is to continue for the time specified for termination of the charter and until the redelivery to the owner (unless lost) at a coal port in the United Kingdom, as provided. By art. 13 the captain, although appointed by the owners, is put under the order and direction of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other arrangements. By art. 12 the captain is bound to prosecute his voyages with the utmost dispatch, and render all customary assistance with ship's crew, winches, and boats, and proceed to sea when ordered, if tide and weather permit. If the charterers have reason to be dissatisfied with the conduct of the captain, officers, or engineers, the owners, on receiving particulars of the complaint should investigate the same and, if necessary, make a change in the appointment. By art. 15 it is provided that the master should be furnished from time to time with all requisite instructions and sailing directions and shall keep a full and correct log of the voyage or voyages, which shall be submitted to the charterers or their agents when required. Thus, by these several articles, and many others which might be referred to, powers are conferred and obligations imposed upon each of the contracting parties, and active duties are required to be performed by each. None of these things can be done unless the charterers retain possession and control of the ship, and both parties retain their freedom of action. It cannot, in my view, be possibly supposed that they by this charter, apart from art. 20, ever intended to enter into an absolute contract to perform the impossible—that is, to exercise these powers, fulfil these obligations, and discharge these duties after the ship, in and upon which all these things were to be done, had been taken possession of by a third party who had lawfully removed her from the control of both of them for a considerable portion of the period of hiring, and might continue so to do for the whole of that period.

I Now I turn to art. 20. It is immediately preceded by art. 19, which provides that "if the vessel be lost the hire is to cease." But why? Surely because the charterers would thereby lose, possibly through one of the excepted perils, such as the act of God or perils of the sea, the thing they had contracted to pay for—namely, the use of the ship. Yet according to the contention of the respondents the hire is not to cease, though they should lose for the entire period of hiring the use of the ship by another of the excepted perils, the restraint of princes. Article A 20 then provides that the "act of God, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, pirates, thieves, arrest and restraint of princes, rulers, and peoples, collisions, strandings, and other accidents of navigation always excepted, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, master mariners, or other servants of the shipowner."

I think it plain that this clause was introduced mainly for the protection of the shipowner. Either party could, however, rely upon it as a defence to an action brought upon the charterparty to recover damages for a breach of contract, consisting in the omission to do an act that party was bound to do if he was prevented from doing it by one of the excepted perils. This, however, is not all. If the act omitted to be done was the performance or non-fulfilment of a condition precedent, then, in addition, the contract might come to an end, and both parties be released from all obligations under it. The fallacy underlying the respondents' contention appears to me to be this, that such a contract can never be put an end to through the operation of one of the excepted perils. The following authorities show, I think, that is not the law.

Two well-known cases, many times approved of and followed, establish, in my view, this proposition. First, Geipel v. Smith (3) and, second, Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (4), decided in the Exchequer Chamber on appeal from the Court of Common Pleas. In the first of these two cases the charterparty contained a clause, somewhat similar to this art. 20, excepting the act of God, Queen's enemies, restraint of princes, rulers, &c. Yet the owners were relieved from their contract to take on board a cargo and carry it to Hamburg, since the port of Hamburg was blockaded by the French fleet, that blockade clearly being a restraint of princes and peoples. BLACKBURN, J., said (L.R. 7 Q.B. at p. 412):

"The defendants, therefore, the shipowners, could not fulfil their contract by delivery of the cargo without running the blockade. I am unable to see why this was not a restraint of princes; it was clearly a restraint of the then Emperor of France, preventing the cargo from being carried to Hamburg. But then comes another question: Conceding that while the blockade lasted there was a restraint—an obstacle to the fulfilment by the defendants of their obligations under the charterparty, it is said that the moment the blockade was raised the ship might have gone off, and therefore she ought to have been ready with her cargo on board to start at any moment. But I cannot agree that, however long the blockade existed—which might be during all the time the war lasted, and therefore might have been for years—the ship and cargo must be ready to sail as soon as wind and weather permitted after the blockade was raised. It would be most inconvenient to give such a construction to the contract, and would be to frustrate the very object of such a contract—namely, the speedy transfer of the shippers' goods and the remunerative employment of the shipowners' vessel."

LUSH, J., said (ibid. at p. 414):

"I think the fifth plea may also be treated as valid. It alleges the breaking-out of war between France and Germany and a blockade of the port of Hamburg. If the impediment had been in its nature temporary, I should have thought the plea bad; but a state of war must be presumed to be likely to continue so long, and so to disturb the commerce of merchants as to defeat and destroy a commercial adventure like this."

In the second of the cases, Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (4)—the action was brought on a policy of insurance effected by the plaintiff on chartered freight valued at £2,900 to be earned by the plaintiff's vessel, the Spirit of Peace, on a voyage at and from Liverpool to Newport, in tow, and thence to San Francisco.

- A By the charter, dated Nov. 22, 1871, entered into between the plaintiff and Messrs. Rathbone & Co., this ship was to proceed with all convenient speed from Liverpool to Newport (dangers and accidents of navigation excepted), and there load a cargo of iron rails for San Francisco. The ship, in performance of her owners' obligation under the charterparty, started on the first stage of her voyage, i.e., from Liverpool to Newport, but, en route, took the rocks in Carnarvon Bay, and was got off after considerable delay much damaged. It is an error to suppose that at the time of the accident the owners' contract was in the position of a merely executory contract. It was, in truth, part performed. The rails were required for the construction of a railway in San Francisco. Time was a matter of importance to the charterers. They, accordingly, immediately threw up the charter and chartered another ship.
- B The defendants, relying on the clause excepting "dangers and accidents of navigation," denied in their defence that there was any loss by a peril insured against. The case was tried before BRETT, J. The jury answered in the affirmative three questions left to them. First, "whether there was a constructive total loss of the ship?" Second, "whether the time necessary for getting the ship off the rocks and repairing her so as to be a cargo-carrying ship was so long as to make it unreasonable for the charterers to supply the agreed cargo at the end of such time"; and third, "whether such time was so long as to put an end to it in a commercial sense, &c." The learned judge being of opinion that there was no evidence of a constructive total loss of the ship, and no evidence of a loss of freight by the perils insured against, directed a verdict to be entered for the defendants, reserving leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for him. A rule nisi having been obtained by the plaintiff to enter a verdict for him, on cause being shown, it was held by KEATING and BRETT, JJ., that the charterers were absolved from loading the vessel, and that the shipowner, therefore, might recover for the loss of the freight. BOVILL, C.J., on the contrary, held that the charterers were not entitled to throw up the charter and consequently the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover against the underwriters, and that the findings of the jury were immaterial.
- E The decision of the majority was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber by BRAMWELL, B., BLACKBURN, MELLOR, and LUSH, JJ., AMPHLETT, B., dissenting. It is, therefore, a case of high authority. The judgment of the majority was delivered by BRAMWELL, B. That distinguished judge points out (L.R. 10 C.P. at p. 144) that as no date was fixed for the arrival of the ship at Newport, it should be held that there was an implied condition in the charterparty that she should arrive within a reasonable time. He then proceeds:

"Now what is the effect of the exception of perils of the seas and of delay caused thereby? Suppose it was not there and not implied, the shipowner would be subject to an action for not arriving in a reasonable time, and the charterers would be discharged. Mr. Benjamin says the exception would be implied. How that is it is not necessary to discuss, as the words are there; but if it is so, it is remarkable as showing what must be implied from the necessity of the case. The words are there. What is their effect? I think it is this. They excuse the shipowner, but give him no right. The charterer has no cause of action, but is released from the charter. When I say he is, I think both are. The condition precedent has not been performed by the default of neither. It is as though the charter were conditional on peace being made between countries A and B, and it was not, or as though the charterer agreed to load a cargo of coals, strike of pitmen excepted. If a strike of probably long duration began, he would be excused from putting the coals on board, and would have no right to call upon the shipowner to wait till the strike was over. The shipowner would be excused from keeping his ship waiting, and have no right to call on the charterer to load at a future time. This seems in accordance with general principles. The exception is an excuse for him who is to do the act, and operates to save him from an action and makes his non-performance not a breach of contract, but does not operate to take away the right the other party would have had, if the non-performance had been a breach of contract, to retire from the engagement. And if one party may, so may the other."

If, therefore, it be an implied condition precedent of the contract in the present case that both the parties to it should not without any default on their respective parts be, by the operation of a force majeure, such as the restraint of princes, deprived for the whole or a substantial portion of this period of five years of all power to exercise the rights or discharge the obligations conferred and imposed by it, the action of the Admiralty destroyed the basis upon which the contract was in the contemplation of the parties based, and in this sense rendered the fulfilment of the condition precedent impossible: see judgment of LORD BLACKBURN in Taylor v. Caldwell (7) (3 B. & S. at p. 833). Article 20 saves each of the parties from a claim for damages for breach of contract at the suit of the other, but it does not deprive either of them of the right to free himself or themselves from the contract on the ground that the basis upon which it rested has been destroyed.

It is only necessary, I think, to cite one authority in addition to those cited in Horlock v. Beal (1). It is Poussard v. Spiers and Pond (8). There the plaintiff agreed in writing with the defendants to sing and play in the chief female part in a new opera about to be brought out at the defendants' theatre at a weekly salary of £11 for three months commencing about Nov. 14, provided the opera should so long run. The first performance of the piece was not announced till Nov. 28, but no complaint was made as to this delay. It was an implied, though not an express term of the contract, that Madame Poussard should attend rehearsals. Owing to delays on the part of the composer, the music was not in the hands of the defendants till a few days before Nov. 28. The later and final rehearsals did not take place till the week ending Nov. 28. Madame Poussard, though she attended some of the rehearsals, unfortunately was ill on Nov. 23 and had to leave the rehearsal. On Dec. 4, having recovered, she offered to take her place in the opera, but was refused, another artiste having, in the meantime, been engaged to fill the part. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was delivered by BLACKBURN, J. He said (1 Q.B.D. at p. 413):

"My brother FIELD, at the trial, expressed his opinion that the failure of Madame Poussard to be ready to perform under the circumstances went so much to the root of the consideration as to discharge the defendants, and that he should therefore enter judgment for the defendants,"

but he left five questions to the jury. They found that the non-attendance of Madame Poussard on the night of the opening was not of such material consequence to the defendants as to entitle them to rescind the contract; but in answer to another question they found that it was of such consequence as to render it reasonable for the defendants to employ another artiste. LORD BLACKBURN held that this finding enabled the court to decide, as a matter of law, that the defendants were discharged. He said (ibid. at p. 414):

"The analogy is complete between this case and that of a charterparty in the ordinary terms, where the ship is to proceed in ballast (the act of God, &c., excepted) to a port and there load a cargo. If the delay is occasioned by excepted perils the shipowner is excused, but if it is so great as to go to the root of the matter, it frees the charterer from his obligation to furnish a cargo: see per BRAMWELL, B., delivering the judgment of the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (4). And we think that the question whether the failure of a skilled and capable artiste to perform in a new piece through serious illness is so important as to go to the root of the consideration must, to some extent, depend on the evidence, and is a mixed question of law and fact."

A Horlock v. Beal (1) decided that these principles apply to the contract of a sailor to serve on a very lengthened voyage or series of voyages, the duration of which was not to extend beyond a period of two years. The detention of a ship by a hostile Power, which might last for more than two years, was held to terminate, before that period had arrived, the contract of the owners to pay the sailor wages.

I am unable to agree with the contention urged by the respondents that the principle of these decisions can never apply to a time charter. It is by no means true that a time charter must necessarily be of longer duration than a charter for a single voyage or a round voyage to many different ports. That depends upon the length of the term for which the ship is chartered. It may well be that the "impediment," to use the words of LUSH, J., in Geipel v. Smith (3) should be of longer duration in the case of a time charter than in that of a charter for a single voyage, for it to be treated as "defeating and destroying" the object of the commercial adventure of the charterer and shipowner. For instance, I think it would be impossible to contend that this adventure would not be "destroyed and defeated" if the restraint was, to the knowledge of both parties, expressly imposed by the prince or government for the entire length of the period of hiring, or for that portion of it which remained unexpired when the restraint was imposed. I do not think it can make any substantial difference if possession should be taken for a substantial portion of the whole or of the unexpired portion of that period, coupled, as in this case, with a probability or possibility that it may continue till the end of the period. In any of these events the charterer would not get anything like the thing he contracted for—namely, the use of the ship for the stipulated period, but something wholly different. He could hardly be obliged, while deprived of the use of the ship, to pay her hire. That would be monstrously unjust. This is not like a grant or demise of land, where the right of property passes though the possession should be withheld. In truth, the imposition of the restraint for a lengthened period creates a condition of things to which the charterparty is inapplicable. I can find no authority for the proposition that such a contract as the present sinks into abeyance while the restraint is imposed and the possession of the ship is withheld, and springs into active existence again when the restraint terminates, regulating the right of the parties for the residue of the period of hiring. If the restraint be prolonged for a substantial portion of that period it goes, I think, to the root of the consideration as it did in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (4) and Poussard v. Spiers and Pond (8), and relieves both parties to the contract from their engagements. And this though the contract be not in the merely executory stage, but part performed, as it was in both these cases. Turning to the facts of this case, one finds that early in December, 1914, the steamship F. A. Tamplin was requisitioned by the British government for the Admiralty transport service, and was retained in that service until Feb. 10, 1915. No question was raised before the arbitrator as to this requisition. At its date over two years of the period of hiring had elapsed. On Feb. 10, about two years and nine months of that period remained unexpired. The ship was again requisitioned by the government, and immediately after that date alterations were made in her to fit her for the transport of troops. She has been since retained in the service of the Admiralty, and it is said she has been restored to her former condition as a tank steamer. She may be retained in the same service while the present war lasts, and even after it may be terminated. Nobody can possibly tell how long it will last. At the present moment about one year and eight months of the five years remain unexpired. Up to the present time the charterers have only had, during the two years from December, 1912, till December, 1914, what they contracted for and what they were only bound to pay for. They may never get any further use of her. The owners cannot deliver the ship into their possession and control and may not for years be in a position to do so. Neither of the parties are in default. In March, 1915, the owners refused to be longer bound by the charterparty. In my view, there is here involved such a substantial invasion of that freedom of both parties to exercise the rights and discharge the obligations secured to and imposed on them by the charter, the continued existence of which must, I think, have necessarily been in their contemplation as the foundation of this contract when they entered into it, that, in the events which have happened, each of them is now entitled to treat it as at an end. A

I have dealt with the case altogether apart from the question of the amount which the charterers have received as compensation for the use of the ship. The charterers have been treated by the Crown as if they had sublet the ship to the Admiralty. They have not, in fact, done so. What they have received they have got from the bounty of the Crown. They have no legal right to it. The receipt of it is, therefore, in my view, quite irrelevant. To consider it, it only obscures the legal point for decision. When the legal rights of the parties have been determined, the Crown will, no doubt, endeavour to do justice to the parties according to those rights. Judging from what has happened up to the hearing of this appeal, I am of opinion that the charterparty is now at an end and that the parties to it are released from all obligations under it. The appeal, under these circumstances, I think, succeeds. B C

LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—In considering the question arising on this appeal, it is, I think, important to bear in mind the principle which really underlies all cases in which a contract has been held to determine upon the happening of some event which renders its performance impossible, or otherwise frustrates the objects which the parties to the contract have in view. This principle is one of contract law, depending on some term or condition to be implied in the contract itself and not on something entirely dehors the contract which brings the contract to an end. It is, of course, impossible to imply in a contract any term or condition inconsistent with its express provisions, or with the intention of the parties as gathered from those provisions. The first thing, therefore, in every case is to compare the term or condition which it sought to imply with the express provisions of the contract, and with the intention of the parties as gathered from those provisions, and ascertain whether there is any such inconsistency. Again, in determining whether any such term or condition can be properly implied, the nature of the contract is of considerable materiality. If, for example, the contract be for the hire of a particular horse on a particular day, it would be easy to imply a condition that the horse should still be living on the day in question. If, however, the contract were for the hire of a horse generally, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to imply a term relieving the hirer from liability, if his only horse died before the day arrived. Moreover, some conditions can be more readily implied than others. Speaking generally, it seems to me easier to imply a condition precedent defeating a contract before its execution has commenced than a condition subsequent defeating the contract when it is part performed. A contract under which A. is to have the use of B.'s horse for two days' hunting might well be defeated by the death of the horse before the two days commenced. It would be easy to imply a condition precedent to that effect. But the case would be very different if the horse died at the end of the first day, and it was sought to imply a condition subsequent relieving A. in that event of liability to pay the sum agreed for the hire. D E F G H

The simplest cases of the application of the principle are, no doubt, those of contracts de certo corpore, as in Taylor v. Caldwell (7). Here there was an agreement by A. to allow B. the use of his music hall on certain specified days, and the music hall was burnt down before the first of those days arrived. A condition precedent could easily be implied. A similar case is that of Appleby v. Myers (5). Here A. contracted to erect machinery in buildings belonging to B., and the buildings were burnt down before the work was finished. It was not difficult to imply a condition subsequent. But the principle applies also to cases when the existence or continued existence of some specific thing is in no way involved, and in such cases its application is not so easy. It applies, for instance, to contracts I

A of service which, from some causes not contemplated by the contract itself, have become impossible of fulfilment. A good instance of this may be found in the recent decision of your Lordships' House in Horlock v. Beal (1). It applies also to charterparties where some commercial adventure contemplated by the parties, and in the fulfilment of which both are interested, is brought to an end by the happening of some event for which neither is to blame.

B The leading case on this branch of the law is Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co. (4). Here the ship was to proceed with all possible dispatch (dangers and accidents of navigation excepted) from Liverpool to Newport, and there load and carry to San Francisco a cargo of iron rails. The ship left Liverpool on Jan. 2, and on Jan. 3 ran aground in Carnarvon Bay, sustaining considerable damage. It would necessarily be many months before she could be got off and put in such repair as to be able to continue her voyage. In the commercial sense, therefore, C the voyage contemplated in the charterparty had been brought to an end, and under these circumstances the contract was held to have determined. The voyage, if resumed when the ship had been got off and repaired, would have been a different voyage—"as different," to use LORD BRAMWELL's words, "as though it had been described as intended to be a spring voyage, while the one after the repairs would have been an autumn voyage." The season within which the D the adventure was to be carried out was, in fact, of importance to both parties to the bargain, and it was thus easy to imply a condition that if the voyage became impossible of completion within that season the contract should be at an end. The exception as to dangers of the sea and accidents of navigation no doubt showed that the parties were contemplating and providing for the case of some delay arising E from these causes, but they were evidently not contemplating a delay so great that the spring voyage would become altogether impossible. The particular adventure being a voyage to be carried out within reasonable limits of time furnished a definite standard by which it could be determined whether the delay which actually occurred was or was not within the exception clause. There was, therefore, no inconsistency between the implied condition and the express provisions F of the contract.

There is, so far as I can find, no case in which this principle has been applied to time charterparties as distinguished from charterparties which contemplate particular voyages. It was suggested in argument that Tully v. Howling (9) was such a case. There the charterparty was a time charterparty for twelve months G from the completion of the voyage on which the vessel was then engaged. After the completion of this voyage, and when the charterer was ready to load, the vessel was detained by the Board of Trade as unseaworthy. It took two months to make the vessel seaworthy, and meanwhile the charterer had repudiated the contract. It was held that he was justified in so doing on the ground that time was of the essence. There had been, in fact, a breach of the contract by the owners H so material as to give the charterer a right to rescind. Only BRETT, J., put the case as one of the frustration of a commercial adventure. Without laying it down that the principle can in no circumstances be applicable to time charterparties, I am of opinion that its application is in such cases much more difficult than in the case of charterparties which contemplate a definite voyage within certain limits of time. I concur in this respect with what is said by BAILLIACHE, J., in Admiral Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Weidner, Hopkins & Co. (10) ([1916] 1 K.B. at I pp. 437, 438). My reasons will appear when I come to consider the terms of the charterparty in the present case.

The contract in the present case is contained in the charterparty of May 18, 1912, whereby the owners of the steamship F. A. Tamplin agreed to provide her with a full complement of officers, seamen, engineers, and firemen, and hold her at the disposition of the charterers for the voyages and other purposes therein mentioned for a period of sixty calendar months from Dec. 4, 1912, subject, nevertheless, to the conditions therein specified. The charterers were to pay the owners monthly in advance for the first twelve calendar months £1,750, and thereafter £1,700 per month by way of freight. By the seventeenth condition the freight was suspended in the event of loss of time by reason of deficiency in men or stores, or any defect or breakdown of machinery or damage or accident preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four consecutive hours. By the nineteenth condition the payment of freight was to cease altogether in the event of the vessel being lost. By the twentieth condition the act of God, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates and thieves, arrests or restraints of princes, rulers, or people, and strandings and other accidents of navigation were excepted even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error of the pilot, master mariners, or other servants of the owners. As I read this contract, the parties are not contemplating the prosecution of any commercial adventure in which both are interested. They are not contemplating the performance of any definite adventure at all. The owners are not concerned in the charterers doing any specific thing beyond the payment of freight as it becomes due. They are only concerned that the charterers shall pay the freight and shall not use the ship contrary to the provisions of the charterparty. It would be to the interest of the owners that the charterers should not make any use of the ship at all. They would thus save the cost of repairs due to wear and tear. On the other hand, the charterers only stipulated that the vessel shall be at their disposal for certain defined purposes. If they so desire, they retain full liberty not to use the vessel for any purpose whatever. Further, the contract contemplates that though the charterers desire to use the vessel, it may for intermittent periods of indefinite duration be impossible for them so to do. In such cases there are express provisions differing according to the particular circumstances from which such impossibility arises. In cases within condition 17 there is a suspension of freight only. In cases within condition 20, and not within condition 17, the payment of freight continues, and the owners incur no liability. Thus if the ship cannot put to sea because of deficiency of seamen, freight will be suspended. If, however, the vessel cannot put to sea because of an embargo, the freight continues to be payable, nor are the owners liable in damages. It makes no difference at what period during the term of the charter the deficiency of seamen or the embargo occurs. Whether it occurs within the first or last six months of the term the result is to be the same. I entertain no doubt that the requisitioning of the steamship by His Majesty's government in the present case is a "restraint of princes" within the twentieth condition. The parties, therefore, have expressly contracted that during the period during which by reason of such restraint the owners are unable to keep the ship at the disposition of the charterers, the freight is to continue payable, and the owners are to be free from liability. This period may be long or short. It may be certain or indefinite. It may occur towards the beginning or towards the end of the term of the charterparty. The result is to be the same, unless indeed the circumstances are such that the ship can be said to be lost within the meaning of condition 19. Moreover (and this seems me the vital point), the charterparty does not contemplate any definite adventure or object to be performed or carried out within reasonable limits of time, so as to justify a distinction being drawn between days which may render such adventure or object impossible and delays which may not.

Under these circumstances it appears to me to be difficult, if not impossible, to frame any condition by virtue of which the contract of the parties is at an end, without contradicting the express provisions of the contract, and defeating the intention of the parties as disclosed by these provisions. The nearest I can get is a proviso to the twentieth condition conceived as follows:

"Provided that if the period during which the ship cannot be held at the disposition of the charterers by reason of any of the matters referred to in

A this condition, though indefinite, be such as will in all reasonable probability extend beyond the term of the charterparty, the contract between the parties shall be determined."

B But, in my opinion, even this would contradict the express term of contract. It could, for example, except from its provisions cases in which the ship ran aground so near the end of the term of the charterparty that it would be impossible to get her off or ready to put to sea once more within such term. This would, in my opinion, be contrary to the provisions of condition 20. Further, even if it were permissible to imply such a proviso to the twentieth condition, there is, in my opinion, no reason for holding that the government will, in all reasonable probability, retain the vessel for the remainder of the term of the charterparty. Whether they will do so or not seems to me to depend on all sorts of circumstances as to which a court of justice cannot speculate. They may do so or they may not. I do not think that one event is more likely than the other. Having regard to the difficulty of framing any conditions which can be implied without contradicting the express terms of the contract having regard to the nature of the contract, which is a time charter only and does not contemplate any commercial adventure in which both parties are interested, or indeed any definite commercial adventure at all—and, finally, D having regard to the fact that the condition which is sought to be implied is a condition defeating a contract already part performed and not a condition precedent to a contract which remains purely executory—I have come to the conclusion that the decision of the Court of Appeal was right and ought not to be disturbed.

E I desire to add this. I cannot help thinking that the question really at issue has been somewhat obscured by the fact that the government has under the terms of the Royal Proclamation of Aug. 3, 1914, to pay compensation to "the owners," to be settled in case of difference by arbitration. Owners must in this proclamation include all parties interested. It cannot, in the present case, mean the owners exclusive of the charterers or the charterers exclusive of the owners. Both are entitled to compensation, and if such compensation be not agreed with either separately, but with both together, the amount so agreed will be divisible between F them according to their respective rights and interests. The case was argued before your Lordships on the footing that it would determine which of two possible claimants was to be held entitled to all which might be payable by the government by way of compensation under the proclamation. I entirely dissent from this view. The appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed with costs.

METROPOLITAN WATER BOARD v. DICK, KERR & CO., LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Finlay, L.C., Lord Dunedin, Lord Atkinson and Lord Parmoor), October 23, 26, November 26, 1917]

Contract—Building contract—Frustration—Implication of term—Interruption of contract—Government order forbidding work during war—Prohibition not contemplated by parties.

By a contract dated July 24, 1914, and made between the appellant Board and the respondents, contractors, it was agreed that the respondents would construct a reservoir and water works and deliver them to the Board within six years from Aug. 10, 1914. By condition 32 of the contract it was provided that if, by reason of any difficulties, obstructions, oppositions, doubts, disputes, or differences, whatsoever or howsoever occasioned, the contractors should in the opinion of the engineer (whose decision was final) have been unduly delayed or impeded in the completion of the contract, it should be lawful for the engineer, if he should so think fit, to grant such extension of time within which the work was to be completed as to him might seem reasonable, without thereby prejudicing or in any manner affecting the validity of the contract, or the adequacy of the contract price, and any and every such extension of time should be deemed to be in full compensation and satisfaction for every actual or possible loss or injury sustained or sustainable by the respondents. Work commenced on Aug. 10, 1914. On Aug. 4 war was declared between Great Britain and Germany. On Feb. 21, 1916, under an order by the Ministry of Munitions, made under the Defence of the Realm Acts and Regulations, all work under the contract was stopped and the greater part of the plant requisitioned. It was admitted that thereafter the prosecution of the works would have been illegal.

Held: condition 32 was intended to apply only to more or less temporary difficulties and did not cover such an interruption of the work as had occurred; the effect of the prohibition by the Ministry was that the work could not be resumed for at least the indeterminate period until the end of the war when all the conditions relating to the work would be different and its resumption would, in effect, be under a new contract; the parties could not have contracted on the footing that such an interruption might take place, and a condition must be implied in the contract that in such an event the contract would come to an end; and, therefore, the contract must be treated as having terminated on Feb. 21, 1916.

Appeal by the plaintiffs, the Metropolitan Water Board, from an order of the Court of Appeal reversing a decision of BRAY, J.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and Holman Gregory, K.C. (Joshua Goodland with them), A for the appellants.

Upjohn, K.C., Frank Russell, K.C., Sir Ernest Pollock, K.C., and Douglas Hogg, K.C., for the respondents, were not called on to argue.

The House took time for consideration.

Nov. 26, 1917. The following opinions were read.

LORD FINLAY, L.C.—The question in this case is whether a contract for the construction of reservoirs and waterworks between the Metropolitan Water Board—the appellants—and Messrs. Dick, Kerr & Co., Ltd.—the respondents—can be treated by the respondents as at an end, in consequence of an order of the Minister of Munitions that work under the contract should cease.

The action was begun by the Metropolitan Water Board by writ, dated May 19, 1916, against the contractors, and the statement of claim asked for a declaration that the contract is still in existence as a binding contract, and had not been determined. The defence alleges that notice from the Ministry of Munitions, dated Feb. 21, 1916, was given in exercise of the powers conferred by the Defence of the Realm Acts and the regulations and orders made thereunder, that the notice required the contractors to cease work on their contract, and that they ceased work accordingly. The defence went on to allege that thereby the contract ceased to be binding. The case was tried by BRAY, J., who gave judgment for the Metropolitan Water Board, holding that the notice should have been dealt with under the terms of the contract by an extension of time for the completion of the contract, and that the contract was still in existence. On appeal, this decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, consisting of LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., and WARRINGTON and SCRUTTON, L.JJ. The appellants by the present appeal asked that the decision of BRAY, J., should be restored.

The contract was one for the construction of extensive reservoirs and other works near Staines, the respondents' tender being accepted by the appellants on July 24, 1914. The decision of BRAY, J., in favour of the appellants was rested by him upon the thirty-second condition of the contract, which is in the following terms:

"The contractor shall complete and deliver up to the Board the whole of the works necessary to allow the western reservoir to be filled and brought into use and shall complete the removal of all temporary works, plant, and surplus material as may in the opinion of the engineer be necessary to enable this to be done within a period of four years from the date of the engineer's written order to commence the works, and the contractors shall complete and deliver up to the Board the whole of the works comprised in this contract and shall complete the removal of all temporary works, plant, and surplus material within a period of six years from the date of the engineer's written order to commence the works. The whole of the works to be delivered up complete in every respect, in a clean and perfect condition. Provided always that if by reason of any additional works or enlargements of the works (which additions or enlargements the engineer is hereby authorised to make), or for any other just cause arising with the Board or with the engineer, or in consequence of any unusual inclemency of the weather, or general or local strikes, or combination of workmen, or for want of deficiency of any orders, drawings, or directions, or by reason of any difficulties, impediments, obstructions, oppositions, doubts, disputes, or differences, whatsoever and howsoever occasioned, the contractor shall, in the opinion of the engineer (whose decision shall be final), have been unduly delayed or impeded in the completion of this contract, it shall be lawful for the engineer, if he shall so think fit, to grant from time to time, and at any time or times by writing under his hand, such extension of time either prospectively or retrospectively, and to assign such

A other day or days for or as for completion as to him may seem reasonable, without thereby prejudicing or in any manner affecting the validity of the contract, or the adequacy of the contract price, or the adequacy of the sums or prices mentioned in the third schedule; and any and every such extension of time shall be deemed to be in full compensation and satisfaction for, and in respect of, any and every actual or probable loss or injury sustained
B or sustainable by the contractor in the premises, and shall in like manner exonerate him from any claim or demand on the part of the Board, for and in respect of the delay occasioned by the cause or causes in respect of which any and every such extension of time shall have been granted, but no further or otherwise, nor for or in respect of any delay continued beyond the time mentioned in such writing or writings respectively."

C BRAY, J., held that this condition applied, and that the prohibition by the Minister of Munitions should have been dealt with by an extension of time under it. The Court of Appeal, on the other hand, held that the prohibition issued in consequence of the war rendered the prosecution of the works illegal for a period of indefinite duration, and must be treated as having put an end to the contract. The date of commencement of the works was fixed by the engineer as being Aug. 16, 1914. The war broke out on Aug. 4, 1914, but the works under the contract proceeded. On May 10, 1915, the nature of the works was varied and the amount of payment increased by a supplemental contract of that date. In spite of difficulties occasioned by scarcity of labour and the character of the ground on which the reservoir was to be constructed, the works went on and a substantial amount of work had been
D done, when, on Feb. 21, 1916, the work was stopped by the Minister of Munitions and the plant sold under his direction. The prohibition has not been withdrawn up to the present time.

E In my opinion the decision of the Court of Appeal was right. It is admitted that the prosecution of the works became illegal in consequence of the action of the Minister of Munitions. It became illegal on Feb. 21, 1916, and remains illegal
F at the present time. This is not a case of a short and temporary stoppage, but of a prohibition in consequence of a war, which has already been in force for the greater part of two years, and will, according to all appearances, last as long as the war itself, as it was the result of the necessity of preventing the diversion to civil purposes of labour, and material required for purposes immediately connected with the war. Condition 32 provides for cases in which the contractor has, in G the opinion of the engineer, been unduly delayed or impeded in the completion of his contract by any of the causes therein enumerated or by any other causes, so that an extension of time was reasonable. Condition 32 does not cover the case in which the interruption is of such a character and duration as vitally and fundamentally to change the conditions of the contract, and which could not possibly have been in the contemplation of the parties to the contract when it was made.
H It was not disputed, as I understand the arguments for the appellants, that in the case of a commercial contract, as for the sale of goods or agency, such a prohibition would have brought it to an end. It was sought to distinguish the present case on the ground that the contract was for the construction of works of a permanent character, which would last for a very long time, and that a delay, even of years, might be disregarded. This contention ignores the fact that, though the works
I when constructed may last for centuries, the process of construction was to last for six years only. It is obvious that the whole character of such a contract for construction may be revolutionised by indefinite delay such as that which has occurred in the present case, in consequence of the prohibition.

The House is greatly obliged to leading counsel for the appellants [Mr. P. O. LAWRENCE] for his very able and exhaustive analysis of the authorities. I do not think it necessary to examine these authorities in detail, as the principle applicable in such cases has been often laid down and is well established. I will only refer to the judgment of the Queen's Bench delivered by HANNEN, J., in Baily v. De Crespigny (4), especially L.R. 4 Q.B. at pp. 185-186, and to the judgment of ROWLATT, J., in Distington Hematite Iron Co., Ltd. v. Possehl & Co. (5). The contract in the present case was for the completion and handing over of these works within six years from Aug. 16, 1914. The effect of the prohibition may be that the works cannot be resumed until, at all events, the greater part of the six years has expired, and by that time all conditions as regards labour and materials may be absolutely different. This, in the words of ROWLATT, J., would be "not to maintain the original contract, but to substitute a different contract for it." The difference of opinion in Horlock v. Beal (1) and F. A. Tamplin Steamship Co., Ltd. v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Co., Ltd. (2) was not so much upon principle as in the application of the principle to the particular cases. Hadley v. Clarke (3) cannot be relied upon as an authority. In my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD DUNEDIN.—I concur. The general law on the subject of what supervening event will excuse the performance of a contract has been so recently dealt with in elaborate opinions in your Lordships' House, in Horlock v. Beal (1) and F. A. Tamplin Steamship Co., Ltd. v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Co., Ltd. (2) that I think it would be useless again to review the past authorities in any detail. It is true that in Tamplin's Case (2) there was a narrow majority in favour of the judgment pronounced, but after a careful consideration of the opinions delivered I have come to the conclusion that there was no difference in the opinions of the majority and of the minority in the principles of law applicable to such cases, those principles having already been expressed in Beal's Case (1); but that the only difference lay in their application to the facts of the case then under consideration. I shall content myself with one quotation from the opinion of one of the majority. EARL LOREBURN points out that in all cases it must be said that there is an implied term of the contract which excuses the party, in the circumstances, from performing the contract, and then continues (ante p. 107) :

"It is, in my opinion, the true principle, for no court has an absolving power, but it can infer from the nature of the contract and the surrounding circumstances that a condition which is not expressed was a foundation on which the parties contracted."

He further points out that the particular ratio decidendi in various cases is sometimes put that performance has become impossible, and that the party concerned did not promise to perform an impossibility; sometimes it is put that the parties contemplated a certain state of things which fell out otherwise.

A subsequent law may be the cause of an impossibility, whether by actually forbidding an act undertaken in the contract—which is the direct meaning of illegality—or whether by means of taking away something from the control of the party, as to which thing he had contracted to do or not to do something else. An example of the latter class may be found in Baily v. De Crespigny (4). But to make what I may call a clean case of illegality the illegality must be permanent. The appellants here say that the illegality of working on the reservoir is only temporary, and will some day be withdrawn and they seek to liken it to the interruption of the contract of affreightment in Tamplin's Case (2), which they say was held by the majority to be only temporary, or at least not proved to be permanent. I shall revert to Tamplin's Case (2), but I should like first to point out that I think the appellants rather mistake the effect of the force of legislation in the present case. The order pronounced under the Defence of the Realm Act not only debarred the respondents from proceeding with the contract, but also compulsorily dispersed and sold the plant. It is admitted that an interruption may be so long as to destroy the identity of the work or service, when resumed, with the work or service when interrupted. But quite apart from mere delay it seems to me that the action as to the plant prevents this contract ever being the same

A as it was. Express the effect by a clause. If the Water Board had, when the contract was being settled, proposed a clause which allowed them at any time during the contract to take and sell off the whole plant, to interrupt the work for a period no longer than that for which the work has actually been interrupted, and then bound the contractor to furnish himself with new plant and recommence the work, does anyone suppose that Dick, Kerr & Co. or any other contractor
 B would have accepted such a clause? And the reason why they would not have accepted it would have been that the contract, when resumed, would be a contract under different conditions from those which existed when the contract was begun. It may be said that it is possible that plant may be cheaper after the war. But no one knows, and the contractor is not bound to submit to an aleatory bargain, to which he has not agreed. It will also be kept in mind that the contract was a
 C measure and value contract. The difference between the new contract and the old is quite as great as the difference between the two voyages in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (6).

I return to Tamplin's Case (2) to show that the views of the majority (for obviously I need not deal with those of the minority) were based upon circumstances which find no proper analogy in the circumstances here. In the first place
 D the person who wanted the contract declared at an end was the owner. The charterer, notwithstanding what had happened, was content to go on paying the hire, and to refrain, during the period while the government were in possession of the ship, from demanding any services from the owners. Under the contract, as LORD PARKER put it (ante p. 120):

E "The owners are not concerned in the charterers doing any specific thing beyond the payment of freight as it becomes due."

That payment the charterers, as I have already said, were ready to make. The reason, no doubt, was that they had already got or thought they would get from the government a larger sum of money than they had to pay to the owners. So that one view that I think ran through the opinions of the majority was this. No one was
 F hurt by the continuance of the charter, and if the government relinquished the ship there was no reason why the charter should not be effective for the remaining period of its duration, which might be considerable. But suppose the facts had been slightly different. Suppose the government had taken the ship and had said they would pay nothing—a proceeding within their powers—and then suppose that
 G the owner had sued the charterer for the hire during the period while the government kept the ship. What then? I may be wrong, but it seems to me it would have fallen within the lines of Horlock v. Beal (1). There was another ground of judgment in Tamplin's Case (2), and as I read it this was the real ground of LORD PARKER's opinion, in which the Lord Chancellor concurred. There was a special exemption clause which contained, inter alia, "restraint of princes." The facts fell
 H within that description, and then, said LORD PARKER, you cannot have an implied condition which will contradict an express condition. The same argument was attempted here. The appellants appealed to condition 32, which has been already quoted. It is enough for me to say that the words "or by reason of any difficulties, impediments, obstructions, oppositions, doubts, disputes or differences whatsoever and howsoever occasioned" only deal, in my view, with more or less temporary
 I difficulties, and do not cover a set of occurrences which would make the contract when resumed a really different contract from the contract when broken off. The argument from Tamplin's Case (2), therefore, in my opinion fails in application.

On the whole matter I think that the action of the government, which is forced on the contractor as a vis major, has by its consequences made the contract, if resumed, a work under different conditions from those of the work when interrupted. I have already pointed out the effect as to the plant, and the contract, being a measure and value contract, the whole range of prices might be different. It would, in my judgment, amount, if resumed, to a new contract; and as the respondents are only bound to carry out the old contract and cannot do so owing to supervient legislation, they are entitled to succeed in their defence to this action. A

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur. The facts have already been fully stated, and I abstain from repeating them. Counsel, in opening the appeal, manfully struggled to bring this case within the decision, or supposed decision, of this House in the recent case of F. A. Tamplin Steamship Co., Ltd. v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Co., Ltd. (2). Only two judgments were delivered in that case by the noble Lords who composed the majority, namely, that of LORD LOREBURN and that of LORD PARKER, with which latter LORD BUCKMASTER, L.C., concurred. It is, I think, desirable, having regard to the arguments addressed to the House on this appeal, to endeavour to ascertain what were the precise points decided in that case, and then to see how far the principles laid down are applicable to the present case. B

LORD LOREBURN leaves one in no doubt as to what were the grounds of his decision. He says (ante p. 107) that an examination of the authorities confirmed him in the view that where the courts have held innocent contracting parties absolved from further performance of their promises it has been on the ground that there was an implied term in the contract which entitled them to be absolved; that sometimes it was put that the performance was impossible or impracticable; sometimes that the parties contemplated a certain state of things which fell out otherwise; that in most of the cases it was said that there was an implied condition in the contract which operated to release the parties from performing it; that in all of them this last-named was, he thought, the principle on which the courts proceeded; and that it was in his opinion the true principle, it being left to the court not to absolve, but to infer from the nature of the contract and the surrounding circumstances that a condition which was not expressed was the foundation upon which the parties contracted. LORD LOREBURN proceeded to say that where the question arose in regard to commercial contracts, as happened in the three cases he named, the principle was the same, and the language used as to "frustration of the adventure" merely adapted it to the cases in hand; that in these three cases it was held, to use the language of LORD BLACKBURN, C

"that a delay in carrying out a charterparty, caused by something for which neither party was responsible, if so great and long as to make it unreasonable to require the parties to go on with the adventure, entitled them, at least while the contract was executory, to consider it at an end" (6 App. Cas. at p. 52); D

that this, however, was only another way of saying that from the nature of the contract it could not be supposed the parties, as reasonable men, intended it to be binding on them under such unreasonable conditions. So far, I think, there is no substantial conflict between this judgment and the judgments of the minority as to the principle of law applicable to the case. LORD LOREBURN then examines the facts, and said that if the interruption could be pronounced, in the language of LORD BLACKBURN, so great and long as to make it unreasonable to require the parties to go on then it would be different. Both of them must have contracted on the footing that such an interruption as that would not take place, and that he would imply a condition to that effect; but that, taking into account all that had happened, he could not infer that the interruption either had been or would be in that case such as made it unreasonable to require the parties to go on. He added that there might be many months during which the ship would be available for commercial purposes before the five years expired. He says the question to be answered is (ante p. 108): E

"Ought we to imply a condition in the contract that an interruption such as this shall excuse the parties from further performance of it? I think not. I think they took their chance of lesser interruptions, and the condition I should imply goes no further than that they should be excused if substantial." F the whole contract became impossible, or, in other words, impracticable, by some cause for which neither was responsible."

It will be observed that LORD LOREBURN does not say, or, I think, suggest, that there is any difficulty in applying the principle he lays down to a time charter, while the only reference he apparently makes to the clause in the charterparty in referring "to the restraint of princes" is contained in the expression: "I think they took their chance of lesser interruptions."

LORD PARKER does not, I think, in his judgment differ as to the general principle. He says (ante p. 118):

"the principle is one of contract law depending on some term or condition to be implied in the contract itself and not on something entirely dehors the contract which brings the contract to an end. It is, of course, impossible to imply in a contract any term or condition inconsistent with its express provisions or with the intention of the parties as gathered from those provisions."

However, he quotes the twentieth condition of the charterparty, referring to restraint of princes, and says that he has no doubt that the requisitioning of the steamship by His Majesty's government was "a restraint of princes" within the meaning of that condition, and proceeds (ante p. 120):

"The parties, therefore, have expressly contracted that during the period during which by reason of such restraint the owners are unable to keep the ship at the disposition of the charterers, the freight is to continue payable, and the owners are to be free from liability. This period may be long or short. It may be certain or indefinite. It may occur towards the beginning or towards the end of the term of the charterparty. The result is to be the same, unless indeed the circumstances are such that the ship could be said to be lost within the meaning of condition 19. Moreover (and this seems to me the vital point), the charterparty does not contemplate any definite adventure or object to be performed or carried out within reasonable limits of time so as to justify a distinction being drawn between delays which may render such adventure impossible and delays which may not."

LORD PARKER then proceeds to say that it was difficult, if not impossible, to frame any condition by virtue of which the contract of the parties would be at an end without contradicting the express provisions of the contract and defeating the intention of the parties as disclosed by those provisions. He said the nearest he could get to it would be by a proviso to condition 20, which he sketched, but that even this contradicted the provisions of condition 20. He then winds up by saying (ante p. 121):

"Having regard to the difficulty of framing any condition which can be implied without contradicting the express terms of the contract . . . which is a time charter only and does not contemplate any commercial adventure in which both parties are interested, or indeed any commercial adventure at all—and, finally, having regard to the fact that the condition which is sought to be implied is a condition defeating a contract already part performed and not a condition precedent to a contract which remains purely executory—I have come to the conclusion that the decision of the Court of Appeal was right."

In reference to this last point, it is only right to point out that in Horlock v. Beal (1) and in several cases therein cited, the contract held to be at an end had been in part performed.

This is the only opinion pronounced in the case by which such vital effect is given to the provision of condition 20. The judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (6) would, it appears to me, seem to point in a different direction. I hardly think, however great undoubtedly as is the weight which must always be attached to any opinion expressed by Lord PARKER, it cannot be assumed that this House decided that the provisions of the twentieth condition of the charterparty had the effect which he attributed to them. Even, however, if they had that effect, the question remains: Can the provisions of condition 32 of the agreement in the present case have a similar effect? Have the respondents contracted themselves out of all claim to be absolved from the performance of their promises, no matter how prolonged the enforced suspension of their work may be, or how absolute the deprivation of their freedom of action, and have they limited themselves to the relief the engineer may, under that condition, accord to them in the shape of extending the time for completion of the work. If so, LORD PARKER's judgment might possibly apply, as the express provisions of the contract would then be inconsistent with the terms of the implied condition under which they would be relieved from the further performance of their promise. As I understood counsel for the appellants, he contended that condition No. 32 did contain a provision covering the action of the Ministry of Munitions. It is to be found, he said, in the proviso following the clause requiring that the works are to be completed and delivered up in clean and perfect condition within six years from the date of the engineer's order to commence them. In this clause it is provided that if, in the opinion of the engineer (which is to be final), the respondents should be unduly delayed or impeded in the completion of the contract by any one of a great number of things previously enumerated, the engineer might at any time or times extend the time, and fix such other day or days for completion as to him should seem reasonable without thereby prejudicing or in any way affecting the validity of the contract or the adequacy of the contract prices, &c. The several things enumerated which may cause this undue delay are: additional or enlarged works, or any just cause arising with the Board or engineer, bad weather, strikes, want or deficiency of orders, drawings, or directions, or any difficulties, impediments, obstructions, oppositions, doubts, disputes, or differences whatsoever or howsoever caused. Counsel contended that the word "difficulties" used in this condition in a contract made on July 24, 1914, covered the action of the Ministry of Munitions. It is obvious that as the attempt to continue working in defiance of this order of the Ministry would be a crime for which the respondents and the members of their staff employed on the works could be imprisoned, the order did impose difficulties in the respondents' way, but it is only necessary to read the clause to see that difficulties arising from the exercise by the executive of their most unprecedented and arbitrary powers, not conferred on them till long after the date of the contract, could never have been within the contemplation of the parties at the time they entered into the contract. The difficulties they referred to must have been difficulties arising in the execution of the words somewhat analogous in kind and character to those things they had enumerated, or which at least the engineer might adjudge had unduly delayed or impeded the completion of the contract. It would be absurd to leave it in the power of the engineer to decide that the removal of all the plant, coupled with the making it a crime to proceed with the works, had not unduly delayed the completion of the contract. Yet if the argument be sound that would be in his power. I am clearly of opinion, therefore, that the provisions of this condition do not apply to the action of the Ministry of Munitions or its result, and that the case must be decided as if it did not form any part in the contract.

That being so, I have no doubt that it was the manifest intention of both parties to this contract that they should, without any default on their respective parts, be left substantially free to exercise the rights and discharge the obligations the contract conferred and imposed upon them; that the continued existence of that freedom of action till the contract was performed must have been in their contemplation as the very foundation of it at the time they entered into it; and that to give effect to that intention a condition should by implication be read into the

A contract to the effect that the obligation to perform it should cease if by vis major, such as the action of the executive government of this country, they should be deprived to a very substantial extent of their freedom of action. Well, the respondents have been for a considerable time deprived of all freedom of action. The executive government, acting no doubt legally and within their powers, have for objects of State made it illegal and impossible for the respondents to do that which, in the belief that their freedom of action would not be invaded, they promised to do. No one can tell how long it may continue to be invaded. In my opinion, they are entitled to be absolved from the further performance of that promise. In addition it may well be that in this case, just as in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (6), the delay may render the adventure the respondents embarked upon as different from what it would have been if completed without interruption as was the summer voyage which the parties contemplated in that case from the winter voyage which the delay would have necessitated. The conditions after the war may be entirely changed, and the work already done may be deteriorated by the delay. I think the decision of the Court of Appeal was right, therefore, and should be upheld, and this appeal be dismissed with costs here and below.

D LORD PARMOOR stated the facts and continued: The question of principle involved in the consideration of this appeal has been recently considered in your Lordships' House in Horlock v. Beal (1) and F. A. Tamplin Steamship Co., Ltd. v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Co., Ltd. (2). The difficulty arises not so much in the statement of principle as in its application to particular cases. It is under this head that some difference of opinion has arisen. The question is one of contract law, and the decision in each case depends on the ascertainment of the true meaning of the bargain between the parties. If the parties have provided by apt words in the contract for their mutual rights or liabilities in the event of the contract works being stopped or indefinitely hindered by the operation of a subsequent law, and such provision is not contrary to public policy, then it would be the duty of any court to give effect to such provision. If, on the other hand, the contract contains no provision for such a contingency as the interference of the legislature, then the court must determine whether this contingency is of such a character that it can reasonably be implied to have been in the contemplation of the parties at the date when the contract was made. Care must always be taken not to imply a condition which would be inconsistent with the expressed intention of the parties.

G In the present case the judgment of BRAY, J., largely depends on his opinion that the parties expressly provided for the contingency which has occurred in condition 32 of the original contract. I am unable to assent to this construction. The contract is one substantially in common form where works of this character are to be carried out in a fixed time, subject to payment on the basis of measure and value. It is usual in such a contract to authorise the engineer, at his discretion, in certain events, to grant by writing under his hand such extension of time as to him may seem reasonable, without thereby prejudicing or in any way affecting the validity of the contract. In the present contract the engineer has authority to give extension of time if, in his opinion, the completion of the contract has been unduly delayed or impeded

I "by reason of any additional works or enlargements of the works (which additions or enlargements the engineer is hereby authorised to make), or for any other just cause arising with the Board or with the engineer, or in consequence of any unusual inclemency of the weather, or general or local strikes or combination of workmen, or for want or deficiency of any orders, drawings, or directions, or by reason of any difficulties, impediments, obstructions, oppositions, doubts, disputes, or differences, whatsoever or howsoever occasioned."

This language is no doubt wide, and the general words may be large enough to include the contingency of legislative interference stopping the works or postponing their erection for an indefinite time. I think, however, that the language was used alio intuitu, and that it is not reasonable to hold that it had any reference to such a contingency or that such a contingency was in the contemplation of the parties when framing the terms of the section. A mere extension of time at the discretion of the engineer is not in any sense an appropriate remedy for the contingency which has occurred. In my opinion, neither party intended to leave the decision as to what should be done in such a contingency to the discretion of the engineer, under an ordinary extension of time clause in a works contract.

It is necessary, therefore, for your Lordships to consider what is to be implied as the intention of the parties to the bargain, having regard to the terms of the contract and the nature of the work to which the contract applies. It is not necessary to go through the terms of the contract in any detail. No special provision was called to the attention of your Lordships which would in principle differentiate this contract from an ordinary measure and value contract, in which a definite time is fixed for completion, subject to a clause allowing extension of time in certain events at the discretion of the engineer. What is the real meaning and purport of such a contract? It is that works shall be carried out at prices fixed with reference to the then outlook for cost of labour, plant, and material, spread over a defined limit of time, which could not fail to affect materially the figures inserted by a contractor in sending in his tender. The same considerations would affect the appellants in coming to a determination whether a tender should or should not be accepted. During the execution of such a contract a contingency arises by the intervention of the legislature, or of a Department authorised by the legislature, which renders the further continuance of the execution of the works illegal for a substantial and indefinite time, and which causes the removal of a large portion of the plant employed to government works or for government purpose. I use the word "indefinite" since there is no certainty of the time of the duration of the war of which judicial cognisance can be taken. Can it be said that a risk of this kind was in the contemplation of either party at the date of the contracts? The necessary implication appears to me to be that it is a risk which no contractor would contemplate to be a risk under his contract, and which no public body controlling public funds could have regarded as a possibility affecting their liability in the absence of express provision. It is not necessary to say that the works are not physically possible or could not practically be carried out as a business adventure at a subsequent date. I agree that the probability of hardship to one side or the other is not a matter of material consideration, but it is quite a different matter when there is an indefinite and indeterminate liability which might impose on either party an unforeseen burden totally foreign to the ordinary incidents in a contract of this character, or which might not improbably eventuate in a loss to both parties without any compensating advantages. In my opinion, the original contracts have ceased to be operative. It may well be that at some future period the various works will be executed, but it will be under a different contract based on changed considerations. All the prices will have to be fixed in reference to different conditions, and the time over which the work will be carried on will be wholly different. It is no answer that the engineer has certain powers over prices and time. These powers are incident to the original contracts, and were never intended to give the engineer a power to make new contracts binding either on the respondents or the appellants. I would desire in this connection to quote a passage from the opinion of Lord ATKINSON in the Tamplin Case (2) (ante p. 117):

"... there is here involved such a substantial invasion of that freedom of both parties to exercise the rights and discharge the obligations secured to and imposed on them by the charter, the continued existence of which must, I think, we have necessarily been in their contemplation as the foundation of

A this contract when they entered into it, that, in the events which have happened, each of them is now entitled to treat it as at an end."

This passage is applicable to a case like the present, where the continued erection of the contract works has been rendered illegal and the freedom of both parties has been directly invaded by the operation of law.

B Many cases were called to the attention of your Lordships during the hearing of the appeal, but I think it is only necessary to refer to one of these in a case depending on illegality. I refer to Baily v. De Crespigny (4), a leading case on the principles applicable where land is taken for public purposes under a private Act of Parliament. In this case it was held that the defendant was discharged from a covenant by a subsequent Act of Parliament which compelled him to assign to a railway company, and so put it out of his power to perform the covenant on the principle that lex non cogit ad impossibilia. I think that the reasoning contained in the judgment of HANNEN, J., is applicable to the present case, and that the law will not enforce the fulfilment of a contract where the legislature has introduced substantial and indefinite limitations which the parties cannot be held to have contemplated when making the contract.

D "There can be no doubt that a man may, by an absolute contract, bind himself to perform things which subsequently become impossible, or to pay damages for the non-performance, and this construction is to be put upon an unqualified undertaking, where the event which causes the impossibility was or might have been anticipated and guarded against in the contract, or when the impossibility arises from the act or default of the promisor. But E where the event is of such a character that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties when the contract was made, they will not be held bound by general words which, though large enough to include, were not used with reference to the possibility of the particular contingency which afterwards happens."

F The learned judge later referred to Brewster v. Kitchel (7), and says (L.R. 4 Q.B. at p. 187):

"The rule laid down in Brewster v. Kitchel (7) rests upon this ground, that it is not reasonable to suppose that the legislature, while altering the condition of things with reference to which the covenantor contracted, intended that he should remain liable on a covenant which the legislature itself prevented his fulfilling."

In my opinion, the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN MARINE INSURANCE CO., LTD. v. SAMUEL SANDAY & CO.

[House of Lords (Earl Loreburn, Lord Atkinson, Lord Shaw, Lord Parmoor and Lord Wrenbury), November 30, December 2, 3, 1915, January 27, 1916]

[Reported [1916] 1 A.C. 650; 85 L.J.K.B. 550; 114 L.T. 521; 32 T.L.R. 266; 60 Sol. Jo. 253; 13 Asp. M.L.C. 289; 21 Com. Cas. 154]

Insurance—Marine insurance—Cargo—Insurance for voyage—Preservation of cargo, but loss of adventure—Right of assured to recover under policy—Proximate cause of loss—Proclamation of war—Loss of adventure—Marine Insurance Act, 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), s. 60, Sched. I, r. 10.

By policies of insurance, dated in July, 1914, against the usual perils covered by a marine policy, and including a clause insuring the assured against loss arising from "takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detentions of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition or quality soever," the assured insured two cargoes of grain on voyages from the Argentine to Hamburg. On Aug. 4 war was declared between Great Britain and Germany, and on Aug. 5 King George V issued a proclamation warning all persons not to permit any British ship to enter or communicate with any port or place in the German Empire and stating that any person acting in contravention of the proclamation would be liable to penalties. The ships carrying the insured cargoes were directed by the naval authorities to home ports, the assured warehoused the grain, and, on Sept. 7, gave to the insurers notices of abandonment. These notices were not accepted, and the assured began proceedings against the insurers, claiming under the policies as for a total loss of the cargoes.

Held: (i) the old rule that where goods were insured from one port to another the insurance was not confined to an indemnity to be paid in the event of the goods being lost, damaged, or destroyed, but extended to an indemnity to be paid in the event of the goods not reaching their destination, so that the subject-matter insured included the adventure and not merely the goods, had not been altered by the Marine Insurance Act, 1906; the proximate cause of the loss of the adventures in the present case was His Majesty's proclamation—an "executive act" within r. 10 of Sched. I to the Act which stated that the term "arrests, &c., of kings, princes, and people" referred to such acts—and not the legal prohibition against trading with the enemy which resulted from it; and, therefore, the adventure having been lost, the assured were entitled to recover under the policies although the goods had not been lost or damaged, but had remained safe and sound and in their possession.

Appeal by the defendants from an order of the Court of Appeal affirming an order made by BAILHACHE, J., sitting in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs claimed to recover the sum of £44,800 under policies of marine insurance, dated July 31, 1914, taken out with the appellants on cargoes of linseed and wheat per the steamships St. Andrew and Orthia. BAILHACHE, J., held that there was a constructive total loss of the goods and gave judgment for the amount claimed, and the Court of Appeal by a majority (LORD READING, C.J., and BRAY, J., SWINFEN EADY, L.J., dissenting) affirmed his decision.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., and Leslie Scott, K.C. (with them F. D. MacKinnon, K.C.), for the appellants.

Adair Roche, K.C., and Robertson Dunlop for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

Jan. 27, 1916. The following opinions were read.

EARL LOREBURN.—When the present war commenced the St. Andrew and the Orthia, both of them British ships, were on a voyage from the Argentine to Hamburg, a German port, laden with merchandise. On learning that war had broken out between Great Britain and Germany, whereby the taking of these goods to Hamburg had become unlawful, the masters properly desisted from the voyages, and the cargo owners warehoused their merchandise, and gave notice of abandonment to their underwriters, claiming on a constructive total loss. These notices were not accepted, and this action is brought to enforce the claim. There is no distinction between the two ships, and both policies are of a like tenor. Two questions have been argued before your Lordships. Other contentions, raised in the courts below, have not been raised here. The first question is whether the old rule still prevails, that upon an insurance on goods, substantially in the words of these policies, the frustration of the adventure by an insured peril is a loss recoverable against underwriters, though the goods themselves are safe and sound. The second question is whether, under the circumstances, there was here a loss by restraint of kings, princes, and peoples, which is one of the perils insured against in these policies.

In 1906 it was well settled that when goods are insured, in a policy worded as these policies are, at and from the port of loading to the port of destination, there is a loss if the adventure is frustrated by a peril insured. It is not merely an insurance of the actual merchandise from injury, but is also an insurance of its safe arrival. There is no doubt that this was the rule which had been acted upon for very many years. Was it altered by the Marine Insurance Act, 1906? SWINFEN EADY, L.J., thought it was, and he cited instances in which this Act, though a Consolidation Act, had, in his opinion, altered the law in other respects. I will not pursue that subject, because it has no bearing on the question whether or not there has been an alteration in this respect, but I do not think it will appear, on an examination of the cases to which he refers, that the Act has altered what, at the time of its passage, was the highest judicial interpretation of the law. Howbeit, I do not think the Act altered the law in the particular now under consideration, namely, in regard to the old rule I have mentioned.

Section 60 of the Act says :

“ . . . there is a constructive total loss where the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of its actual total loss appearing to be unavoidable . . . ”

Section 57 (1) says : “ Where the . . . assured is irretrievably deprived ” of the subject-matter insured, there is an actual total loss. Now here the subject-matter assured, as the law stood in 1906, included the adventure and not merely the goods, and the assured was irretrievably deprived of it because all prospect of safe arrival on the voyage to Germany was hopelessly frustrated by the outbreak of war. Therefore, the assured reasonably abandoned because an actual total loss appeared to be unavoidable. So far I see nothing in the Act to alter the law, but I do see that under the old decisions there is a constructive total loss. The argument, however, is that the “ subject-matter insured ” on such a policy no longer included the adventure. There is not a line in the Act which says so, and, if it were relevant, many reasons might be urged against the probability of so inconvenient a change being made. But it is conclusive to point out that s. 26 (1) provides :

A "The subject-matter insured must be designated in a marine policy with reasonable certainty," and, by sub-s. (4): "In the application of this section regard shall be had to any usage regulating the designation of the subject-matter assured." There are many things that may be at risk, and in respect of which insurance may be effected—ship, goods, freight, profits, and so on. There are also familiar, even antique, expressions constantly used from long ago in marine policies, and continued because they are well understood in the business, or have been interpreted by judges. This section says that regard is to be had to any usage regulating the designation of the subject-matter assured. The words of this policy have for generations been understood and held by judges to designate not merely the goods but also the adventure. So far from abrogating this designation of subject-matter I should have thought the Act took pains to preserve it and others like it. I will merely in a sentence refer to s. 91 (2) of the Act which preserves the rules of the common law, including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act.

It seems to me that Parliament has triply guarded against the danger that the Act should be construed in the sense urged upon us by counsel for the appellants. It has refrained from saying that the old rule shall be altered, which of itself would suffice. It has twice warned us that we are to regard and preserve rules and usages in terms that are applicable to this rule. Accordingly, I take with me the conclusion that the adventure was a subject-matter insured, when I proceed to inquire whether or not the loss of it is to be compensated under the clause protecting the assured against restraint by kings or princes. We are told that this question has never been judicially determined. It is a difficult question, and I have been much struck by the cogent reasoning of SWINFEN EADY, L.J., but the argument has in the end satisfied me that the decision of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed. A declaration by His Majesty that there was a state of war was issued on Aug. 4, 1914, and thereupon a number of things theretofore lawful became unlawful. Among other things, trading to German ports became unlawful, and an instant duty arose for these two ships to discontinue their voyage to Hamburg. The adventure of carrying this merchandise to its destination became in law a serious offence, and, in fact, impracticable. That the declaration was an act of State cannot be doubted. The real point made by the underwriters was that the declaration of war did not directly restrain the ships from proceeding to Hamburg, or the owners of goods from taking them there. They argued that the declaration set up a state of war, and the general law applicable to that state thereupon came into force, and it was not the declaration but the consequence of it which destroyed their enterprise. To hold otherwise, they said, would be to throw upon underwriters an insurance against the consequences of war. In their contention, though the actual exercise of force might not be necessary, yet the fear of its being used must be present if there is to be a loss by restraint of princes, and here there was neither force nor the fear of it, for the voyage was abandoned simply because it had become unlawful, and the assured obeyed the law. The proximate or direct cause of the loss was, they said, simply the law of the land.

I am not pressed by the circumstances that force was neither exerted nor present, for force is in reserve behind every State command. And it would be a strange law which deprived the assured, if otherwise entitled to his indemnity, upon the ground that he had not resisted, till the hand of power was laid upon him, an order which it was his duty to obey. If it were an order which he was not bound to obey, and which he might have successfully resisted either by violence or by process of law, a question might arise whether or not there had been in fact a restraint. But that is outside the present case, and I say nothing of it. What has given me some anxiety is the argument that His Majesty's declaration was not the direct cause of these adventures being destroyed. The maxim causa proxima non remota spectatur has been strictly applied in marine insurance cases. And properly so, for there are a variety of perils that may lead to a loss either partial or total, some of them, it may be, covered and others not covered by a policy, and a variety of events or causes that may contribute to a loss, so that without straining language it will be possible to treat it as due either to an insured or to an excepted peril. That, I take it, is the reason why this maxim is pushed to considerable lengths in marine insurance law. In view of that, ought we to say that His Majesty's declaration was the direct cause of these adventures being frustrated, or ought we to say that it merely created a state of war which brought into activity a new set of duties and prohibitions, and that one of them, the prohibition against trading with the enemy, necessitated the adventure being wholly given up. Did the interruption directly come from the declaration or from the law which it awakened? In a sense it came from both, but we must choose which was the proximate cause, for one is the subject of insurance and the other is not. I can see how far-reaching a decision in the former of these senses may prove, but I think it is the right decision. I do not see my way to separating the act of State from its sequel, and treating the advent of war conditions as a last distinct link in the chain of causes which brought these voyages to an end. No new law or ordinance was made after the risk commenced. No event occurred to impede the adventure except the declaration of war. In my opinion, the clause insuring these goods insures their safe arrival at Hamburg, and the destruction of that adventure was directly caused by His Majesty's declaration. It was, therefore, a loss within the clause which insures these goods at and from losses against restraint by kings, princes, or peoples. In my opinion, the order appealed from ought to be affirmed with costs.

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur. The question in this case is novel and important. It is, I think, in effect this: Whether British merchants who have insured goods with British underwriters against the usual perils in a marine policy (including restraints of princes) upon a British ship for a voyage to the port of Hamburg can, upon war being declared by His Majesty the King of England, whereby the further prosecution of the insured voyage to that port becomes illegal, give notice to the underwriters of abandonment, and recover as for a constructive total loss of the goods by restraint of princes, though the goods themselves remain unharmed and in the actual possession of the assured. The respondents were insured against loss arising from

“takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever.”

The appellants contend that the law as to the constructive loss of goods on a voyage, as distinguished from the ship which carried them, is entirely altered by the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, and that the ships and the cargo are, by that statute, impliedly placed upon the same level.

The first question I desire to deal with is whether this contention is right, but to determine it one must first consider what was the state of the law on the subject before the passing of this statute, and then examine how far, if at all, the provisions of the statute conflict with that law. It is only necessary to refer to three cases upon the point, namely, Barker v. Blakes (1), Anderson v. Wallis (2), and Rodocanachi v. Elliott (3). In the first, decided in 1808, LORD ELLENBOROUGH, in 9 East, at pp. 293-294, laid it down that the impossibility of prosecuting the voyage to the place of destination, which arose during and in consequence of the prolonged detention of the ship and cargo, may properly be considered a loss of the voyage, and such a loss of voyage, upon received principles of insurance law, as a total loss of the goods which were to have been transported in the course of that voyage, provided the loss be followed by a sufficiently prompt and immediate notice of abandonment. In the second case the same learned judge said (2 M. & S. at pp. 247, 248):

“I am well aware that an insurance upon a cargo for a particular voyage contemplates that the voyage shall be performed with that cargo, and any risk which renders the cargo permanently lost to the assured may be a cause of abandonment. In like manner, a total loss of cargo may be effected not merely by the destruction of that cargo, but by a total permanent incapacity of the ship to perform the voyage. That is a destruction of the contemplated adventure. But the case of an interruption of the voyage does not warrant the assured in totally disengaging himself from the adventure and throwing this burden on the underwriters. It is unnecessary to pursue the subject further, as there is not any case or principle which authorises an abandonment, unless where the loss has been actually a total loss or in the highest degree probable at the time of abandonment."

In the third case BRAMWELL, B., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, said (L.R. 9 C.P. at p. 522):

"It is well established that there may be a loss of the goods by a loss of the voyage on which the goods are being transported, if it amounts, to use the words of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, to a destruction of the contemplated adventure."

For this he cites the two cases above mentioned.

Counsel for the assured has suggested that this loss of voyage means a loss of market for the goods—not a loss of profit, but a loss of market—and that what the assured insures against is not merely the loss sustained by injury to or destruction of the goods, but in addition the loss resulting from a failure to transport the goods to their destination, that failure being established by a detention of them through one of the perils insured against, so prolonged as to amount to a destruction of the contemplated adventure. This may be so. It is a rational explanation. I think none other was given.

The next matter to consider is whether there is any provision to be found in the statute of 1906, either express or implied, inconsistent with the law as settled by the above-mentioned authorities. First, the statute of 1906 purports to be an Act merely to codify the law relating to marine insurance, and s. 91 (2) provides that the rules of the common law, including the law merchant, save so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of the Act, shall continue to apply to contracts of marine insurance. A comparison between sub-s. (2) and (3) of s. 60 shows that, in the case of the insurance of goods, the cost of bringing the goods to their destination is to be taken into account in estimating whether or not a constructive total loss of them has occurred. Thus the old rule of law has been preserved: Rosetto v. Gurney (4). Constructive total loss is, subject to any express provision in the policy, defined, by s. 60 (1) to occur when the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of actual loss appearing to be unavoidable, or because it could not be preserved from actual total loss without an expenditure which would exceed its value when the expenditure had been incurred. By s. 57 it is provided that actual total loss occurs where the subject-matter insured is destroyed, or so damaged as to cease to be a thing of the kind insured, or where the assured is irretrievably deprived thereof.

Those provisions make it necessary to determine what is the subject-matter insured in these policies. There is no definition of the word subject-matter. Section 26 (1) provides that the subject-matter insured must be designated in a marine policy with reasonable certainty, and sub-s. (4) that in the application of the section regard shall be had to any usage regulating the designation of the subject-matter. By the word designation is, I think, meant identification or description. The subject-matter in the case of the Orthia is stated in the policy to be linseed, valued at £11,000. That, however, is only part of its description or designation or identification. Its full description, as shown by the policy itself, is, linseed, valued at £11,000, shipped on board this vessel to be transported on a voyage at or from a port on the River Plate to Hamburg. Such a description in such a policy connotes rights and characteristics attached by the insurance law to goods so placed, one of which is that they may be treated as constructively totally lost if by one of the perils insured against, as the proximate cause, the adventure of taking them to their destination be destroyed. If that be so, as I think it is, then if the loss of the voyage, the loss of the chance of arriving at the port of destination, and the consequent loss of the market appears to be unavoidable, there would be a constructive total loss of the subject-matter. I am, therefore, of opinion that, in the insurance of goods, the law as it stood before the Act of 1906, in reference to the subject of constructive total loss, remains unchanged.

Two questions remain. First, were these vessels diverted from the contemplated voyage by "the restraint of kings or princes"? And, second, if they were, was this restraint in each case the proximate cause of the diversion within the meaning of s. 55? It was contended that the declaration of war merely altered the status of the inhabitants of the German Empire, changing them from friends to enemies, and that it was the common law acting on that condition of things, not anything done by the Sovereign, which prevented the voyages of the ships to their respective destinations, owing to the obligation felt by their masters, as good citizens, to obey the common law of the country. That the vessels were, therefore, not subject to any restraint of kings or princes, and that, even if they were, that restraint was not the proximate cause of the loss of the voyage. In Rodoconachi v. Elliott (3), BRAMWELL, B., said (L.R. 9 (C.P. at p. 523) that the court considered that these words, "restraints and detentions of all kings and princes and people of what nation, condition, or quality whatsoever," are wider and more comprehensive than the words which immediately precede them—i.e., the words "taking at sea, arrest"; that the word "restraint" as applied to goods must mean a restraint of those having the custody of the goods; that it was not necessary that there should be any specific action on the goods themselves, and that as the effect of the siege of Paris (at which city the goods had arrived) was to cut off all foreign connection and correspondence, the goods were restrained and prevented from leaving Paris by the operation of that siege, and therefore restrained and "detained by kings and princes" within the terms of the policy. It was, accordingly, held that the "contemplated venture" was destroyed, and that there was a constructive total loss of the goods. In the present case the trading with Germany was lawful up to Aug. 4, 1914. On that day, by the act of the Sovereign, it became unlawful. No executive, person, or body, no moral or physical agency, intervened between the act of the Sovereign, proclaimed in his declaration of war, and the abandonment of the intended voyage. As soon as information was conveyed to the captain of the St. Andrew he sailed for Liverpool. On Aug. 5 the owners of the Orthia telegraphed to her to St. Vincent to return. The common law which made it illegal to go to Hamburg was brought into immediate operation by the act of the Sovereign. By the warning he gave it must be taken that he meant to have that law enforced against those who neglected his warning. I do not think, therefore, that the operation of the common law can be separated from the act of the Sovereign which called it into action and treated as an intervenement between that act and the abandonment of the voyage. The act of the Sovereign in declaring war and the calling of the common law into operation formed, I think, two parts of one act—one single exercise of the Royal prerogative. This was the proximate cause of the diversion of the respective courses of the two ships and their ultimate abandonment of the original voyage.

The question remains: Did the exercise by the Sovereign of his Royal prerogative in this respect impose upon each of these ships a restraint of a king and prince within the meaning of the policies? By the tenth rule of Sched. I to the Act of 1906 it is provided that the term "arrest, &c., of kings and princes," refers to political or executive acts, and does not include a loss caused by riot or ordinary judicial process. Well, the act of the Sovereign in making war and by his proclamation declaring it, and thus calling common law into operation, was clearly an executive act—an act of State done by virtue of the Royal prerogative. The declaration carries with it all the force of a law prohibiting intercourse with the enemy save with licence of the Sovereign. It has the executive forces of the Crown behind it to enforce obedience to it: Esposito v. Bowden (5), 7 E. & B. at p. 781.

A Every subject must be taken to be aware that if he attempts to send or bring a ship and cargo to an enemy port, the ship can be prevented from entering that port by His Majesty's ships of war, and he himself will be liable to be prosecuted for trading, or attempting to trade, with the enemy. If the possible infliction of those penalties deters him from making the attempt, is he not restrained from making it? And if not, must the restraint be physical either of the persons in possession of the goods, or of the goods themselves, by the taking of the custody of them? According to LORD BRAMWELL'S judgment in Rodoconachi v. Elliott (3) this latter is not necessary. And Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Co. (6) is a direct authority that potential as distinguished from actual physical force is sufficient to constitute a "restraint." Hudkinson v. Robinson (7) and Lubbock v. Rowcroft (8) are distinguishable from the present. In each of these cases the only deterrent was the risk of ultimate capture if the ships proceeded to their destination. The vessel prudently resolved not to incur that risk. In the present case the deterrent were the penalties incurred by the violation of the criminal law. This was present and immediate, if the ship proceeded at all towards her destination with a view of trading with the enemy. Actual capture was in these cases the peril insured against. The apprehension of capture is an entirely different thing and was not insured against. It is clear that the war is of uncertain duration. Nobody could with any confidence conjecture when it would terminate. A long delay appeared most probable before the voyage could be resumed. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the judgment appealed from was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

E LORD SHAW (read by LORD WRENBURY).—So completely do I agree with the judgment of BAILMACHE, J., that I desire respectfully to adopt in its entirety the opinion delivered by that learned judge. I think the law laid down by him so plainly sound, and his statements and reasoning so unanswerably cogent, that, seeing that I also approach and view the case from the same standpoint, I gladly feel free to indorse and adopt his judgment. I think that the appeal should fail.

F LORD PARMOOR.—Two questions arise for decision in the present appeal. The first is, whether there has been a constructive total loss of the subject-matter insured. The second, whether the loss (if incurred) is proximately due to the restraints of kings, princes, and people, of what nation, condition, or quality soever, which is one of the perils insured against.

G The facts are agreed. The respondents are a British firm of corn merchants. They contracted to sell to German merchants at Hamburg certain linseed and wheat, shipped in July, 1914, on board the British steamship St. Andrew, at the ports of Rosario, St. Nicholas, and Buenos Ayres, to be carried to Hamburg. In the same month they contracted to sell to German merchants certain linseed, shipped at Rosario on the British steamship Orthia, to be carried to Hamburg. H For the purpose of this case there is no distinction between the two shipments. By a policy of marine insurance dated July 31, 1914, the respondents insured the said linseed and wheat shipped on the St. Andrew at and from port or ports, of the River Plate, and/or tributaries or Hamburg. On Aug. 4, 1914, a declaration was made that a state of war existed between this country and Germany. The effect of the outbreak of war was to interdict and render illegal all trading with the enemy without the permission of the Sovereign. On Aug. 5 a proclamation I was issued warning all persons not to permit any British ship to leave for, enter, or communicate with any port or place in the German Empire without the permission of the Sovereign, and that any person acting in contravention of the proclamation would be liable to such penalties as the law allows. The penalty for trading with the enemy after the declaration of Aug. 4 and the proclamation of Aug. 5 would include the imprisonment of the master and the confiscation of goods and ship. On Aug. 9, as the St. Andrew was approaching the Lizard, a French cruiser signalled her to stop and to go to Falmouth. The master at Falmouth received orders through the examining officer at Falmouth from the chief naval transport officer at Devonport to go to Liverpool, and upon arrival the linseed and wheat were duly discharged. The policy, on which the claim is made, is in the common form of a Lloyd's policy, and the frustration of the contemplated adventure would constitute a total constructive loss of the goods insured in transit, unless an alteration of law has been introduced by the Marine Insurance Act, 1906. A notice of abandonment of the goods insured was made on Sept. 7, 1914, and the appellants do not raise any question that the notice was not valid or out of time.

On the first question I think that the Act of 1906 has not introduced any alteration in the law, and that there has been a total constructive loss of the goods insured. The Act of 1906 is an Act to codify the law relating to marine insurance. There is, however, no difference in the canons of construction applicable to a codifying Act or to any other Act of Parliament. It is said that in certain respects the Act of 1906 has altered the law. I give no opinion upon this point, and it has no relevance whatever to the question before your Lordships in this appeal. By s. 60

(1) a constructive total loss is defined:

"Subject to any express provision in the policy, there is a constructive total loss where the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of its actual loss appearing to be unavoidable, or because it could not be preserved from actual total loss without an expenditure which would exceed its value when the expenditure had been incurred."

If the subject-matter insured in the present case includes the contemplated adventure, it was no doubt reasonably abandoned on account of its actual loss appearing to be unavoidable, and a case of constructive total loss arises. Section 26 deals with subject-matter and s. 26 (4) enacts that "In the application of this section regard should be had to any usage regulating the designation of the subject-matter insured."

When the Act was passed the common form Lloyd's policy of marine insurance on goods in transit from one port to another designated by usage that the contemplated adventure was part of the subject-matter, so that if the contemplated adventure was frustrated by a peril insured against, the insurers became liable to pay the insured the amount due under the policy. This position is not altered, but was preserved by sub-s. (4). The usage of the law merchant that a policy in the present form did designate that the subject-matter included the contemplated adventure is applicable now in the same way as it was before the Act was passed. In addition to the sections above referred to, reference may be made to s. 91 (2), which provides that the rules of the common law, including the merchant law, saving so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of the Act, shall continue to apply to contracts of marine insurance.

If there has been a constructive total loss, the second question arises whether the restraint of "kings, princes, &c.," was the proximate cause of such loss. The Marine Insurance Act, 1906, contains in the first schedule "rules for construction of policy," which apply, subject to the provisions of the Act, and where the context does not otherwise require. These rules are said to record the interpretation which by law or usage has been placed on some of the more important terms in a common Lloyd's policy. Rule 10 states that the term "arrest, &c., of kings, princes, and people" refers to political or executive acts, and does not include a loss caused by riot or by ordinary judicial process. It could not be suggested in the present case that the loss was caused by ordinary judicial process, and there is no question of riot. Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Co., Ltd. (9) sufficiently illustrates what is meant by the words "ordinary judicial process." It was admitted as a bad plea by way of answer to a claim for not delivering goods in accordance with the bill of lading that the defendants were prevented by acts or restraints of violence "that they had been sued in New York by the true owner of the goods and had been ordered by a court of competent jurisdiction to give up the goods to him."

A It was argued that "restraint," coming in a context between the words "arrest" and "detainment," implied that this term in the policy did not attach and render the insurers liable unless force was either used or threatened. A similar argument was urged in Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Co. (6). In that case, in consequence of a decree of the president of Argentina stopping the discharge of all cattle from the United Kingdom until further notice, the captain took the vessel outside the port and transhipped the cattle. It was held in the Court of Appeal that there had been a restraint of princes, and STIRLING, L.J., says:

"It seems to me that there was an active intervention of the government of the Argentine Republic, which was none the less an exercise of superior force because no officer of the army or of the police force intervened."

C I agree in the opinion expressed by STIRLING, L.J. If the restraint in the present case has been imposed by political or executive acts, it is not the less a restraint, within the terms of the policy, because the master submits without opposition and without the presence of either actual or threatened force. I cannot doubt that the declaration of war on Aug. 4, 1914, and the proclamation "relating to trading with the enemy" on Aug. 5, 1914, are in the ordinary sense acts of the executive, or, in the words of the rule, executive acts. The declaration of war by the Sovereign has equal force to an Act of Parliament prohibiting intercourse with the enemy except with the King's licence: Esposito v. Bowden (5), 7 E. & B. at p. 781. The proclamation of Aug. 5 stands on the same footing and has the same authority.

E It follows that all the conditions necessary to establish a restraint of kings, princes, &c., are operative in the present case, but the question has still to be determined whether the restraint was the proximate or immediate cause of the frustration of the contemplated adventure, and of the consequent constructive total loss. After the declaration of war, and in accordance with the terms of the subsequent proclamation, all trading of British ships with the enemy was interdicted, and it became illegal to prosecute the voyage to Hamburg unless with the permission of the Sovereign. When, therefore, the French cruiser signalled the St. Andrew to go to Falmouth, the master could not have proceeded to Hamburg without rendering himself liable to all the consequent penalties. On receiving the signal the master submitted to the restraint which the conditions had imposed upon him, and took his vessel to a home port. He did not deviate from his course in order to avoid a future peril to which he might become liable, but because the peril was actually present and operative at the time when he turned his vessel from Hamburg to the home port. I agree in the reasoning and conclusion of BAILHACHE, J. ([1915] 2 K.B. at p. 789):

"when once it is admitted that force is not necessary to constitute restraint of princes it is clear that, when a shipowner keeps his vessel at home or directs her to a home port in obedience to such a declaration, he is not taking steps to avoid that particular peril, but is submitting to its operation, and that in such a case restraint of princes is a proximate cause of loss."

H I have not overlooked Hadkinson v. Robinson (7), and similar cases, but they appear to me to have no application. There is a clear distinction between a deviation to avoid a peril and a deviation due to its presence and immediate operation. In my opinion, the decision on appeal is right, and the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

I LORD WRENBURY.—There arise here two questions for decision. The first is whether His Majesty's declaration of war against Germany operated as a restraint falling within the words in the policy "restraints of all kings, princes, and people." The second is whether the consequent detention for an indefinite time of the goods insured amounted to a constructive total loss. The two questions are wholly distinct, and each is, no doubt, of great importance.

On Aug. 4, 1914, His Majesty declared war against Germany. The insured goods were then at sea on voyages, the one from the River Plate and the other from Rosario, to be delivered at Hamburg. The one vessel, being off the Lizard, was signalled by a French cruiser to put into Falmouth, and obeyed. The other vessel, on calling at St. Vincent, was directed by her owner, at the suggestion of the Admiralty, to go to Glasgow, and did so. The order in each case was due to the existence of a state of war. The owners gave notice of abandonment. Was there "restraint of kings, princes, and people" within the meaning of the policy? In my opinion, there was. A declaration of war by the Sovereign is a political or executive act, done by virtue of his prerogative, which creates a state of war. A state of war is a lawful state, and is one in which every subject of His Majesty becomes an enemy of the nation against which war is declared. The declaration of war amounts to an order to every subject of the Crown to conduct himself in such way as he is bound to conduct himself in a state of war. It is an order to every militant subject to fight as he shall be directed, and an order to every civilian subject to cease to trade with the enemy. There is "a general rule in the maritime jurisprudence of this country by which all subjects trading with the public enemy, unless with the permission of the Sovereign, is interdicted."

(The Hoop (10), 1 Ch. Rob. at p. 198).

"A declaration of war imports a prohibition of commercial intercourse and correspondence with the inhabitants of the enemy's country, and such intercourse, except with the licence of the Crown, is illegal."

(Espósito v. Bowden (5), 7 E. & B. at p. 779).

We have heard considerable argument to the effect that war is not unilateral—which, no doubt, is true—that you must have at least two nations engaged in hostilities, and so on. All this, to my mind, is beside the mark. Immediately the Royal prerogative is exercised and war is declared against another nation every subject of His Majesty is bound to regard every subject of that nation as an enemy, and the consequences ensue which I have mentioned. If I ask myself what stopped the voyage to Hamburg? What made the adventure illegal? What destroyed the venture? The answer is—the declaration of war. That executive act ipso facto made the venture illegal. If the master had continued his voyage in defiance of the law the ship and goods could have been confiscated, and the master himself prosecuted and sent to prison. It is argued that the illegality, and not the declaration of war, was the causa proxima of the destruction of the adventure. This is not so. The common law was not a new act which came into action when war was declared. The law was always one and the same, namely, that in one state of circumstances (namely, peace) the adventure was, and in another state of circumstances (namely, war) the adventure was not legal. Hadkinson v. Robinson (7) and Kacianoff v. China Traders Insurance Co., Ltd. (11) are not in point. The adventure there remained legal. All that happened was that, in pursuit of a lawful adventure, the master did not go into a position of peril. He never was restrained. His own country did not restrain him, and he took care not to put himself in danger of being restrained by another country. Illegality according to the law of another country does not affect the merchant. In the present case the adventure was illegal according to the law of the country of the owner of the goods. And it was the declaration of war that made it illegal. It is not necessary that force should be employed, or even that force should be immediately available for employment. Every State ultimately enforces obedience to its laws by force. Restraint is equally imposed when disobedience is given by reason of the existence of force in reserve as when it is given by reason of force employed. Neither is it necessary that there should be any specific action upon the goods themselves. The master was restrained, and the adventure was

A restrained by the fact that illegality supervened as the immediate result of the declaration of war. In my opinion, there was in this case restraint falling within the words "restraint of kings, princes, and people."

Upon the second question the matter stands thus. Before the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, authority is uniform that where goods are insured at or from one port to another port the insurance is not confined to an indemnity to be paid in case the goods are injured or destroyed, but extends to an indemnity to be paid in case the goods do not reach their destination. This may be variously described as an insurance of the venture, or an insurance of the voyage, or an insurance of the market, as distinguished from an insurance of the goods simply and solely. Goods delivered at the port of destination may be of value very different from their value at the port of loading. The underwriter's obligation is to pay money in the event of the goods failing to arrive at their destination uninjured by any of the perils insured against. BRAMWELL, B., in Rodoconachi v. Elliott says (L.R. 9 C.P. at p. 522):

"It is well established that there may be a loss of the goods by a loss of the voyage in which the goods are being transported if it amounts, in the words of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, 'to a destruction of the contemplated adventure'."

D The insurance is on the venture, and the loss of the venture is a constructive total loss of the goods. I cannot find that the Act of 1906 has in any way altered this. On the contrary, it seems to me to have preserved it. The Act is expressed by its title to be an Act to codify the law relating to marine insurance. Attention has been called to certain particulars in which nevertheless the Act alters the law. That is true. But it remains that the Act is a codifying Act. That being so, I should look more carefully in a codifying Act to see whether any existing law is altered by express words, and should not hold that the Act is going beyond codification unless it puts the matter beyond dispute. I can find nothing which upon this matter has any such effect. On the contrary, ss. 5, 26, 60, and 91 seems to me plain the other way. Section 5 (2) contemplates that an assured "may benefit by the safety or due arrival of insurable property." Section 26 (1), which relates to subject-matter, enacts that the subject-matter insured must be designated with reasonable certainty. "Designated" must here plainly mean described or identified. Sub-section (4) then enacts: "In the application of this section regard shall be had to any usage regulating the designation of the subject-matter insured." By usage regulating the designation must be meant a customary nomenclature of identification. Such, for instance, as that in the trade of a livery-stable keeper the word "carriage" by usage means "carriage and horses." If, then, in marine insurance, a policy on goods means by usage a policy on the safe arrival of goods, that meaning is by s. 26 preserved. Section 60 is as to constructive total loss, and sub-s. (2) (iii) provides that in the case of damage to goods there is a constructive total loss when the cost of repairing the damage and forwarding the goods to their destination would exceed their value on arrival. Lastly, s. 91 (2) enacts that the rules of the common law, including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of the Act, shall continue to apply to contracts of marine insurance. These provisions seem to me ample to support the conclusion at which I have arrived, that the Act of 1906 has not altered but has preserved the law upon this point as it stood before 1906, and that law was that under a policy on goods at and from a port to a port, the venture and not the goods merely was the subject-matter insured. For the foregoing reasons the decision under appeal is, in my judgment, right on both points. It follows that this appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

BECKER, GRAY & CO. v. LONDON ASSURANCE CORPORATION

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Earl Loreburn, Lord Dunedin, Lord Atkinson, Lord Sumner and Lord Wrenbury). March 19, 20, 22, 23, 26, July 12, October 29, 1917]

[Reported [1918] A.C. 101; 87 L.J.K.B. 69; 117 L.T. 609; 34 T.L.R. 36; 62 Sol. Jo. 35; 14 Asp. M.L.C. 156; 23 Com. Cas. 205]

Insurance—Marine insurance—Cargo—Right of assured to recover under policy—

Insurance against war risks—Abandonment of voyage to avoid not actual peril but only possibility of capture—Proximate cause of loss—Strict construction.

On a claim for the constructive total loss of goods insured under a marine policy containing a war risks clause in the usual form insuring against "men of war, enemies and surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes and people" the question to be asked in accordance with the rule of English law is: Was the frustration of the adventure due to a peril insured against or to something done to avoid such a peril?, the assured being entitled to succeed only if the answer to the first alternative is in the affirmative and the onus of proving that the loss was due to an actual peril being on the assured.

By a policy of marine insurance dated June 28, 1914, the assured, English merchants, insured cargo on a voyage from Calcutta to Hamburg in the German steamship, the K., against perils which included those covered by a war risks clause in the terms stated above. The K. left Calcutta in July. On Aug. 4 war was declared between Great Britain and Germany. On Aug. 5 or 6 the master of the K. put into Messina, later moving to Syracuse where the vessel remained from Sept. 4 onwards. The master put into Messina because he knew that British and French warships were likely to be in the Mediterranean and felt that if he proceeded on his voyage the ship, being a German vessel, would be in danger of being captured. On Sept. 1 and Dec. 16 the assured gave the insurers notice of abandonment, which the insurers refused to accept, and on Dec. 17 they issued a writ claiming for a constructive total loss of the cargo insured.

Held: the assured having failed to discharge the burden which was on them of proving that the master put into Messina because of the existence and under the stress of a present and actual peril, he appearing voluntarily to have taken the action he did merely to avoid a peril, their claim failed.

Observations of LORD SUMNER regarding the strict construction applied in English law to causation in policies of marine insurance.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from an order of the Court of Appeal, reported [1916] 2 K.B. 156, affirming a judgment of BAILHACHE, J., [1915] 3 K.B. 410, in an action in the Commercial List tried by him without a jury.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of BAILHACHE, J. This is an action against underwriters on goods, the goods being a part cargo of jute under a policy which is dated June 28, 1914, and on a voyage from Calcutta to Hamburg in a German steamer, the Kattenturm. The part of the cargo with which I am concerned, was sold on June 11, 1914, to a German firm, but it is conceded that on the material dates the property in the goods remained in the plaintiffs, the sellers. The Kattenturm left Calcutta in July. Finding that war had broken out, the master, on Aug. 5 or 6, put into the Italian port of Messina, and afterwards shifted from Messina to Syracuse, and was in Syracuse from Sept. 4 onwards. The shifting from Messina to Syracuse is of no importance so far as the point which I have to decide in this case is concerned. When the ship put into Messina, and afterwards again while she was at Syracuse, the plaintiffs gave notice of abandonment. They gave their first notice on Sept. 1 and they gave the second notice on Dec. 16 and they issued their writ on Dec. 17. The underwriters declined to accept either notice of abandonment, but in both cases stated that they would treat the matter as though a writ had been issued. I have to consider, therefore, what the state of affairs between these parties was at the beginning of September, 1914. The master of the Kattenturm had put into Messina because he thought that was a prudent thing to do. His was a German ship; the French and English fleets were watching the seas, and he felt, and quite rightly felt, that if he had proceeded on his voyage the ship was in grievous danger of capture. A letter has been put in, and is to be treated by me as evidence in this case, from the Admiralty, in which the writer says :

"I am commanded to inform you that any German steamer proceeding on or after Aug. 5 last through the Mediterranean on a voyage to Hamburg would, in their Lordships' opinion, have been in peril of capture by British or allied warships when outside neutral territorial waters."

I have no doubt that the master, from his point of view, did a very prudent, the most prudent, thing that he could do when he put into Messina. The plaintiffs made many attempts to get possession of the portion of the cargo which belonged to them. The master was willing to give it up, but only on certain terms, the most material of which was that he demanded the payment of his freight in full. In the result, and after many efforts and threats of legal proceedings, the master was induced to give the cargo up, and the cargo was ultimately sold by the plaintiffs to an Italian buyer, for a sum of a little over £1,000. I am not concerned with that matter very much, because the question which I have to determine is not what happened to the cargo afterwards, but what was the position of affairs in

A September; and, moreover, it was agreed, and quite rightly agreed, between the cargo owners and underwriters that the efforts which the cargo owners made to secure possession of the cargo and to realise it for the best price that they could obtain for it should not in any way prejudice their rights if they had any under the notice of abandonment which they had long before that given. It is, of course, abundantly clear that the voyage from Messina to Hamburg could not in fact be continued. A letter has been read to me in which the agents of the Hansa Line, the owners of the steamer, say that the master had not given up all thoughts of prosecuting the voyage, but I have no doubt myself that the master had no thought of prosecuting the voyage at all until the termination of the war. When the termination of the war will be nobody knows, and at any rate it is certain to be so long and indefinite a period that the voyage was taken to be abandoned, and was no doubt for all practical purposes abandoned, when the master put into Messina.

C Having stated the facts BAILHACHE, J., continued: the policy contained the usual restraints of rulers and princes clause, and counsel for the plaintiffs has argued that the loss of the venture—not the loss of the goods, because the goods were not themselves lost: they were sold for a considerable sum of money, but the loss on the venture—which, as the law now stands, constitutes a constructive total loss of the goods, is due to one of the risks insured against; and he refers more particularly to the words “men-of-war.” He refers, of course, to the whole of the clause, but the words which he most particularly relies on are the words “men-of-war.” The plaintiffs put their case in two alternative ways. They say in addition that after the vessel put into Messina to have allowed this cargo to go on would have been trading with the enemy contrary to English law and contrary to the proclamations which were in force at the time; and then they say that the goods were further lost because they were in possession and the control of alien enemies, namely, the master and owners of the Kallenturm, and that the alien enemies declined to give the goods up. So far as the last alternative is concerned, it is sufficient to say that that was not pressed; it was not withdrawn, but so far as I can see there is nothing at all in that point. As to the trading with the enemy point, I do not think that arises because, if there was any loss at all, it must be put that there was a loss of the venture, and a complete loss and destruction of the venture, when the Kallenturm put into Messina. I find as a fact that the master, notwithstanding his owners’ letters or his agent’s letters, had no intention of prosecuting the voyage further than Messina within a time which would have been commercially practicable at all, and that the voyage was there and then abandoned. The loss of goods, so far as they were lost, was due to the fact that the voyage was abandoned at Messina, and that there was a destruction of the commercial adventure there. I do not think, therefore, that the second alternative on which the plaintiffs relied, but not strongly, is a matter which I need seriously consider. What I have seriously to consider is whether the goods were lost within any of the words of the restraints of princes clause in the policy, and in particular whether they were lost owing to men-of-war. The position was that, if the master had prosecuted the voyage he would have been in serious danger of capture; it is quite likely, and I anticipate, that if he had in fact prosecuted the voyage and gone much further he would have been captured by either the French or the British fleet. He put into Messina because he was afraid of that event happening. Does that bring him within the words of the policy? Whether the avoidance of a peril, or an attempt to avoid a peril, is in substance the same thing as a loss by the peril depends very much on what the nature of the peril is, and it seems to me quite clear upon the cases that an attempt to avoid capture is not the same as a loss by capture. I do not think it is absolutely necessary that there should be a de facto capture; I think that appears from Butler v. Wildman (2), the case of the Spanish dollars. On the other hand, it is quite clear that the avoidance of a peril under most circumstances is not the same as loss by the peril itself. That appears from a number of cases—Hudkinson v. Robinson (3) and Kacianoff v. China Traders

Insurance Co., Ltd. (4), and also from an intermediate case between those two, Nichols & Co. v. London and Provincial Marine and General Insurance Co. (5), a decision of MATHEW, J.

That being the state of the authorities, and bearing in mind that actual capture or actual seizure by men-of-war is not necessary, and that the peril must have begun to operate, to use the expression in the Kacianoff Case (4), and, to use another expression which is in Hackinson v. Robinson (3), that the peril must be operating directly and not circuitously, what one has to consider is: What is the true view to be taken upon the facts in this case? It is quite obvious to me that is a question of degree, and, that being so, the dividing line between one case and another must often be very thin and very subtle. It appears from the Kacianoff Case (4) that, if the Kattenburch had been chased into Messina, the peril of capture would have begun to operate, and I think in that case it might be said that the abandonment of the voyage, the constructive total loss of the goods by the destruction of the venture, was caused by a peril within the policy. If one looks at Butler v. Wildman (2) precisely the same thing happened there, only in an accentuated degree. Not only was the ship chased by a hostile man-of-war, but the chase was so hot that the master of the ship preferred to throw the valuable cargo that he had, the Spanish dollars, into the sea rather than that they should fall into the hands of the enemy. Therefore, the dollars were not actually captured by the enemy, but there was clearly a loss by capture and the courts so held. In this case there was no chasing by a hostile man-of-war at all. There was no sighting of a hostile man-of-war. The Kattenburch was not driven by either the chasing or the sighting or the intelligence of a particular man-of-war into Messina. The master went into Messina because he feared, and rightly feared, that if he prosecuted his voyage the ship would be captured. The truth of the matter is that he went into Messina to avoid the peril of capture. To use the words upon which counsel most relied, he went into Messina to avoid the peril from "men-of-war" which he would have incurred if he had proceeded upon his voyage.

Those being the considerations on one side or the other, which was it? Had the peril of capture, the peril of "men-of-war," begun to operate, or was this a case where the master had in time gone into a port to avoid the commencement of the operation of that peril? Obviously, that is a point about which different people will have different views. My own view, and I entertain quite a clear view, is that the master went into Messina to avoid the peril of men-of-war and to avoid the peril of capture. He went in in time to avoid the beginning of the peril of capture. The peril of "men-of-war," to use the words of the lords justices in the Kaciano Case (4), had not begun to operate, and the master very prudently went into Messina. It may very well be that the plaintiffs would have desired to insure themselves against that very event. Except that they got considerable salvage, the goods were lost to them, equally lost as they would have been if the ship had been captured. I am reminded that the goods were English goods, and that, if the ship had been captured by a British or French ship, there would have been no loss of the goods, but in the ordinary case except for salvage the goods would be just as much lost where a ship puts into port to avoid the commencement of the peril as if they are lost by the peril itself. I have to construe the words in this policy and say whether the risks which are mentioned in the policy were risks which in fact caused the loss. In view of the decisions in the cases I have mentioned I am unable to say that the goods were lost—that the venture was destroyed, by any risk insured against. There was a case of very considerable importance which came before me and afterwards before the Court of Appeal. The name of it is Sunday & Co. v. British and Foreign Marine Insurance Co. (1). There was a division of opinion in the Court of Appeal, but my judgment was affirmed by a majority. The decision of the Court of Appeal was affirmed by the House of Lords: ante p. 134. I discussed this very point in that case, and, although I am reluctant to refer to any decision of my own, yet it does express the view that I

A entertained at that time, and the view which I still entertain, of the law applicable to this case. I say ([1915] 2 K.B. at p. 788):

B "One last point remains: Was the restraint of princes the proximate cause of the loss? The defendants say no, and refer me to a line of cases of which Hadkinson v. Robinson (3) is an early example, and Kacianoff v. China Traders Insurance Co., Ltd. (4) is, I think, the latest. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, refer me to Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Co. (6). It is, I think, correct to say that the Hadkinson v. Robinson (3) line of cases proceeds upon the principle that a loss which arises from steps taken to avoid a peril cannot be said to be due to the peril so avoided. In deciding within which set of authorities a given case falls it must always be borne in mind that much depends upon the character and description of the particular peril which has to be alleged and relied upon as the cause of the loss."

C Notwithstanding that it is my own expression of the law, I think that is sound, and being of the same opinion, and applying the same test to the facts of this case, I have come to the conclusion that this case is not like, but is the opposite of, Sanday's Case (1), and that these goods were not lost by a peril insured against. D The result must be that my judgment is for the defendants with costs.

The plaintiffs appealed to the Court of Appeal who affirmed the decision of BAILHACHE, J., and the plaintiffs now appealed to the House of Lords.

E Sir John Simon, K.C., and R. A. Wright for the appellants.

Leslie Scott, K.C., Adair Roche, K.C., and T. Mathew for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

Oct. 29, 1917. The following opinions were read.

F EARL LOREBURN.—I agree with the order appealed from, because it seems to me that both parties have accepted as sufficient the Admiralty statement that a German steamer would have been "in peril of capture" if she proceeded on or after Aug. 5 on a voyage to Hamburg. They have left that evidence there without more. It is therefore the measure of the danger which the ship would have to run in proceeding on this voyage. That will not be enough for the plaintiffs' case. I should have thought that capture would have been a certainty, but I have no right to act upon my own beliefs or conjectures upon a question of fact when there is evidence on which the parties rely. And there may be very good reasons of G which I am unaware of being content with the Admiralty view.

LORD DUNEDIN.—I think that the facts of the case, and the law applicable thereto, were so clearly and accurately stated by BAILHACHE, J., the trial judge, that in truth there is little left to add. His judgment was confirmed unanimously by the learned judges of the Court of Appeal.

H If there were no decisions on the point, and the expression "men-of-war, enemies, and restraints of princes," as used in a policy of insurance, had to be considered for the first time, it might not be difficult to say that the adventure in this case was frustrated by the outbreak of war, and, that being so, to hold that it fell within the words as above. This, indeed, is the result at which the jurists of the continent and of America have arrived. Thus PHILLIPS ON INSURANCE (5th Edn.), I vol. 1, c. 13, s. 10, para. 1115, after stating the question "whether a loss consequent upon imminency of a capture, arrest, restraint, or detention is within the risk assured by insurance against such perils," cites EMERIGON and other foreign jurists, and pronounces the correct rule to be as follows:

"When after the risk has begun the voyage is inevitably defeated by blockade or interdiction at the port of departure or destination or by a hostile fleet being in the way, rendering the proceeding upon it utterly impracticable, or capture or seizure so extremely probable that proceeding would be inexcusable, the risk continues till the vessel has arrived at another port of discharge adopted instead of that originally intended; and also that an assured on the cargo has a right to abandon."

The English authorities have not adopted this rule. They have followed the view of LORD ALVANLEY expressed in Hutchinson v. Robinson (3) in 1803. The current of authority is unbroken, and Kacianoff v. China Traders Insurance Co., Ltd. (4) may be taken as a modern example. We are asked to construe an expression in a mercantile document of ancient origin, interpreted by decisions that have stood for more than a century. In such a case the only safe rule for a court is stare decisis. I do not cite the cases because that has been done in the courts below. In accordance with the English rule the question to be asked is: Was the frustration of the adventure due to a peril, or to something done in order to avoid a peril? The onus to show that the loss was due to a peril is on the appellants. How do they seek to show it? What they really urge may be reduced to two things. First, the fact of the master putting into Messina instead of going on. Second, the statement by the Admiralty that, in their opinion, a German vessel proceeding on or after Aug. 5, 1914, through the Mediterranean on a voyage to Hamburg would have been in peril of capture by the allied fleets. The first fact is equally consistent with conduct to avoid a peril as with the existence of a present and actual peril, and the second is far short of proof of actual peril to the ship. The Admiralty statement is entirely vague—indeed, it could not be otherwise—as to when the peril would begin or become imminent. I am of opinion, therefore, that the appellants fail to discharge the burden upon them, and that is enough, though if I had to decide positively I should decide as BAILHACHE, J., did, that the captain went into Messina to avoid a peril and not under the stress of an actual peril.

There remains the argument founded on the decision of this House in Sanday's Case (1). The direct application of that case fails for the simple reason that this was a German ship, and that there was no illegality in the master continuing the voyage if he thought fit. He did not think fit, and his action it was that terminated the adventure. Sanday's Case (1) was not intended to decide and did not decide that by the mere declaration of war all goods in transitu to a German port or town were constructively totally lost. It was urged that in this case in terms of the policy the risk continued till the goods were delivered to the consignee, and as the consignee could not get delivery without paying freight to the German captain—which would be trading with the enemy—that constituted a loss of the adventure of the same character as in Sanday's Case (1). The answer lies in the facts. It was not the impossibility of paying freight, but the conduct of the captain that actually put an end to the adventure. The same doctrine of causa proxima which decides the first point decides this also. I think the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD ATKINSON.—I agree.

LORD SUMNER.—The Kattenburg left Malta, westward bound, on Aug. 3, 1914. The next that is known of her is that the captain took her into Messina on the 6th, saying that he did so to avoid capture. Between the 3rd and the 6th he had found out that Germany was at war. How or when he learned this; why he chose Messina as his port of refuge; whether he so much as saw a hostile vessel or was seen by one, we do not know. To sail direct from Malta to Messina need not have taken three days. No doubt, after proceeding some substantial distance on his course, he turned back, but a thing beyond that is guesswork. He may have counted on a short war and expected to go on again soon, but I think he abandoned the voyage to Hamburg when he bore up for Messina. No point, however, has been made that, with the abandonment of the voyage, the voyage policy also determined, so as to discharge underwriters from a loss only caused thereafter, and I will not pursue the subject. There is evidence of the existence of peril of capture

A from Aug. 5 onwards, but it is carefully limited. The Admiralty's reply to an inquiry made on the plaintiffs' behalf, which is not before us, has been accepted as admissible evidence. It states that "any German steamer proceeding on or after Aug. 5 through the Mediterranean on a voyage to Hamburg would have been in peril of capture . . . when outside neutral territorial waters." That is all. We know nothing of the actual numbers of the possible captors or of their particular positions; we do not know if the presence of the Kattenturm was known to any of them. Memory may tell us that some of them at any rate had other things to think of just then, but I suppose we must act as if we knew nothing about it. I lay no stress on the words "on a voyage to Hamburg," although during some part or possibly the whole of Aug. 5 the Kattenturm was on a voyage to Messina, and was no longer on a voyage to Hamburg. That she would have been "in peril of capture" conveys by implication that she would have had a chance of escape, but here again the plaintiffs give us no information. At any rate, there is no evidence of any peril of capture before Aug. 5. As to the subsequent period, we know nothing of the ship's speed or equipment, or of the state of her bunkers. I have no doubt that the opinion of the Admiralty was sound, and I should have been a good deal surprised (and, may I say? disappointed) if she had gone on her way and had escaped capture, but when or where that fate would have overtaken her no one can tell. Certainly, no one who realises the vast size of the ocean and its multitudinous vicissitudes can doubt that she might well have evaded capture for many days, and for all that we know she might have been lost by fire or stranding or some cause unconnected with hostilities before ever any enemy hove in sight.

E In these circumstances the plaintiffs' argument was rested mainly on (i) loss by capture or some consequence of hostilities or (ii) alternatively, by restraints of princes. The sequence of events under the first head was as follows. Peril of capture outside neutral territorial waters led the captain to the reasonable conclusion that having got safely into Messina he had better stay there. This involved the frustration of the commercial adventure of carrying the cargo to Hamburg and there delivering it under the bills of lading, whereby, in law, the cargo became a loss. F On the second head, the point was that from the outbreak of war the plaintiffs were by English law restrained from trading with the enemy or doing any acts in furtherance of such trading. Hence as they could not, durante bello, lawfully pay freight against delivery of the goods in Hamburg, their adventure came to a sudden and untimely end on the outbreak of war, and their cargo was forthwith constructively a loss. G In neither case does the argument avail, if the loss was one "which is not proximately caused by a peril insured against": Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 55 (1).

I If there is any real distinction to be drawn between a loss by perils insured against and a loss by successfully avoiding them, between a loss by capture and a loss by the fear of it, one might think that it arises in this case. It was self-restraint, not restraint of princes, that hindered the captain from putting to sea. H I do not say that he ought to have done otherwise, but the plain fact is that he could do as he liked. On both contentions, if the captain had chosen to go on, the plaintiffs could not have prevented him. He might have picked his own time; he might have weighed his chances at leisure; reasonable delay would not amount to abandonment of the voyage. Even an early peace was not wholly beyond the bounds of possibility. Accordingly, the plaintiffs further argued that the captain's election was not the proximate cause of the loss, because to have done otherwise would have been mere folly; that he had no real choice at all; and that British subjects, when the law forbade to trade with the enemy in futuro by paying freight to this German ship in Hamburg, if ever she arrived, were in law restrained in presenti, so that a loss of their cargo proximately resulted. The possibility that in the meantime events might occur which might legalise the act and avert a loss, such as the conclusion of peace or the grant of the Royal licence to pay the freight in order to get the goods, was, they said, of no significance.

These contentions have involved some criticisms of the rule of proximate cause, or rather of its true application in insurance cases, which, I venture to think, proceeded from a misapprehension of what this rule really is. There is no mystery about it. Cause and effect are the same for underwriters as for other people. Proximate cause is not a device to avoid the trouble of discovering the real cause or the "common sense cause," and, though it has been and always should be rigorously applied in insurance cases, it helps the one side no oftener than it helps the other. I believe it to be nothing more nor less than the real meaning of the parties to a contract of insurance. I venture to say so because eminent judges have sometimes seemed to differ on the point. LORD DENMAN, speaking of this rule in De Vaur v. Salvador (7), says (4 Ad. & El. at p. 431): "Such must be understood to be the mutual intention of the parties to such contracts." In Reischer v. Borwick (8) ([1894] 2 Q.B. at p. 550) LINDLEY, L.J., says the same thing. In Leyland Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society, Ltd. (9) ([1917] 1 K.B. at p. 892), on the other hand, SCRUTTON, L.J., doubts this and considers the rule to be a judge-made rule. I daresay few assured have any distinct view of their own on the point, and might not even see it if it were explained to them, but what they intend contractually does not depend on what they understand individually. If it is implicit in the nature of the bargain, then they intend it in law just as much as if they said it in words. I think that it is so implied. Indemnity involves it apart from decisions. In effect it is the act of the parties. I am not aware that any branch of the law of contract attaches importance to remote causes as such, though, where human responsibility is material, it may be necessary to go beyond and behind the mere event which caused the loss or damage. This is why a carrier is liable for losses by perils excepted from his contract to carry and deliver, where the previous default of those for whom he is responsible has brought that peril into injurious operation. His express stipulation for exemption has to be reconciled with his implied undertaking to have the carriage performed with care: Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Co. (10), per WILLES, J. (L.R. 1 C.P. at p. 612); Hamilton, Fraser & Co. v. Pandorf & Co. (11), per LORD HALSBURY, L.C. (12 App. Cas. at p. 524). So in marine insurance, where "the loss is attributable to the wilful conduct of the assured": Marine Insurance Act, 1906, s. 55 (2) (a); after the loss by perils insured against has been proved the question still remains whether the assured's wilful conduct caused them to operate. In other cases the insurer "is liable for any loss proximately caused by a peril insured against even though the loss would not have happened but for the misconduct or negligence of the master or crew": s. 55 (1) (a). In a contract of sale or carriage or service the contractor promises to do something for a price, a freight, or a wage, and his liability depends not simply on the question whether something has happened or failed to happen, but whether more remotely it happened or failed to happen owing to his breach of his obligation. In a contract of indemnity (and a contract of suretyship is very analogous) the insurer promises to pay in a certain event and in no other, namely, in case of loss caused in a certain way, and the question is whether the loss was caused in that way, and whether the event occurred, and the remoter causes of this state of things do not become material. If contracts of marine insurance were still regarded, as once they were, as aleatory bargains this would be plain on the face of them. One need only ask, has the event, on which I put my premium, actually occurred? This is a matter of the meaning of the contract, and not, as seems sometimes to be supposed, of doing the liberal and reasonable thing by a reasonable assured. This is why, as it seems to me, the causa proxima rule is not merely a rule of statute law, but is the meaning of the contract writ large. This is also why the reasonableness of the conduct of the Kattenburg's captain, and the unreasonableness of suggesting that he might have done otherwise are alike off the point. So long as his action was voluntary it was his action and not that of the captain of a British man-of-war, and the policy insures against the second, but against the first only when it amounts to barratry. There is no case here of duress nor opportunity for saying that his will was not free, except upon grounds too theological to be worth pursuing.

It must be admitted that the terminology of causation in English law is by no means ideal. It would be the better for a little plain English. I think "direct cause" would be a better expression than causa proxima. Logically, the antithesis of proximate cause is not real cause, but remote cause. LORD ELLENBOROUGH uses causa causans as its equivalent in Gordon v. Rimmington (12). ABBOTT, C.J., speaks of "immediate" cause in Walker v. Mailland (13); LORD FITZGERALD of "direct and immediate" cause in Cory v. Burr (14) (8 App. Cas. at p. 406), and my noble and learned friend, LORD LOREBURN, of "direct" cause in Sanday's Case (1) (ante at p. 134). Many similar expressions might be quoted. Again, it is important that the same word should mean the same thing when used in a mercantile contract, whether that contract be of one description or another. Perils of the seas do not mean one thing in a bill of lading and something else in a policy; restraints of princes do not bear a different interpretation in the one or in the other, but this is not the question. Restraints of princes may excuse non-delivery of cargo under a contract of carriage, and yet not cause a loss of cargo recoverable under a contract of insurance. It is settled now that mere apprehension that a restraint of princes will come into operation is not the same thing as its existence or availability for either purpose. There is also authority for saying (Nobel's Explosives Co. v. Jenkins & Co. (15)) that if restraint of princes is in being and reasonably likely in the long run to prevent performance of a contract, if its further performance is proceeded with, any further performance is forthwith excused, although the direct operation of the restraint has not yet occurred. This is because the contract of carriage, truly construed, so stipulates. It has no bearing upon the question whether a refusal of further performance, though excusable, is the effect of the carrier's exercise of judgment or the effect of the restraint of princes.

Many cases have been cited to your Lordships, but none to the contrary of this. In Rodoconachi v. Elliott (16) (L.R. 9 C.P. at p. 522) the Germans had prevented all communication between Paris and other places from Sept. 19, 1870, down to the date of the writ. Events before Sept. 19, it was held, might give rise to some claim against carriers, but could afford no defence to underwriters, if, as was the case, a loss by restraint of princes then occurred and thenceforward continued. The contention that some direct action on the goods was necessary was rejected. There was no question of election or volition on the part of those in charge of the goods. How this case helps the appellants I cannot see. That in Rodoconachi's Case (16) the goods were ashore and here were afloat makes no difference. It is said that regard must be had to changes in the mechanism of war, and that cruisers at Gibraltar as truly shut up this jute in Messina in 1914 as the German besiegers shut in the silk at Berey in 1870. I do not suppose that any rule can be laid down to fix the distance from which an encircling force may be said to besiege a beleaguered city, or from which a hostile force may be said to restrain its enemies. I doubt if changes in the speed of ships or the possibility of signalling by wireless telegraphy or otherwise affect the matter. They help the hunter no more than the quarry. Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Co. (16) was a case in which a f.c.s. clause warranted the policy free of certain perils and their consequences. It was held that beyond doubt there was a loss by restraint of princes under the policy apart from the warranty, the only question being whether it was also caused by perils included in the f.c.s. clause, so as to be taken out of the insurance. STIRLING, L.J., expressly says ([1903] 1 K.B. at p. 721) that the captain did not act voluntarily. The frustration of the adventure was caused by the direct operation of an order, which was an act of State and was backed by the existence of available force though its employment proved to be unnecessary.

I will not review the cases generally or discuss the differences between the English and the United States authorities, but I will refer to a decision of LORD MANSFIELD, which shows at how early a date a strict construction was applied to causation in policies of insurance. It is Jones v. Schmoll (17). The policy was on prime slaves, male and female, to pay for mortality by mutiny exceeding ten per cent. A mutiny occurred and was suppressed; much blood was shed. Lord Mansfield allowed the value of those slaves who died of wounds or jumped overboard when fired on as being losses by mutiny, but not the value of "such as being killed in their attempts chose a mode of death by fasting and died through dependency," because "this is not a mortality by mutiny, but the reverse, for it is by failure of mutiny." The cases down to that of Kacianoff v. China Traders Insurance Co., Ltd. (4) all follow one uniform and logical line. If any is illogical it is Baile v. Wildman (2), for there the dollars went to the bottom, and that by the prompt decision of the master. The adventure of which they formed part was captured, and so they may be said to have been lost to their owners by capture, though the Spanish captors never got them. The immediate and actual control, which the captors possessed by armed force over the whole adventure, was equally a capture of the part, and perhaps it is the best way of putting it to say that the captors captured the whole adventure, but the captain balked their profiting by a part of it, though as the owners did not get their dollars back their loss by capture was not adeemed.

I think British and Foreign Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. v. Samuel Sanday & Co. (1) is distinguishable. There both ships and goods were British, and your Lordships' judgments were based on the fact that the ship abandoned the voyage as the proximate result of the outbreak of war. It was held that no distinction could be drawn for the purpose of causation between the event which called the subject's duty into existence and the subject's obedience to that duty. So high was the obligation that an act done in performance of that obligation did not causally bear the character of a voluntary act or of a new intervening cause. Such a decision does not support the contention that the abandonment of the voyage by a ship, which was under no such obligation, is other than the captain's voluntary act, or that the obligations of a purely passive cargo-owner can divest that voluntary act of the character of a new intervening cause, which it would otherwise bear. If it were otherwise, some remarkable consequences would follow. At 11 p.m. on Aug. 4, 1914, all the world over, every parcel of goods owned by His Majesty's subjects and laden on board of German vessels or of neutral vessels bound for German ports, for freight not prepaid, suddenly became a total loss. Both ships and goods might be safe and sound and likely to remain so; cargo-owners and shipowners, captains and crews, might all be ignorant of the outbreak of war. The assured, for want of advice that their goods were afloat, might have made no declarations to underwriters under floating policies, and the underwriters might be quite unaware that they were at risk. None the less on that day and at that hour the ocean became suddenly full of constructive total losses securely laden in uninjured ships. British underwriters are entitled to sue and labour for the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the goods insured or to endeavour to save them for the benefit of whom it may concern, but they, equally with British cargo-owners, would be forbidden to pay freight to German shipowners for that purpose. Indeed, unless by British capture they could come by their own again, the cargo-owners would have to let their goods remain in enemy hands, and that at the expense of British underwriters. Where the ships belong to His Majesty's subjects such is the law—your Lordships have so decided; but I should be loth to carry that decision beyond its true ratio decidendi. The language of my noble learned friends, Lord LORCH (ante p. 130); Lord ATKINSON (ante p. 138); Lord PARMEER (ante p. 141); and Lord GREENFELD (ante p. 143), shows that the illegality of any further prosecution of the voyage, both ship and master being British, was the ground of the decision. In truth, in the present case the outbreak of war imposed no practical disability on the British cargo-owners then and there beyond what already existed. Their obligations as British subjects had nothing to do with the actual termination of this adventure. The declaration of war, at the time when it was made, only prohibited acts which

A the plaintiffs were in any case already powerless to perform. If it frustrated the adventure, it did so eventually, but at the same time, though for different reasons and in a different way, the captain of the Kallenturm frustrated it forthwith. If he had continued the adventure and had proceeded, the cargo-owners might have sustained a recoverable loss by other perils insured against without any illegality on their part.

B The appellants' other contentions may be shortly disposed of. This is not a case in which the subject-matter of the insurance was abandoned "on account of its initial total loss appearing to be unavoidable" within s. 60 of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906. Neither is it a case of loss by any other peril "that may come to the hurt" of the cargo similar to enemies, as in The Knight of St. Michael (18). It is said that there was a direct loss by "enemies" when the German captain refused to deliver to the plaintiffs' representative at Messina, except on payment of freight, which he had not earned, and of charges which were not due. To be sure he said that he did so by order of his government, but I do not see why we should believe him. BAILHACHE, J., did not, and it does not appear what motive he had for speaking the truth. Committed in neutral waters his act was a mere civil wrong, and not one falling within the cause of loss called "enemies" in the policy. For these reasons I think that the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

LORD WRENBURY agreed in the appeal being dismissed.

ADAM v. WARD

[House of Lords (Lord Finlay, L.C., Earl Loreburn, Lord Dunedin, Lord Atkinson and Lord Shaw), February 19, 20, 22, 23, 26, March 22, 1917]

Libel—Privilege—Qualified privilege—Privileged occasion—Publication in pursuance of interest or duty—Extent of privilege—Express malice—Proof—Questions for judge.

H A privileged occasion for the purpose of the defence of qualified privilege to an action for libel occurs where the words complained of as defamatory were published in pursuance of an interest or of a duty, legal, social, or moral, to publish them to the person to whom they were published and the person to whom they were published had a corresponding interest or duty to receive them. The reciprocity is essential. The bonâ fide belief of the defendant that there existed such an interest or that he was under such a duty to make the communication is immaterial, for the thing which is relevant to the question whether or not the occasion was privileged is the existence in fact of the duty or interest and not merely the defendant's belief in the existence of the one or the other.

I It is for the judge alone, and not for the jury, to determine as a matter of law whether an occasion is privileged, unless the circumstances attending it are in dispute, in which case the facts necessary to raise the question of law should be found by the jury.

Qualified privilege can be rebutted by proof of express malice, i.e., malice other than that to be implied from the defamatory words themselves. It is for the judge to decide whether there is any evidence of express malice fit to be left to the jury, i.e., whether there is any evidence on which a reasonable man could find malice. Malice may be inferred either from the terms of the communication itself—e.g., where the language is unnecessarily strong or from any facts which show that the defendant in publishing the words complained of was actuated by spite or some indirect motive.

The privilege extends only to a communication on the subject with respect to which privilege exists. It does not extend to a communication on any extraneous matter which the defendant may have made at the same time, for the existence of privilege on one matter gives no protection to irrelevant libels introduced into the same communication. Anything that is not relevant and pertinent to the discharge of the duty or the exercise of the right or the safeguarding of the interest which creates the privilege will not be protected. The judge must consider the nature of the duty, right, or interest, and rule whether or not the defendant has published something beyond what was germane and reasonably appropriate to the occasion, or has given to it a publicity incommensurate to the occasion. The introduction of extraneous matter may afford evidence of malice which will take away protection on the subject to which privilege attaches.

Libel—Agent—Publication by—Principal entitled to plead privileged occasion—Liability of agent.

Per LORD ATKINSON: It is true that one cannot defend himself for publishing a libel simply by saying that another person whom he was bound to obey ordered him to publish it, but it is equally true that when an agent, in obedience to the command of his principal, merely does the mechanical act of publishing the libel handed to him complete, the privilege of the principal becomes his privilege, and, if the principal has caused the communication to be made to protect an interest or discharge a duty which would have made the occasion privileged if he had published the libel with his own hand, the agent can equally rely on the publication having been made on a privileged occasion. For this purpose he stands in the shoes of his principal, has the same rights, and the same liabilities.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (BUCKLEY, PICKFORD and BASKIN, L.JJ.), reported (1915), 31 T.L.R. 299, reversing a judgment of DARLING, J.

The facts appear in their Lordships' opinions.

Sir Hugh Fraser for the appellant.

Sir John Simon, K.C. (the Attorney-General, Sir Frederick Smith, K.C.), and Branson with him, for the respondent.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Mar. 22, 1917. The following opinions were read.

LORD FINLAY, L.C.—This is an action for libel, and the questions that arise in this appeal are whether the occasion was privileged, and if so whether there was evidence of express malice.

The facts so far as they are material lie in very short compass. Major Adam, the plaintiff and appellant, was an officer in the 5th Royal Irish Lancers, in 1906, stationed at Aldershot. The commanding officer of his regiment was Colonel Graham, who in the autumn of 1906 made a confidential report with regard to Major Adam. This report was submitted to Major-General Scobell, and was by him transmitted, together with notes of his own upon it, to General Sir John French, who was general officer commanding-in-chief at Aldershot. This report, with the notes upon it, is in the evidence called the "Combined Report." It was not shown to Major Adam before being sent in, as it ought to have been by the King's Regulations, but it was shown to him some weeks later—about Dec. 6, 1906. On Nov. 3, 1906, Sir John French sent in a confidential report of his own with regard to Major Adam. Neither of these reports was produced at the trial, as the Secretary of State stated that it was contrary to the public interest that they should be put in evidence. A letter dated Dec. 1, 1906, was sent from the Army Council to Sir John French, stating, with reference to a letter of his of Nov. 3, reporting the unsuitability of Major Adam as a cavalry leader in the field, that after full consideration of the circumstances of the case it had been decided that he should be called upon to forward an application to retire from the service, failing which it would be necessary to submit for His Majesty's approval his removal from the army, and that Sir John French was requested to communicate this decision to Major Adam. Major Adam wrote begging for a re-consideration of this decision, or, failing that, for the longest possible grace before sending in his papers, in order that he might get something to do, and in the result, owing to the good offices of Major-General Scobell, Major Adam was given a post in the office of the Chief of the General Staff. He remained at this post until January, 1910. On Oct. 18, 1907, it was announced that he and four other officers were to be placed on half-pay, and on Nov. 30 of the same year a communiqué appeared stating that this action was not due to any cause detrimental to the character of these officers, and that though they were not considered suitable to retain their positions as officers in the 5th Lancers, their services could be, and in three cases were being, utilised in other appointments, and that the regiment was not inefficient to take the field. In October, 1909, Major Adam asked that the circumstances under which he was placed on half-pay should be re-considered with a view to his reinstatement on full pay, but he was informed by a letter of Nov. 3 that his case had been carefully considered and that the Army Council saw no reason to re-open the question. In January, 1910, Major Adam was returned as member of the House of Commons for Woolwich, and vacated his staff appointment. On June 27, 1910, he made a speech in the House of Commons in which he referred to the case of Captain Bryce-Wilson, one of the five officers who had been placed on half-pay, and read out in the House the following statement:

"That Major-General H. J. Scobell, Royal Irish Lancers, did render to the supreme authority a confidential report or confidential reports on an officer or officers under his command, which report or reports contained wilful and

A deliberate misstatements of fact, thereby deceiving those in authority to whom the report or reports were rendered, and causing injustice to be done to one of the regiments under his command."

Major Adam then went on to say, according to the report in HANSARD, which was in evidence:

"Major-General Scobell is on his way home at the present time from South Africa. He arrives in England at the end of this week, and I hope when he sees the report of this in the papers—as I intend he shall do—he will appreciate the meaning of the words, 'wilful and deliberate misstatement of fact.' I have tried to make it clear, and I hope he will turn up the paragraph in the King's Regulations which compels an officer in a case like this to refer the matter to his superior authority—the superior authority in this case being the Army Council. I hope sincerely that the Army Council will see that justice is done to Captain Wilson and that penalties are meted out to those officers who deserve it."

This speech must have conveyed to everyone who heard it or read the report the impression that Major-General Scobell was charged with conduct unworthy of an officer and a gentleman within the meaning of the King's Regulations. It is impossible to suppose that Major Adam did not intend to convey this impression. At the trial, however, he stated that he did not impute such unworthy conduct to Major-General Scobell, and that he said what he did merely in order that Major-General Scobell might demand an inquiry to clear himself, in the course of which Major Adam believed information might be obtained with regard to the attack upon him which he believed to be contained in the Combined Report. I abstain from comment upon Major Adam's conduct in making, for such an indirect purpose, an unfounded attack upon General Scobell, who had rendered Major Adam great service at the time of his removal.

Major-General Scobell brought the matter before the Army Council, who, after investigating it, issued through the Press the letter which is complained of as a libel upon Major Adam, and which forms the subject of this action. It was addressed to Major-General Scobell, and is as follows:

"In reply to your letter of July 8, 1910, asking that an inquiry should be instituted in regard to a statement made by Major W. A. Adam, M.P., in the House of Commons on June 27 to the effect that while in the command of the 1st Cavalry Brigade you rendered confidential reports on certain officers which reports contained wilful and deliberate mis-statements of facts, I am commanded by the Army Council to inform you that a thorough investigation has been made of the reports made by you at that time on certain officers of the 5th Lancers, who were afterwards removed from the regiment, and to whom it is believed that Major Adam's statement bore reference. Major Adam is himself one of these officers. The council also thought it proper to address a letter to Major Adam on the 23rd ult., inquiring whether he desired to forward for their consideration any statement in amplification or substantiation of his charge against you. On the 29th idem a reply was received from Major Adam to the effect that he had written to the Secretary of State for War on the subject, but his letter of the same date to the Secretary of State is found to contain nothing pertinent to the present investigation. The council are satisfied that not only did your reports contain the unbiassed and conscientious opinion you had formed on the officers in question, but that the conclusion at which you arrived were correct, as they were afterwards borne out not only by the opinion of your successor in command of the 1st Cavalry Brigade, but also by a special report on the 5th Lancers made by H.R.H. the then inspector-general of the forces, and confirmed by the general officer then commanding-in-chief the Aldershot command. Further, as showing the absence of hostile bias, the Army Council note that in the case of Major Adam, who in 1906 was called upon to retire from the service in consequence of adverse reports, which were duly communicated to him, you intervened on his behalf and urged the council to give him another chance in an extra-regimental appointment. In the result it was decided to give Major Adam this chance. I am to add that the council are of opinion that the charge brought against you by Major Adam is without foundation."

The action was brought on Nov. 14, 1912, against Sir E. Ward, by whom, as secretary to the Army Council, the letter complained of had been signed and issued to the Press in obedience to the orders of the Army Council. The defendant did not dispute that the letter was defamatory of the plaintiff, but pleaded privilege. The case was tried before DARLING, J., and a special jury. Four questions were left by the learned judge to the jury. These questions, with the answers of the jury, are as follows: 1. Was the publication a matter of a public nature?—No. 2. Was the publication made by the defendant in discharge of his duty as secretary to the Army Council and for the purpose of affording information to the public?—Answer to both branches of this question: Yes. 3. Was the subject-matter of such publication by the defendant matter about which it was proper for the public to know?—No. 4. Was the matter contained in the letter appropriate for the public to know?—No. The jury assessed the damages at £2,000, and, on application being made for judgment, the learned judge said:

"On those findings I hold that the publication was not a privileged publication, nor a publication on a privileged occasion, and therefore I should enter judgment for the plaintiff."

The defendant appealed to the Court of Appeal, which held that the occasion was privileged and that there was no evidence of malice, and directed judgment to be entered for the defendant. The plaintiff, Major Adam, appealed from this judgment to your Lordships' House and asked that judgment should be entered for him, or, alternatively, that the case should be sent down for a new trial.

The law of privilege is well settled. Malice is a necessary element in an action for libel, but from the mere publication of defamatory matter malice is implied, unless the publication were on what is called a privileged occasion. If the communication were made in pursuance of a duty or on a matter in which there was a common interest in the party making and the party receiving it, the occasion is said to be privileged. This privilege is only qualified, and may be rebutted by proof of express malice. It is for the judge, and the judge alone, to determine as a matter of law whether the occasion is privileged, unless the circumstances attending it are in dispute, in which case the facts necessary to raise the question of law should be found by the jury. It is further for the judge to decide whether there is any evidence of express malice fit to be left to the jury—that is, whether there is any evidence on which a reasonable man could find malice. Such malice may be inferred either from the terms of the communication itself, as if the language be unnecessarily strong, or from any facts which show that the defendant in publishing the libel was actuated by spite or some indirect motive. The privilege extends only to a communication upon the subject with respect to which privilege exists, and it does not extend to a communication upon any other extraneous matter which the defendant may have made at the same time. The introduction of such extraneous matter may afford evidence of malice which will take away protection on the subject to which privilege attaches. The communication on the extraneous matter is not made upon a privileged occasion at all, inasmuch as the existence of privilege on one matter gives no protection to irrelevant libels introduced into the same communication.

That the occasion of this letter was privileged seems to me to be clear beyond all controversy. Major Adam had made a violent attack upon the character of Major-General Scobell, who appealed to the Army Council for inquiry. It was the duty of the Army Council to inquire into the truth of this charge and to make

A the result of that inquiry known as widely as possible. It is said that there was unnecessary publicity given to their findings, but it must be remembered that Major Adam's speech in the House of Commons had been extensively reported, as he obviously intended it should be when he made his attack upon Major-General Scobell, and the Army Council did no more than their duty in giving a wide publicity to their finding that the charge was unfounded. It had been said that
B their observations as to the plaintiff, Major Adam, were not relevant to their vindication of Major-General Scobell, and that privilege does not extend to this portion of the letter. These observations appear to me to be directly relevant. The plaintiff did not mention in his speech in the House of Commons that he was himself interested in the matter, and anyone who heard or read his speech would have been left under the impression that he was a perfectly disinterested person
C who had taken up the case of a brother officer. The vindication by the Army Council of Major-General Scobell would have been incomplete if the true relation of Major Adam to these proceedings had been left out. The two passages especially impugned were—first, the statement that the plaintiff was one of the officers who had been removed from the regiment, and second, the following instance:

D "Further, as showing the absence of hostile bias, the Army Council note that in the case of Major Adam, who in 1906 was called upon to retire from the service in consequence of adverse reports, which were duly communicated to him, you intervened on his behalf and urged the council to give him another chance in an extra-regimental appointment. In the result it was decided to give Major Adam this chance."

E So far from being alien to the investigation of the charge made by the plaintiff against Major-General Scobell both these passages appear to me to be directly relevant to it. It was essential to show that Major-General Scobell had been actuated by a friendly feeling towards the plaintiff, and it was as incidental to this that the fact that the plaintiff had been called on to retire should be introduced. The privilege extended to the whole letter, and there is nothing either in the letter
F itself or in the surrounding circumstances to supply any evidence of express malice. I agree with the Court of Appeal in thinking that the judge ought to have ruled that the occasion was privileged. The learned judge ruled that there was no evidence of malice against the defendant personally, as he had acted for the Army Council and under their orders. The question was really not one of personal malice on the part of the defendant. He was the agent and servant of the Army Council, and must stand or fall with them. If the letter was published on a
G privileged occasion as regards the Army Council and without malice on their part, their secretary, through whom the communication was made by them, has the benefit of the privilege which attached to the council itself. If, on the other hand, the occasion had not been privileged, or there was express malice, their secretary would be liable, although he personally had no ill-will towards the plaintiff. In my
H opinion, this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

I EARL LOREBURN.—In this case counsel has put forward all that could possibly be urged on behalf of the appellant with a fairness which added to the weight of his argument. But he has failed to show that there is any evidence of malice either in the defendant or in the Army Council. The document charged as a libel admittedly contains matter which admits of a defamatory sense, and the defendant's counsel did not dispute that it in fact had a defamatory meaning. Accordingly, that issue was not left to the jury. There is no plea of justification, and, therefore, the one remaining question is that raised by the plea of privilege.

I understand the law to be as follows. It is for the judge alone to rule whether or not there is an occasion of privilege, and the rule on that subject was laid down many years ago in Toogood v. Spyring (1). Subsequent decisions have illustrated that rule. But the fact that an occasion is privileged does not necessarily protect all that is said or written on that occasion. Anything that is not relevant and pertinent to the discharge of the duty or the exercise of the right or the safeguarding of the interest which creates the privilege will not be protected. To say that foreign matter will not be protected is another way of saying the same thing. The facts of different cases vary infinitely, and I do not think the principle can be put more definitely than by saying that the judge has to consider the nature of the duty or right or interest and to rule whether or not the defendant has published something beyond what was germane and reasonably appropriate to the occasion, or has given to it a publicity incommensurate to the occasion. For a man ought not to be protected if he publishes what is in fact untrue of someone else when there is no occasion for his doing so or when there is no occasion for his publishing it to the persons to whom he in fact publishes it. All this is for the judge alone, and the question of malice, which is for the jury, cannot arise till the judge has ruled on the whole question of privilege. Language has been used in some cases which seems somewhat to confuse the two separate points—namely, whether the defendant has gone beyond the privilege which the occasion creates, and whether the defendant has forfeited the privilege by malice. Excess of privilege in part of a defamatory publication may, of course, be evidence of malice as to the whole of it, but the two things are different. The one is a matter for the judge, the other is matter for the jury. And observations made by judges in directing juries as to what is evidence of malice are not necessarily applicable when they have to rule as to excess of privilege. But I agree that in ruling upon that subject a judge may well think that a man is justified in inculcating his accuser in order more effectively to exculpate himself, and also may well think that the defendant has not exceeded the privilege when he has expressed himself with some warmth under real provocation, though no one can be justified in using such an occasion beyond the reasonable limits of self-defence. I will only add that when one part of a libel is held to be protected by privilege and the other part not protected the jury ought to be told that they cannot give damages in respect of the first part at all, unless they are satisfied that it was malicious, which may be proved by the character of the unprotected part or by other evidence.

Applying this view of the law to the present case, I am quite sure that the attack made on General Scobell by the appellant in the House of Commons not only permitted but required the Army Council to vindicate the conduct of that officer, and that both that council and the defendant, who acted by their direction, were in the fullest sense within the privilege recognised by the law when they published to the country at large a defence of General Scobell. I have had more doubt upon the question whether or not all that is contained in the letter which forms the subject of this action was covered by the privilege, and am disposed to take on that point the same view of the facts that appears from his summing-up to have been taken by DARLING, J. But in view of the speech of the appellant made in the House of Commons, where he used an absolute privilege to attack another officer who had done him no wrong, but, on the contrary, had befriended him, I could not possibly approve of the heavy damages awarded by the jury, and I shall not dissent from the order which commends itself to your Lordships.

LORD DUNEDIN.—The pleadings and evidence in this case are voluminous and the issue of importance to those concerned. Yet, notwithstanding the elaborate and painstaking address of the counsel for the appellant, I cannot say that I have any doubt or hesitation in thinking that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right. The reasons given for that judgment by LORD WREXBERY, then BUCKLEY, L.J., are entirely satisfactory to my mind. I only venture to add some remarks of my own, because some of the leading principles of the law of libel and privilege have been freely discussed and this case will take rank in the future as an authoritative pronouncement on these matters. I do not propose to enter in detail into the facts of the case as that has already been done by the Lord Chancellor, and I shall

A only mention those which are necessary to make intelligible the conclusions at which I have arrived.

The primary fact is the speech made by the plaintiff in the House of Commons on June 27, 1910, and in particular the paragraph he read from a type-written sheet in order, as he said, "that there may be no mistake and that I may not be led away by rhetorical exaggeration." I need not quote it, as that has already been done. To my mind these words could, to the audience which heard them or to the ordinary man who read them in HANSARD or in a newspaper report, only convey one meaning—that General Scobell had inserted, with deliberate purpose, false statements of fact in a report or reports as to officers under his command, and had thereby deceived those in authority, with the consequence that a certain regiment had been unjustly treated. It is true that on a critical analysis of the words "rendered" and "containing" it is possible to make the sentence fit with the idea that the false statements in the report were not of General Scobell's own fabrication, but were merely forwarded by him. But neither is that the natural meaning of the words nor is it what the plaintiff intended should be understood by them, for he admits in cross-examination that he phrased the passage as he did in order to compel General Scobell to take up the matter under the King's Regulations; and the only part of the King's Regulations which impose such a duty is the paragraph which compels an officer whose "character or conduct as an officer or a gentleman has been impugned" to ask for an inquiry. He seeks to excuse himself by saying that the inquiry, if held, would have shown that the real culprit as to the false statements was Colonel Graham and not General Scobell. That the words used contained an imputation on General Scobell's honour no one can doubt. Under the King's Regulations, the general could not deal with the matter himself, but was bound to do what he did—bring the matter before the Army Council and ask them to inquire as to the truth of the accusation made against him. On this it appears to me clear that there arose on the part of the Army Council a duty, not only moral, but actually legal, under military law to make the inquiry demanded. In what particular way or form the inquiry should be held was, I think, a matter for them and no one else to determine. The Army Council proceeded to institute an inquiry, but before doing so they called on the plaintiff to furnish them with any statement he might wish to make "in amplification or substantiation" of the charge that he had made. To this the plaintiff replied that as the inquiry was to be conducted by themselves, and as the Army Council "had forfeited the confidence of the army and the public," he did not propose to do anything more. The Army Council, accordingly, held the inquiry within, so to speak, their own walls. They came to the conclusion that the charge made was unfounded. They wrote a letter to General Scobell telling him so, and they published that letter.

If the matter is thus baldly stated, can it for a moment be supposed that this publication is not a performance of a moral if not even of a legal duty, and as such privileged? Let us look at the situation. General Scobell is grossly attacked in a speech in the House of Commons, a speech which in that place, from motives of high public policy, is protected by absolute privilege. Under the King's Regulations he may not take up the matter himself and defend himself in the public Press. He is bound to refer the matter to the Army Council and await their verdict. The verdict is in his favour. What would that avail him unless there was a right in the Army Council to publish the result at which they had arrived? If it were not so, then the absolute privilege of the House of Commons, intended to safeguard the liberty of discussion, would be really turned into an abominable instrument of oppression.

Two replies are, however, made to this, which I shall take in their order. It is said, first, that the publication here was to an unduly wide public—that there was no duty to publish to every one, but only to those who were likely to have become aware of the accusation, and that to make such a wide publication as was here made was in accordance with no duty or right. I think that a man who makes a statement on the floor of the House of Commons makes it to the world. True it never reaches every person in the world. In some cases, if the orator is unknown to fame, and the statement intrinsically unexciting, it may not reach very many. But no one knows whom it may reach, and it was only, I think, plain justice to General Scobell that the ambit of the contradiction should be spread so wide as if possible to meet the false accusation wherever it went. Do what you will the stern chase after a lie that has got the start is apt to be a long one. As a matter of fact the Army Council instructed their secretary, the defendant, to send the communication to the channels to which they ordinarily send all official communications. The list is a long one and the ambit of influence is wide; but, in my judgment, the list was not longer or the ambit wider than was demanded by justice to General Scobell.

The second reply raises what is, I think, the real and only point in the case. I have hitherto dealt with the communication as if it was a bald statement of the unfoundedness of the charge against General Scobell. But the letter was a long one, and it is urged that in so far as it went beyond the mere statement of General Scobell's innocence and proceeds to say things defamatory of the plaintiff, it was not in the exercise of any duty or right, and that for these statements there is no privilege. In discussing this question a controversy was raised at the Bar as to what is the accurate way of expressing the legal doctrine. It has to be kept in view that the learned counsel for the defendant did not put forward the contention that the language used was not defamatory of the plaintiff. At first sight this is rather startling in view of the expressions used and in the light of the facts of the case. I should have thought that what may be called the moral effect of this attitude on the jury would be rather disastrous. I do not doubt that the words used—upon which I shall comment shortly—were such that the judge could not, if asked, have removed them entirely from the conscience of the jury by ruling that they were incapable of a defamatory interpretation. But they were equally capable of an innocent interpretation, and an interpretation which squared with the underlying facts of the case. Now, it is one thing, so far as moral effect is concerned, to say: "I meant what I wrote innocently, and I contend that is the true meaning of the words used"—even although it may eventually be decided against you that the true interpretation is otherwise—and another to say from the first, "I cannot deny that the words I used were defamatory." That words intended innocently may yet be held to be defamatory is quite certain. No better illustration can be given than E. Hulton & Co. v. Jones (2). In that case, in which there was difference of opinion between the learned judges, and where certainly the high water mark of the doctrine was reached, but which, as a decision of your Lordships' House, is certainly the law, no one for a moment supposed that the writer of the article was using words which he thought were defamatory of the plaintiff, Artemus Jones. He did not even know of his existence. Yet none the less the words were held to be defamatory, because they could be read by the ordinary reader as so applying. [But see now Defamation Act, 1952, s. 4, especially s. 4 (5) (a).] Notwithstanding, however, that the admission thus made is startling, I have come to the conclusion that it makes no difference to the matter in hand. In other words, the admission of the defendant through his counsel that the words used were in themselves defamatory puts the case in precisely the same position as if the judge had left the true meaning of the words to the jury—as I think he would, if there had been no admission, have been bound to do—and the jury had found that were defamatory.

What now is the situation? You have a communication issued on a privileged occasion; and in gremio of that communication are used words which are in themselves defamatory. What test is to be applied? On the one hand, it is said that, the occasion being privileged, the whole document is privileged, but that if in the document you find parts which are not really necessary to the fulfilment of the particular duty or right which is the foundation of the privilege on the occasion,

A then that these parts may be used as evidence of express malice. In other words, it stands thus. Malice, which is of the essence of libel, is presumed from defamatory words. Privilege destroys that presumption. But the place of the implied malice which is gone may be taken by express malice which may be proved. It may be proved either extrinsically or intrinsically of the document, and such words in the document are apt as evidence. Thus BUCKLEY, L.J., states as to the whole matter:

"There are two questions. The first whether the occasion was a privileged occasion, and if it was, then, secondly, whether there was any evidence of malice."

C On the other hand, it is said that it is not necessarily a question of malice at all: that privilege applies to what is written and published in response to a duty or right: and that if anything is found in the thing published which is not reasonably appropriate to that duty or right then privilege cannot extend to that. I think it will be found that in most cases these are merely two ways of expressing the same point. But there is this to be said in favour of the former method, that it is a formula which as a test will fit most if not all cases, whereas the second would necessarily break down in a good many. For it could always be said with apparent force that it never can be necessary to incorporate in a statement made in response to a duty or right any defamatory statements which is not logically necessary to fulfil that duty or right. Thus cases like Spill v. Maule (3), "most disgraceful and dishonest," and Laughton v. Bishop of Sodor and Man (4), "bring false witness against a neighbour," would, if tried by this latter test alone, be wrongly decided, though as a matter of fact I do not think it is suggested that they were anything but right, and, in my opinion, they were right, as, indeed, becomes evident if they are tried by the first test.

F I have not said that the first test is universally applicable, and for this reason. If the defamatory statement is quite unconnected with and irrelevant to the main statement which is ex hypothesi privileged then I think it is more accurate to say that the privilege does not extend thereto than to say, though the result may be the same, that the defamatory statement is evidence of malice. But when the defamatory statement is, so to speak, part and parcel of the privileged statement and relevant to the discussion, then I think the first way is the true way to put it, and under it will also range all the cases where the express malice is arguable from the too great severity or redundancy of the expressions used in the privileged document itself. In short, I adopt the law as laid down by ESHER, M.R., in Neville v. Fine Art and General Insurance Co., Ltd. (5). The learned judge there says ([1895] 2 Q.B. at p. 170):

H "... in this case there was no evidence of such malice. That being so, the defendants have proved that the occasion was privileged, and there was no evidence of malice in the mind of anybody to rebut that privilege, and the defence stands good. But, then, the jury were asked to find, and have found, that the privilege was exceeded. There may be an excess of the privilege in the sense that something has been published which is not within the privileged occasion at all, because it can have no reference to it. Instances have been put during the argument of cases where a defendant, on an occasion which is privileged as between himself and some other person, makes some defamatory statement affecting a third person which has nothing to do with the privileged occasion, in which case, of course, that third person would have a right of action against the defendant, and as between him and the defendant there would be no privileged occasion. But when there is only an excessive statement having reference to the privileged occasion, and which, therefore, comes within it, then the only way in which the excess is material is as being evidence of malice."

A good illustration of a statement outside the privileged occasion will be found in Warren v. Warren (6).

This question is of necessity closely connected with the question of the respective functions of the judge and of the jury. I do not think it necessary to analyse the very numerous decided cases which were cited to us in the course of the argument. I have studied them all, and what I am about to say is, I believe, the true doctrine to be drawn from them. But it may be as well to make this remark, that certainly some confusion has resulted from the use of the convenient phrases "privileged statement" and "extension of the privilege." Strictly speaking, it is the occasion on which a statement is made that is privileged, and the phrase that such and such a statement is privileged, would be more accurately, though perhaps more clumsily expressed by saying that the statement, having been made on a privileged occasion, malice cannot be implied from defamatory expressions therein, but must be proved as a real fact. The malice to be proved must be real malice, and is generally called express malice to distinguish it from the malice which is implied from the defamatory words themselves. The duty of deciding whether the occasion is privileged is cast upon the judge alone, and the jury has no hand in it. The criterion whether the occasion is privileged or not is most tersely stated in the well-known passage of PARKE, B.'s, judgment in Toogood v. Spyring (1 Cr. M. & R. at p. 193):

"... fairly made by a person in the discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, or in the conduct of his own affairs in matters where his interest is concerned."

Again:

"If fairly warranted by any reasonable occasion or exigency, and honestly made, such communications are protected for the common convenience and welfare of society, and the law has not restricted the right to make them within any narrow limits."

The judge must put the question suggested by that definition to himself. If the statement is, so to speak, divisible into parts, it may be that the judge may come to the conclusion that certain parts are not truly referable to the particular right or duty which in the case in hand is the foundation of the privilege. If so, he will so find—that is to say, he will find that para. 1 is referable and appropriate to a privileged occasion, para. 2 is not so. Then if para. 2 contains defamatory words, malice will be implied as to them. If, however, he finds that both paragraphs are referable and appropriate to the privileged occasion, then, as it is more commonly, but less accurately, expressed, he finds that the privilege extends to the whole statement. In that case the next question he has to put to himself is whether the defamatory words complained of are capable of affording, from their own nature alone, evidence of express malice. If he holds them incapable, and there is no other evidence extrinsic of the document, then the plaintiff's case is gone, and the jury has not to be called upon at all. But if the judge thinks that the words are so capable, then he must leave it to the jury to say whether from the words alone, or in conjunction with extrinsic evidence, if there be any such, express malice has been proved. It might thus occur, though the case will probably be rare, that, as above imagined, defamatory words in the non-privileged para. 2 could afford evidence of express malice in connection with the expressions used in privileged para. 1. I need scarcely add, but it makes the statement complete to do so, that if there is controversy whether the words used are defamatory or not, it is for the judge to determine whether they are capable of a defamatory meaning, and that being resolved in the affirmative, it is for the jury to find whether they are actually defamatory or not.

I now return to the facts of this case, and here I am of opinion, concurring with the Lord Chancellor, that the present is a case where the defamatory statement was

A part and parcel of the privileged statement and relevant to it. [His Lordship discussed the facts.] I am accordingly of opinion that privilege attaches to the statement here complained of: that no malice can be implied: and that to succeed the plaintiff must prove express malice. As to express malice, all the learned judges, including the trial judge, are agreed that there is absolutely no evidence, either extrinsic or intrinsic, of malice on the part of the defendant, Sir Edward Ward. For my own part, I fail to see how, if it was once shown that Sir Edward Ward was merely obeying orders when he signed a statement drawn up by the Army Council and sent it for publication, and was relying, as he was entitled to do, on the privilege which attached to the action of his superior and principal, the Army Council, any evidence as to malice on his part could be relevant. It is not necessary, however, to decide that question. It is only necessary to add that there is not a shred of evidence of malice on the part of the Army Council. Their malice, in my view, would be relevant. But as it does not exist it is unnecessary to consider that question either.

There are two other matters which, although not affecting the judgment to be pronounced, ought, in my opinion, to be mentioned. The learned judge who tried the cause took what I believe is a very unusual course in two particulars. He disposed of the question of malice while the question of privilege was still unsettled. I do not know if this can be said to be wrong, but at least it is highly inconvenient. The second matter is more serious. In order to dispose of the question of privilege he put to the jury certain questions, of which three were as follows: "Was the publication [the document published] a matter of a public nature?" "Was the subject-matter of such publication by the defendant matter about which it was proper for the public to know?" "Was the matter contained in the letter proper for the public to know?" To all of which the jury returned a negative answer, and upon that the learned judge said: "Upon these findings I hold that the publication was not a privileged publication nor a publication on a privileged occasion." It is clear that so far as the questions go they assume that the foundation of the duty or right which was invoked to support the privilege was that the matter discussed was one of public importance; whereas the true foundation in this case was the duty of the Army Council to make publicly known their vindication of General Scobell's honour. But apart from that, and in view of what I have already stated as to the provinces of judge and jury, I entirely agree with the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, who held that these questions were for the judge and not for the jury. If there is some fact left in controversy which must necessarily be determined one way or the other, to allow the judge to view the complete situation and thus enable him to decide whether the occasion was privileged or not, it would be right for the judge to ask the jury to determine that fact. But to put to them questions such as these and then on the findings to find privilege or the reverse is simply to ask the jury to decide for him the question which it is his duty and not theirs to determine.

LORD ATKINSON said that DARLING, J., might possibly have ruled on the question of law whether or not the occasion on which the alleged libel was published was a privileged occasion, but for the answers he had received from the jury in reply to questions as to certain things the existence of which went to make the occasion of the publication privileged. He did not leave the question of privilege or no privilege to the jury, but he did leave to the jury the question as to the presence or absence of the elements which went to create privilege. For instance, the question: "Was the subject-matter of the publication by the defendant matter about which it was proper for the public to know?" And the question: "Was the matter contained in the letter appropriate for the public to know?" It was to be regretted that the remarks of WILLES, J., in Henwood v. Harrison (7) were not brought to DARLING, J.'s, notice. WILLES, J., a most learned, laborious, and accurate judge, after stating that since the declaratory Libel Act, 1792, the jury were the proper tribunal in civil as in criminal cases to decide the question of libel or no libel, said (L.R. 7 C.P. at p. 628):

"But it is not competent for the jury to find that upon a privileged occasion relevant remarks made bonâ fide without malice are libellous. . . . It would be abolishing the law of privileged discussion and deserting the duty of the court to decide upon this as upon any other question of law, if we were to hand over the decision of privilege or no privilege to the jury. A jury according to their individual views of religion or policy might hold the Church, the Army, the Navy, Parliament itself, to be of no national or general importance, or the liberty of the Press to be of less consequence than the feelings of a thin-skinned disputant."

HIS LORDSHIP continued: It was not disputed in this case on either side that a privileged occasion is, in reference to qualified privilege, an occasion where the person who makes a communication has an interest or a duty, legal, social, or moral, to make it to the person to whom it is made, and the person to whom it is so made has a corresponding interest or duty to receive it. This reciprocity is essential. Nor is it disputed that a privileged communication, a phrase often used loosely to describe a privileged occasion, and vice versa, is a communication made upon an occasion which rebuts the prima facie presumption of malice arising from a statement prejudicial to the character of the plaintiff, and puts the latter on proof that there was malice in fact: per PARKE, B., in Wright v. Woodgate (8) (2 Cr. M. & R. at p. 577). Nor that the question whether the occasion is a privileged occasion or not is, if the facts be not in dispute, or if in dispute have been found by the jury, a question of law to be decided by the judge at the trial. Nor yet that a person making a communication on a privileged occasion has not, in the first instance and as a condition of immunity, to prove affirmatively that he honestly believes the statement made to be true, his bonâ fides being in such a case always presumed: Jenoure v. Delmege (9); Clark v. Molyneux (10). All these matters were not questioned. They could not be questioned. Nor was it suggested that, while on the question of malice the bonâ fide belief of the defendant that he was under a moral or social duty to make the communication is relevant and important, the existence in fact of this duty or interest, not merely the defendant's belief in its existence, is the thing which is relevant to the question whether the occasion was or was not privileged: per LINDLEY, L.J., in Stuart v. Bell (11) ([1891] 2 Q.B. at p. 349).

It was, however, strenuously contended on the part of the appellant, as I understood, that the language used in a communication made on a privileged occasion must, if it is to be protected, merely be such as is reasonable necessary to enable the party making it to protect the interest or discharge the duty upon which the qualified privileges is founded. It has long been established by unquestioned and unquestionable authority, I think, that this is not the law. This point is of such importance that one may be excused for referring at length to three authorities, to show what the law on the subject really is, and in what light the language used in privileged communications is in a court of law to be regarded.

In Spill v. Maule (3) the libel sued upon was contained in a letter written by the defendant, a creditor of a firm who had been engaged by the firm to wind-up its affairs, to another creditor of the same firm. The plaintiff had had disputes with his partner before and during the winding-up, and he, suspecting that his partner, a member of the firm, was drawing out the money of the firm on his own account, took from the cash-box of the firm a parcel of bills, directing the clerk to take an account of them, and to tell his partner to debit his, the plaintiff's, account with them. The defendant dealt with this transaction in the above-mentioned letter, and stated that the plaintiff's conduct in reference to it "had been disgraceful and dishonest, and that its result had been to diminish the amount of the available assets of the estate." The plaintiff at the trial proved these facts. They con-

A stituted his case. Thereupon the presiding judge, MARTIN, B., directed a verdict for the defendant. A bill of exceptions was tendered to this ruling, on the ground that though the communication was privileged, yet the violent and abusive terms used in the letter were evidence of actual malice. The judgment of the Exchequer Chamber was delivered by COCKBURN, C.J., KEATING, LUSH, HANNEN, HAYES, and BRERT, JJ., concurring. The case is, therefore, one of high authority. After stating the facts, the Chief Justice said (L.R. 4 Exch. at p. 236):

B "The question then arises whether the language is too strong for the occasion, the terms applied to the plaintiff's conduct being 'most disgraceful and dishonest.' Now, the communication being privileged, the presumption is in favour of absence of malice in the defendant, and, in order to rebut that presumption, the plaintiff must show actual malice and he may, no doubt, show this by reference to the terms of the libel as being utterly beyond and disproportionate to the facts."

C He then proceeds to refer to the plaintiff's act in taking away the bills, and says (ibid. at pp. 236, 237):

D "This act was capable of a twofold construction. It might have taken place under such circumstances that the plaintiff could not properly be exposed to any moral censure; as, for instance, if he only intended to keep the assets in security for the benefit of creditors. Or the circumstances might have been such that in taking the bills he acted dishonestly and disgracefully. Now, the presumption of the law being in favour of the absence of malice in the defendant, and the only evidence of malice being his description of acts done by the plaintiff which were capable of a twofold construction, that presumption of innocence which attaches to the writer must also, where his act is capable of a double aspect, still attend him. . . . We have not to deal with the question whether the plaintiff did or did not act dishonestly and disgracefully. All we have to examine is whether the defendant stated no more than what he believed and what he might reasonably believe. If he stated no more than this, he is not liable, and, unless proof to the contrary be produced, we must take it that he did state no more."

F The direction of MARTIN, B., was accordingly upheld.

I I cannot find that the authority of this case has ever been questioned. It was cited with approval in Laughton v. Bishop of Sodor and Man (4), to which I am about to refer. It will be observed that the Chief Justice says that the terms of the libel which are evidence of malice are not merely such as are beyond the necessities of the occasion, but such as are utterly beyond and disproportioned to the facts. Laughton's Case (4) has, I think, a direct bearing upon the present case. The appellant Laughton, a barrister, having been retained to oppose at the Bar of the House of Keys a Bill in which the respondent was interested, in the course of his remarks very severely criticised the respondent and his mode of discharging his duties. The bishop, in an address which he read to his clergy assembled in convocation, and subsequently had printed and published in a local newspaper, the "Manx Sun," did not confine his observations merely to a defence of himself against the charges made against him. He, in addition, violently assailed and denounced his critic, Laughton. He accused him (L.R. 4 P.C. at p. 498) of making slanderous statements and uncharitable imputations under the apparent sanction of well-informed persons; of making statements with an entire disregard of truth; of being a wicked man; of making calumnious assertions; and of being guilty of the sin of bearing false witness against his neighbour. The Deemster before whom the case was tried ruled that the occasion on which the libel was published was a privileged occasion, but left to the jury the question of actual malice, of which the excessive nature of the bishop's language he apparently regarded as evidence. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £400. The Appeal Court of the Isle of Man set aside this verdict, on the ground that there was in the case no such evidence of express malice as justified the Deemster in leaving the question of malice to the jury. This decision was upheld by the Privy Council, on the ground that, having regard to the circumstances, and the nature of the attack upon him, the bishop might have honestly believed that everything he said was true and proper for his own vindication, although in fact some of his expressions exceeded what was necessary for it, and that the language of his charge was more consistent with such an honest belief and with the purpose of self-vindication than of injuring the plaintiff, but that had the bishop referred to the conduct of the plaintiff on any other occasion than that of his addressing the House of Keys, or made any general attack upon his private or professional character, the case would have been different. In delivering the judgment of the board SIR ROBERT COLLIER said (ibid. at p. 508):

"Some expressions here used [i.e., used by the respondent in his defence] undoubtedly go beyond what was necessary for self-defence; but it does not, therefore, follow that they afford evidence of malice for a jury. To submit the language of privileged communications to a strict scrutiny and to hold excess beyond the absolute exigency of the occasion to be evidence of malice would, in effect, greatly limit, if not altogether defeat, the protection which the law throws over the privileged communications."

That decision has been approved of many times. It was relied upon by LORD MACNAGHTEN when delivering judgment in Jenoure v. Delmege (9). Its soundness has not, I think, ever been questioned. In Nevill v. Fine Art and General Insurance Co., Ltd. (5) the appellant, Lord William Nevill, in the year 1892 became agent to the respondents, and conducted the agency at his own office, No. 27, Charles Street, St. James's. The appellant, after some months had passed, desired better terms, and a correspondence passed on this subject. In December, 1893, the secretary of the respondents wrote to the appellant informing him that the board of directors of the respondent company had decided to terminate the agreements with him. An alteration of terms was made, and the appellant continued to act as agent for the respondents. In answer to a question as to the appellant's intentions, his solicitor wrote on Mar. 13, 1894, that his client wished to sever all connection with the company, owing to the insufficiency of his terms. On Mar. 15, 1894, the secretary of the respondents sent to certain persons who had transacted business with them through the appellant's office stating that the agency of Lord William Nevill at No. 27, Charles Street, had been closed by the directors, and requesting them to direct all communications to the West End secretary at No. 19, St. James's Street. The innuendo put upon these words was that the agency of the appellant had been closed by the directors and that they meant the plaintiff had been dismissed by the defendants from his employment as their agent for some reason discreditable to him. POLLOCK, B., tried the case. He stated that he ruled that the occasion which required the writing of some such letter was privileged, that it was contended for the plaintiff that although the occasion was privileged that part of the letter which stated falsely that the agency had been closed by the directors was not called for by the requirements of the occasion, and was, therefore, in excess of the privilege. He accordingly left to the jury the question whether the defendants in making the statement that the plaintiff's agency was closed by the directors had exceeded the privileged occasion. The jury having first found that it was untrue that the directors had closed the agency, answered this question in the affirmative, and found a verdict in favour of the plaintiff for £400 damages, for which, after consideration, POLLOCK, B., entered judgment. There was no finding of actual malice. On appeal to the Court of Appeal it was decided, the occasion being privileged, that in the absence of a finding of actual malice, the defence of privilege was not rebutted, and that, it appearing on the facts of the case that there was no evidence of actual malice in the publication of the statement complained of, the action was not maintainable.

A LORD ESHER in his judgment deals with the question of this excess of privilege in the words which have been already quoted by my noble friend who has preceded me. LOPES, L.J., concurred, and in his judgment relied upon the passage I have already quoted from the judgment in Laughton v. Bishop of Sodor and Man (4). On appeal to the House of Lords all the noble Lords who took part in the decision were of opinion that the statement that the agency had been closed was true in fact in the only sense relevant to the context in which it was found, and that there was no evidence of malice. They upheld the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and LORD HALSBURY, referring to this statement, said ([1897] A.C. at p. 75):

C "But suppose it was not true, suppose it was not accurate in the sense in which people would have understood it, . . . suppose the persons who wrote that document intended to tell the truth and believed in the truth of what they were writing, even though in the mind of some other person it should be inaccurate in form, it seems to me that it would be impossible to contend that there would have been evidence of malice."

D These authorities, in my view, clearly establish that a person making a communication on a privileged occasion is not restricted to the use of such language merely as is reasonably necessary to protect the interest or discharge the duty which is the foundation of his privilege; but that, on the contrary, he will be protected, even though his language should be violent or excessively strong, if, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, he might have honestly and on reasonable grounds believed that what he wrote or said was true and necessary for the purpose of his vindication, though in fact it was not so.

E It was next urged on behalf of the appellant that the Army Council should have confined themselves to stating that the charges made against Major-General Scobell were on investigation found to be unfounded, and that he had been fully exonerated, and, therefore, that all the references contained in the libel to the appellant himself, his conduct, career, or the treatment he received, were foreign and irrelevant subjects, not pertinent to the discharge of the duty, or to the protection of the interest which form the basis of the privilege claimed, but were separable from the relevant parts of the libel, and, to use the words of LORD ESHER, were outside the privileged occasion and had nothing to do with it; and that since to afford a defence the whole communication should be within the protection of the privileged occasion, if part only were so, the entire communication ceased to be a privileged communication or to be protected. Some question was raised whether G the presiding judge was the person to decide whether any foreign and irrelevant matter had been introduced into the libel, and whether it was separable. I think it must be the judge who is to do so. He it is who must decide whether the occasion is privileged or not, and, if that be so, he must necessarily decide in respect of what portion of the libel the occasion would be privileged if it stood by H itself. A more difficult question, however, remains upon which the authorities cited give little, if any, assistance. It is this: What would be the effect of embodying separable foreign and irrelevant defamatory matter in a libel? Would it make the occasion of the publication of the libel no longer to any extent privileged, or would those portions of the libel, which would have been within the protection of the privileged occasion if they stood alone and constituted the entire libel, still I continue to be protected, the irrelevant matter furnishing possible evidence that the relevant portion was published with actual malice. In the absence of all guiding authority the latter would, in my opinion, be more consistent with justice and legal principle, and I think it is in law the true result. Owing, however, to the view I take of the contents of the libel this question is, to my mind, a purely academic one. I do not think any foreign or irrelevant matter has been introduced into the libel; but as the point has been raised and fully argued, and is itself of importance, it is, I think, desirable to decide it. I have accordingly expressed my own opinion upon it.

Some argument was directed to the defendant's precise position in relation to this libel, his right duties and privileges, his feelings towards the appellant and his express or implied malice. I think his position is plain. He was the mere agent of the Army Council, bound to obey their orders or resign his post—the mere instrument through whose hands the libel passed for publication. His own personal feelings or privileges are, I think, not involved in the case at all. He had nothing whatever to do with the composition of the libel or the approval of its contents. In the mere routine of the work of the office he signed his name to it and passed it on for publication in the way and over the area usual in such cases. To suppose that it was his duty to attempt to dissuade his principals from publishing the libel, to criticise their language, or, save at their request, to alter it, is, in my view, quite absurd. It is no doubt true that one cannot defend himself for publishing a libel simply by saying that another person whom he was bound to obey ordered him to publish it; but it is equally true that when an agent, in obedience to the command of his principal, merely does the mechanical act of publishing the libel handed to him complete, the privilege of the principal becomes, as it were, his privilege, and if the principal has caused the communication to be made to protect an interest or discharge a duty which would have made the occasion privileged if he had published the libel with his own hand, the agent can equally rely on the publication having been made on a privileged occasion. For this purpose he stands, in my view, in the shoes of his principal, has the same rights, and the same liabilities. I think this follows from the reasoning of the judgments in London Association for Protection of Trade v. Greenlands, Ltd. (12).

[His LORDSHIP said that, in his opinion, everything in the libel was pertinent and relevant to the central facts that the appellant had made charges against General Scobell and had failed to substantiate them, and that they had been investigated by the Army Council and found to be untrue. The next point urged on behalf of the appellant was that the publication of the libel was unnecessarily wide; that it extended over too vast an area; that neither the Army Council nor the appellant had any interest or duty to publish it to people inhabiting the remote parts of the Empire which the libel might reach; that the latter had no corresponding interest or duty in receiving the communication; and that either the occasion of the publication was, therefore, not a privileged occasion, or that the wide publication was evidence of actual malice. He (His LORDSHIP) could not agree. It might be laid down as a general proposition that where a man through the medium of HANSARD'S reports of the proceedings in Parliament, published to the world vile slanders of a civil, naval, or military servant of the Crown in relation to the discharge by that servant of the duties of his office, he selected the world as his audience, and that it was the duty of the heads of the service to which the servant belonged, if on investigation they found the imputation against him groundless, to publish his vindication to the same audience to which his traducer addressed himself. The Army Council would have failed in their duty to General Scobell personally, and to the great service which they in a certain sense governed and controlled if they had not given the widest circulation to the announcement of the general's vindication. For those reasons he was clearly of opinion that the occasion on which the alleged libel was published was a privileged occasion, and that there was no evidence of express malice either against the defendant or against the Army Council. The decision of the Court of Appeal was right and should be upheld, and the appeal be dismissed with costs here and below.]

LORD SHAW considered the facts and continued: The case, I humbly think, becomes, or should have become, a very ordinary one both in principle and in procedure. The occasion was clearly privileged, the communication dealt with matter germane to the occasion and was protected. Everything else was familiar

A ground, namely, that in such circumstances the inference that might otherwise have arisen from a statement prejudicial to the plaintiff is rebutted, and it is put upon him (the plaintiff) to establish affirmatively, in the words of PARKE, B., that there was "malice in fact—that the defendant was actuated by motives of personal spite or ill-will independent of the occasion on which the communication is made": Wright v. Woodgate (8) (2 Cr. M. & R. at p. 577). The leading place in authority is still held by Toogood v. Spyring (1). The most valuable judgment of WILLES, J., in Henwood v. Harrison (7) gathers the decisions together, including, especially, Harrison v. Bush (13) and Whiteley v. Adams (14), and sums them up in these terms (L.R. 7 C.P. at p. 622):

C "The principle upon which these cases are founded is a universal one, that the public convenience is to be preferred to private interests, and that communications which the interests of society require to be unfettered may freely be made by persons acting honestly without actual malice, notwithstanding that they involve relevant comments condemnatory of individuals."

D In actions for defamation, it is the province and duty of the judge to settle the question of privilege, and that without reference of it, or of what goes to establish it, to the jury. The entire mass of authority is, in my opinion, in support of this view, and it is the view adopted in everyday practice. It is not the province or duty of the jury to adjudicate upon or to settle the question of privilege. To use the language of WILLES, J. (Henwood v. Harrison (7), ibid. at p. 628):

E "It would be abolishing the law of privileged discussion and deserting the duty of the court to decide upon this as upon any other question of law if we were to hand over the decision of privilege or no privilege to the jury."

F How far this rule was departed from in this case will be presently seen. I am of opinion, that this case is one in which privilege should have been affirmed by the judge and the jury directed accordingly to proceed to what was the one and only remaining question—a question of fact within their province, namely, whether express malice on the part of the defendant had been affirmatively established by the plaintiff.

G It might well have been considered that there was nothing in the communiqué to which a libellous meaning could by any reasonable person be attached. This was not the course adopted by the learned counsel for the respondent; they not only admitted that there was matter which was open to a libellous construction, but they, as I read the proceedings, also admitted that the matter was in fact libellous. I fear that this caused much confusion. If it referred to the expression "removed from the regiment" when the plaintiff was put upon half-pay, it put briefly what the plaintiff himself spoke to when, being asked the effect of putting an officer on half-pay, he said, "It takes him off the regimental list," and what the defendant said, in answer to the court, an officer "put on half-pay is no longer an officer in the regiment." The admission made appears accordingly to run counter to the facts; and confusion might have ensued from a verdict of malice in such circumstances. Fortunately this situation was saved by the learned judge, who closed the whole matter by ruling

H "that there is no evidence of malice—not only no evidence of malice in the publication, but no evidence of malice on the part of the defendant in the publication of this document which would make it necessary for me to leave the case to the jury, if the occasion of its publication were a privileged occasion."

I With this ruling it was not open to the jury to find malice as a fact, and, again quite properly, there is no such finding. The case, however, went on for days after this intimation; the inquiry ranged very wide, so wide that I feel convinced that the jury may very well have come to the conclusion that the case they were trying was a case, not of libel, but truly of wrongful dismissal, and I do not for myself see how the verdict obtained in such circumstances could have stood. It is certainly unusual to find a verdict of a jury taken, not upon the question: "Was there malice?" not even upon elements which lead up to that as a fact, but upon the question of privilege and the elements which might be supposed to bear upon that question of law. I am humbly of opinion that the whole of that procedure was contrary to law. What happened was that the learned judge asked from the jury answers to certain questions, and the jury found (i) that the document was not of a public nature; (ii) that the defendant made the publication in the discharge of his duty as secretary to the Army Council; (iii) and for the purpose of affording information to the public, but that (iv) it was not proper for the public to know the subject-matter of the publication; (v) they gave a verdict for £2,000 damages. It is not necessary to consider whether these findings are supported by evidence. For it is clear beyond all question that the whole of them are in the region of the case relating to the purely and exclusively legal question of privilege. I respectfully agree with the submission made at the trial by the learned counsel for the respondent that "there is no issue of fact proper to be submitted to a jury in order to determine the privileged occasion." The learned judge did not accede. On the contrary, he relied in determining the question of privilege on the jury's findings. his language being: "On these findings I hold that the publication was not a privileged publication nor a publication on a privileged occasion."

For the reasons already given I am of opinion that this procedure was erroneous. The respective provinces of judge and jury were confounded. I think the verdict so obtained cannot stand, and this quite apart from the large admission of irrelevant and misleading matter to which I have adverted. But, further, being of opinion that the occasion was privileged, that the communication did not go beyond it, and that no malice was proved in making it, it appears to me that judgment should be entered for the defendant and that the course taken by the Court of Appeal was correct.

Appeal dismissed.

ADMIRALTY COMMISSIONERS v. STEAMSHIP AMERIKA (OWNERS). THE AMERIKA

[House of Lords (Earl Loreburn, Lord Parker of Waddington and Lord Sumner), July 20, 21, December 19, 1916]

[Reported [1917] A.C. 38; 86 L.J.P. 58; 116 L.T. 34; 33 T.L.R. 135; 61 Sol. Jo. 158; 18 Asp. M.L.C. 558]

Judgment—Judicial decision as authority—Long established rule of law—Right of court to review.

When a rule of law, e.g., the common law rule that in civil proceedings the death of a human being could not be complained of as an injury (see Baker v. Bolton (1) (1805), 1 Camp. 493), has been inveterate from the earliest time it is for the legislature and not for the courts to declare it to be wrong and to reject or amend it, unless it is clear that it was introduced by erroneous judicial decision (per EARL LOREBURN: not even where the court is of opinion that the common law ought originally to have been differently interpreted).

Damages—Duty to minimise loss—Seamen's lives lost through negligence—Claim respecting voluntary grants to dependants—Competency.

A submarine having been sunk through the negligent navigation of the respondents' steamship and all but one of her crew drowned, the Commissioners of the Admiralty brought an action against the steamship owners to recover the damage they had sustained, and they included in their claim a sum representing the capitalised amount of pensions and grants paid or payable by them to the relatives of the crew who were drowned. In Admiralty regulations it was stated that these were compassionate payments, granted of grace and not of right both in kind and in degree.

Held: a person aggrieved by an injury is not by common law entitled to increase his claim for damage by any voluntary act; the pensions and grants in question were always in fact made, but that was by the voluntary act of the naval authorities which, accordingly, and not the respondents' negligence, was the cause of the loss of the money to the Exchequer; and, therefore, the commissioners were not entitled to recover from the respondents in respect of these sums.

Master and Servant—Loss of service—Damages—Measure—Inclusion of grants paid to dependents of deceased servant in accordance with contract of service.

Per LORD SUMNER: Even if the action had been brought on a contract of employment providing for the payment of sums to the relatives of deceased employees those sums would not have been recoverable in an action for negligence, for the employer's damage must be measured by the value of the employee's services which were lost and the payments to the relatives would not be the natural consequences of the tort sued for.

Decision of Court of Appeal, [1914] P. 167, affirmed.

Appeal by the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom from an order of the Court of Appeal, affirming a decision of SIR SAMUEL EVANS, P., which confirmed a report of the assistant registrar disallowing a claim made by the commissioners as plaintiffs in an action for damage by collision in respect of the loss of life of the crew of His Majesty's submarine B2. The Court of Appeal decided that the effect of the decisions in Osborn (Osborne) v. Gillett (2), Clark v. London General Omnibus Co., Ltd. (3), and Jackson v. Watson & Sons (4) was to render binding upon the Court of Appeal the ruling of LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Baker v. Bolton (1) that "in a civil court the death of a human being could not be complained of as an injury." The court, therefore, decided that the commissioners' claim in respect of loss or damage suffered by them through the loss of life of the crew of the submarine was recoverable in law. The commissioners appealed.

H The Solicitor-General (Sir George Cave, K.C.), Sir John Simon, K.C., Laing, K.C., and Dunlop for the appellants.

Inskip, K.C., and Arthur Pritchard for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

Dec. 19, 1916. The following opinions were read.

I EARL LOREBURN.—In my opinion, this appeal fails. It is far too late for this House to disturb the rule expressed by LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Baker v. Bolton (1), even were we of opinion that the common law ought originally to have been differently interpreted, of which I am by no means persuaded. When a rule has become inveterate from the earliest time, as this rule appears to have been, it would be legislation pure and simple were we to disturb it. I also think that the damages sought are not in any way recoverable, because they represent sums of money which the appellants were not legally required to pay. Your Lordships have been interested in ascertaining the origin of LORD ELLENBOROUGH's decision. I share in that interest, but I cannot throw any light on the subject beyond what may be derived from the opinions of LORD PARKER and LORD SUMNER, both of which I have had the advantage and pleasure of reading.

LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—I agree. There are, in my opinion, two sufficient reasons why this appeal cannot succeed. The first is that the items of damage which the appellants desire to be allowed are too remote. The second is that no sufficient case has been made for overruling LORD ELLENBOROUGH's decision in Baker v. Bolton (1) to the effect that in a civil court the death of a human being cannot be complained of as an injury. I will deal with each of these reasons separately.

The items of damage which the appellants desire to have allowed consist of certain pensions and allowances. These pensions and allowances are granted under statutory authority, but it does not appear that their grant formed any part of the contract between the Admiralty and the seamen whose lives have been lost through the respondents' negligence. They are, it seems, compassionate pensions and allowances only, which, from a legal standpoint, the Admiralty might have granted or withheld at its discretion. Under these circumstances they cannot constitute an item of damage. No person aggrieved by an injury is by common law entitled to increase his claim for damage by any voluntary act; on the contrary, it is his duty, if he reasonably can, to abstain from any act by which the damage could be in any way increased. But further, even if the pensions and allowances in question were granted pursuant to contracts between the Admiralty and the deceased seamen, I should still be of opinion that they could not properly constitute an item of damage for loss of service. They would in this case constitute deferred payment for service already rendered, and have no possible connection with the future services of which the Admiralty had been deprived.

Passing to the second of the reasons above mentioned, I may point out that the correctness of the ruling in Baker v. Bolton (1) has since been accepted, not only by all courts in this country, but by the Supreme Court of the United States, nor can anything be found in the earlier authorities inconsistent with it. It was, it is true, severely criticised by LORD BRAMWELL in Osborn (Osborne) v. Gillett (2). It was, he considered, anomalous that a master should be entitled to recover for loss of service if his servant were wrongfully injured, but should be without any remedy if his servant were wrongfully killed. If it were any part of the functions of this House to consider what rules ought to prevail in a logical and scientific system of jurisprudence, much might no doubt be said for this criticism; though it is not, in my opinion, by any means clear that the anomaly does not in reality consist rather in granting the remedy in the former case than in refusing it in the latter. In a society based so largely as our own is at the present day upon contractual obligations, it does not appear why the wrongful injury of A., whereby he is prevented from fulfilling his contractual obligations to B., should confer on B. a right of action only where these obligations are those arising out of the relationship of master and servant, or, indeed, why the right should not be extended so as to cover all loss, whether arising out of inability to perform a contract or otherwise. This House, however, is bound to administer the law as it finds it. The mere fact that the law involves some anomaly is immaterial unless it be clear that the anomaly has been introduced by erroneous judicial decision. The appellants have, accordingly, attempted to show that LORD ELLENBOROUGH's ruling was erroneous, as being based either (i) upon a misconception of the limits within which the maxim actio personalis cum personâ moritur is applicable, or (ii) upon the mistaken notion that the rule of public policy which, in cases of felony, admittedly requires the person aggrieved to institute criminal proceedings before pursuing any civil remedy against the felon, precluded such civil remedy altogether, or (iii) upon doctrines of Roman law which ought not to be applied at all. It is to be observed that LORD

A ELLENBOROUGH gave no reasons for his ruling; he treated the proposition he laid down as a well-known proposition of law, and the reasoning on which the proposition was based must, therefore, be found, if at all, in the earlier authorities.

The only earlier authority to which your Lordships' attention was called was Huggins v. Butcher (5). This was an action in trespass by a husband for wrongful injury causing his wife's death. The action was dismissed. If it were looked on as an action in right of the deceased wife, the maxim actio personalis, &c., was clearly applicable. If, on the other hand, it were looked on as an action by the husband in his own right, then the trespass was "drowned in the felony." Obviously the limits within which the maxim mentioned is applicable were already well known when Huggins v. Butcher (5) was decided, and LORD ELLENBOROUGH, with that case in his mind, can hardly have fallen into the error suggested. Nor can I find any reason to suppose that any weight has ever been given in the courts of this country to the Roman law on the subject. It remains, therefore, to consider whether the reason given in Huggins v. Butcher (5) that the trespass was drowned in the felony can be rejected as erroneous. It was contended that the reason must be rejected as a misconception of the rule of public policy above referred to. Whatever may have been thought in the early part of the seventeenth century, or even in LORD ELLENBOROUGH'S day, it is now quite clear that the rule only suspends and does not require the destruction of the civil remedy. There can, therefore, it is argued, be no drowning of the trespass in the felony, and if the reason given for the decision in Huggins v. Butcher (5) be bad, there is, it is contended, no reason why that case should stand, or why LORD ELLENBOROUGH'S ruling, which was dependent on it, should not now be overruled by this House.

E Before proceeding to deal with this point, I should like to call the attention of the House to certain historical considerations which appear to me to be of considerable materiality. I do this with some diffidence, as I cannot lay claim to any special knowledge. I have, however, read a good deal of history in connection with this case, for it is almost a commonplace that apparent anomalies in our law can generally be explained if we consider the conditions of its historical growth.

F If we carry our minds back to a period prior to the development under the influence of the Statute of Westminster II (13 Edw. 1, c. 24) of the action on the case, we find that the law of contract based on the doctrine of consideration had not yet taken shape. The basis of society was still status rather than contract, and the King's courts had not yet invented any procedure for the enforcement of simple contract obligations. Nevertheless, among the writs which had become de cursu,

G there were several writs which a master could obtain from the Chancery in respect of wrongs done to his servant. FITZHERBERT, in his DE NATURA BREVIVM, mentions (i) a writ of trespass for taking away an apprentice or servant, and (ii) a writ of trespass for injury done to a servant per quod servitium amisit. These writs are in all respects analogous to the writs of trespass for taking away a wife or child,

H or for injury done to a wife or child per quod consortium or servitium amisit; and also to the writs of trespass for debauching a wife, daughter, or female servant. The inference is that all these writs arose out of status at a time when the servant or apprentice, as well as the wife and child, was a member of the family, and the relation between him and the head of the family had not yet come to be looked upon as resting upon contract. This would appear to me to account for the fact that, except in the case of master and servant, the loss of A. arising out of an

I injury, whereby B. is unable to perform his contract, is not actionable. It is only in a society based on contractual obligation that the existence of such an action in the case of master and servant and in no other case can appear illogical. Further, during the period in question the writ of trespass was the only remedy for wrongs such as those we are considering. According to PROFESSOR MAITLAND, trespass was a remedy for acts of violence not amounting to a felony. Certainly no writ of trespass can be found in which the acts of which the plaintiff complains necessarily amount to a felony. In some cases they may or they may not. Take for example the writ for breaking into the plaintiff's house and taking away his money. The acts complained of do not constitute burglary or larceny. They may be a burglary or larceny, according to whether certain additional facts be or be not proved, but the defendant cannot plead these additional facts: Lutterell v. Regnell (6). He cannot set up his own felony by way of defence. The facts alleged in the writ are wrongful and actionable, whether these additional facts be proved or otherwise. It is not the felony which is made the subject of complaint. It should be remembered that for felony there was the appeal, and that, to use PROFESSOR MAITLAND's expression, the writ of trespass may be called "an attenuated appeal" dealing with acts of violence for which the appeal did not lie. It arose out of the appeal, and was a criminal as well as a civil proceeding, leading not only to the plaintiff recovering damage, but to the defendant being fined or imprisoned. During the period we are considering it is probable that all homicide by act of violence amounted to felony. Certainly intentional homicide or homicide through negligence was felonious. It follows that the death of a human being occasioned by an act of violence on the part of the defendant could not be the ground of complaint in an action of trespass. It could not be alleged without alleging felony, and for felony trespass would not lie. If the writ alleged only an injury per quod servitium or consortium amisit, the writ would be unobjectionable, but if death ensued, damage could be obtained up to the date of the death only. If the injured person had been killed on the spot the action would fail altogether. The plaintiff's remedy, if he had any, would be the appeal.

If for the reasons above suggested trespass did not lie on the part of a master for an injury causing the death of his servant, it is easy to see how this fact would influence the subsequent development of the action on the case. The writ-making powers of the Chancery, which for a time had fallen into dis-use largely because they were thought to infringe on the legislative function of Parliament, received in 1285 A.D. a new impulse by the passing of the Statute of Westminster II., and began to be again used as they had been originally used, to meet the needs of a growing civilisation by providing legal remedies for grievances which, however much they might be recognised as such by the general sense of the community, were not yet actionable in the King's courts. Consider for a moment the following examples: First, A.'s servant, in the course of serving A., negligently throws a beam of wood onto a highway, and in so doing injures B.'s servant. Under these circumstances B.'s servant had a writ of trespass against the wrongdoer, and B. also had a writ of trespass (per quod servitium amisit), but neither of them had any remedy against A., for trespass was in fact a criminal proceeding, and according to the common law no one could be called upon to answer in a criminal proceeding for another's crime. Nevertheless, the general sense of the community demanded such a remedy, and this was supplied by giving B. and B.'s servant an action on the case against A. By this means the modern law as to a master's liability for the acts of his servant was enabled to develop. The remedy of B.'s servant against A.'s servant was always confined to an action in trespass: see Holmes v. Mather (7), per LORD BRAMWELL, L.R. 10 Exch. at p. 268. Secondly, suppose, A.'s servant, in the course of serving A., placed a beam of wood on the highway and negligently left it there, so that B.'s servant fell over it and was injured. Under these circumstances neither B.'s servant nor B. himself had any remedy in trespass, for A.'s servant had committed no act of violence for which alone a writ of trespass could be obtained from the Chancery. Nevertheless, the general sense of the community demanded a remedy and such a remedy was again supplied by giving both B. and B.'s servant an action on the case against both A.'s servant and A. If in the first of the two examples I have given B.'s servant had been killed and not injured only, A.'s servant would have committed a felony and no action against him would lie in trespass. In developing the principle of respondent superior, it may well have been thought that A.'s liability for the act of his servant ought not in any case to be greater than the liability of the servant

A himself. Again, if in the second of the two examples B.'s servant, in falling over the beam, had broken his neck, it may well have been thought that neither A.'s servant nor A. himself ought to incur, by reason of mere nonfeasance, a liability greater than would have been incurred by actual violence. These considerations may well account for the doctrine that the death of a human being could not be complained of as an injury in an action on the case any more than it could in an action of trespass.

B I will now return to Huggins v. Butcher (5), and I desire to suggest that it was not really based on any rule or supposed rule of public policy, but merely on the nature of an action in trespass. The declaration was by a husband for an injury to his wife. Prima facie, therefore, what was complained of was a trespass, but the declaration proceeded to state that the wife died of the injury. What was
C prima facie a trespass thus became a felony, for which no action in trespass lay. The trespass was "drowned in felony. It was for the King only to punish, except the party brought an appeal": (Noy, 18). If the case had turned on a rule of public policy, such rule would have been applicable to a writ in trespass for breaking into the plaintiff's house and taking away his money, where what had been done in fact amounted to burglary or larceny. I cannot discover that it was ever
D so applied. On the contrary, Markham v. Cobb (8), decided in 1625, and Dawkes v. Coveleigh (9), decided in 1652, are authorities that in such a case the trespass is not drowned in the felony, so as to preclude an action for the trespass provided the requirements of public policy are first satisfied. These cases were quoted with approval by SIR MATTHEW HALE (1 Hale, PLEAS OF THE CROWN, p. 546), and it cannot be disputed that they are good law. LORD ELLENBOROUGH himself acted on them in Crosby v. Leng (10) without any apparent hesitation, though Baker v. Bolton (1) had been decided by him only a few years previously, namely, in 1808. It is true that neither Huggins v. Butcher (5) nor Baker v. Bolton (1) were cited in argument. Of course, this may have been due to carelessness in examining the authorities, but it is quite possible that counsel did not consider that they had any bearing on a question of public policy.

F Gimson v. Woodfull (11) strikes the first discordant note. This was in 1825, and in 1827 the matter was discussed in Stone v. Marsh (12), LORD TENTERDEN using language which might be construed to favour the view taken in Gimson v. Woodfull (11). The point was left open in White v. Spettigue (13), though that case overruled Gimson v. Woodfull (11) on other grounds. In Wellock v. Constantine (14), decided in 1863, the plaintiff sought to recover damages for
G rape. Of course, if she had consented to the act alleged, there could be no civil remedy. If, on the other hand, she had not consented, she was in fact complaining of a felony, for which an action in trespass, at any rate, would not lie. WILLES, J., being of opinion that no civil action would lie for a felony, intimated that he would direct a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff thereupon consented to a non-suit. The case, therefore, appears to resemble Huggins v. Butcher (5), H and has no necessary reference to public policy, though POLLOCK, C.B., in discharging a rule for a new trial, seems to suggest that public policy was the real ground of decision. This also appears to have been the view of BLACKBURN, J., in Wells v. Abrahams (15), for he disapproves Wellock v. Constantine (14) on the ground that public policy demands only the suspension and not the destruction of the civil remedy, thus approving the earlier authorities to which I have referred. He obviously disagreed with the ruling of WILLES, J., that no civil action would
I lie for a felony, for though he expressly approves Huggins v. Butcher (5), he says it is a mistake to suppose it was decided on that ground. Unfortunately, he does not suggest on what grounds he thought the decision could be supported. That the rule of public policy only suspends or does not destroy the civil remedy is also shown by the subsequent cases of Re Shepherd, Ex parte Ball (16) and Midland Insurance Co. v. Smith (17). It should be noticed that BAGGALLAY, L.J., in laying down in Re Shepherd, Ex parte Ball (16) the propositions resulting from the authorities, says that a felonious act may (not that it must) give rise to a civil action. Before any question of public policy can arise it has first to be ascertained whether civil proceedings will lie at all. Most felonies involve a wrong less than a felony, and for such a wrong civil proceedings will lie when once the demands of public policy have been satisfied. But there may be felonies where the only wrong is the felony itself, and it may well be that the felony cannot be made the subject of complaint in civil proceedings.

It was in this state of the law as to public policy that Baker v. Bolton (1) came up for consideration before the Court of Appeal in Clark v. London General Omnibus Co., Ltd. (3), and, if that case be referred to, it is quite apparent that neither the counsel who argued it nor the judges who were party to the decision considered that public policy had anything to do with the matter. Not one of the cases on the latter subject to which I have referred was so much as mentioned. Under those circumstances it seems impossible to suppose that the decision in either Huggins v. Butcher (5) or Baker v. Bolton (1) depended on a misconception of the rule of public policy. I think it more probable that this misconception which at one time no doubt prevailed, but which has been now dispelled, was itself due to a mistake as to the meaning of what was said in Huggins v. Butcher (5), that case itself merely deciding that felony could not be made a ground of complaint in trespass, a decision which in Baker v. Bolton (1) was extended to cover all civil proceedings.

Perhaps I ought to add one word on Smith v. Selwyn (18). That case resembled Wellock v. Constantine (14). The statement of claim alleged and complained of a felony. There was an application to stay further proceedings or dismiss the action on the ground that it was based on a felony for which there had been no prosecution. Liberty was given to amend the claim by alleging only a wrong less than felony; otherwise the action was ordered to be stayed pending criminal proceedings. The question whether felony could itself be made a ground of complaint in a civil action, quite apart from any rule of public policy, does not appear to have been considered, and supposing the statement of claim had been amended in the way suggested, it would still seem that, under the authorities I have cited, public policy would, if there had been an actual felony, demand a stay until the plaintiff had done her duty by prosecuting the felon. Under these circumstances I do not think the appellants can be said to have advanced any sound reasons why your Lordships' House should disturb a rule of law which has been so long recognised in our courts and which, however anomalous it may appear to the scientific jurist, is almost certainly explicable on historical grounds. I agree that the appeal fails.

LORD SUMNER. This appeal has been brought principally to test the rule in Baker v. Bolton (1), that "in a civil court the death of a human being cannot be complained of as an injury," a rule which has long been treated as universally applicable at common law. Some attempt was made to contest it only in its application to the case of master and servant. I will discuss both the narrower and the wider proposition, but it is clear that the action was not brought for the loss to a master of the services of his employee, but for the respondents' bad navigation, which sank the Crown's submarine, and the item of damage now in dispute, namely, pensions and allowances to dependants of seamen who were drowned, was claimed merely as one of the natural consequences of the tort, which consisted in sinking the ship. No claim has been made and no evidence has been given relating to damage sustained by the appellants in losing the further services of those who were drowned, and so different both in its nature and its incidents is the service of the seamen of His Majesty's Navy from the service of those who are in private employment that it may be questioned whether in any case an action per quod servitium amisit could have been brought at all.

A Never during the many centuries that have passed since reports of the decisions of English courts first began has the recovery of damages for the death of a human being as a civil injury been recorded. Since LORD ELLENBOROUGH's time the contrary has been uniformly decided by the Court of Exchequer and by the Court of Appeal. In addition to the weight of LORD ELLENBOROUGH's name (no mean authority even when sitting at nisi prius in spite of LORD CAMPBELL's sneer), the rule has

B been definitely asserted by LORD SELBORNE (Clarke v. Carfin Coal Co. (19), [1891] A.C. at p. 414), LORD BOWEN (The Vera Cruz (No. 2) (20), 9 P.D. at p. 101), and LORD ALVERSTONE and LORD GORELL (Clark v. London General Omnibus Co., Ltd. (31)). It has been accepted as the rule of the common law by the Supreme Court of the Dominion of Canada (Re The Garland, Monaghan v. Horn (21)), and the Supreme Court of the United States of America (The Corsair (22)). That the

C rule has also received statutory recognition appears to me to be abundantly plain. I agree that the preamble to s. 1 of the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, should be read as applying to the particular defect in the existing law, which it was passed to remedy, namely, the disadvantageous position of widows and children, and not to the limited rights of masters and employers, though only BRAMWELL, B.'s, intrepid individualism could dismiss it as a "loose recital in an incorrectly drawn

D section of a statute, on which the courts had to put a meaning from what it did not rather than what it did say" (Osborn (Osborne) v. Gillett (2), L.R. 8 Exch. at p. 95). Still I think that the view taken by the legislature in 1846 is clear. Section 6 of Lord Campbell's Act provides that "nothing therein contained shall apply to that part of the United Kingdom called Scotland." Why? Because Scottish law differed from English law in the very point in question, and in this respect is

E for once illogical. The rule, says LORD WATSON, in Clarke v. Carfin Coal Co. (19) ([1891] A.C. at p. 419), and again in Wood v. Gray & Sons (23) ([1892] A.C. at p. 581), which allows "actions of solatium and damages at the instance of husband, wife, or legitimate child in respect of the death of a spouse, child, or parent . . . does not rest upon any definite principle, but constitutes an arbitrary exception from the general law, which excludes all such actions, founded in inveterate custom and having no other ratio to support it."

In Glaholm v. Barker (24) TURNER, L.J., with the concurrence of KNIGHT-BRUCE, L.J., said (1 Ch. App. at p. 227):

"Lord Campbell's Act first introduced into this country a remedy in case of injuries attended with loss of life, the law up to the time of the passing of this Act having stood thus—that in case of death resulting from injury the remedy for the injury died with the person."

G

It provided a new cause of action and did not merely regulate or enlarge an old one. It excluded Scotland from its operation because a sufficient remedy already existed there, when in England none existed at all. So much seems to me to be indubitable. It did not deal with the case of master and servant as such, presumably because the legislature found nothing in the common law rule in this regard which called for reconsideration. I think the observation of PIGOTT, B., in Osborn (Osborne) v. Gillett (2) (L.R. 8 Exch. at p. 93) was perfectly just.

"We are not at liberty to disregard the law thus established so long ago and expressly recognised by the legislature, nor in effect to add by the decision of this court another clause to Lord Campbell's Act."

I

It is worthy of observation that the passing of Lord Campbell's Act was followed shortly afterwards by similar legislation in the States of New York in 1847 and 1849 and of Maryland in 1852, and statutes similar in effect have since been passed in most of the older States of the Union, where the common law prevails. Massachusetts had already dealt with the matter, though only tentatively, by direct enactment (c. 81 of 1786), which made the township as the highway authority liable in certain cases, when death was caused on highways, and by an Act of 1840, which provided that a railway company, whose negligence had caused a fatal accident, should be liable on indictment to payment of a fine to the use of the personal representative of the deceased for the benefit of his family. Plainly it was, and long had been, the general opinion among students of the common law that the rule was as stated by LORD ELLENBOROUGH. The Supreme Court of the United States in 1877 in Mobile Life Insurance v. Brame (25) (95 U.S. at p. 756) said

"The authorities are so numerous and so uniform that by the common law no civil action lies for an injury which results in death, that it is impossible to speak of it as a proposition open to question."

Since the early part of the last century the subject has been learnedly discussed on many occasions in the United States, both in connection with claims for the death of a servant and claims for the death of a relative. The re-argument in Hubgh v. New Orleans and Carrollton Railroad Co. (26) is particularly valuable for its contrast of the common law with the old French law and with the effect of art. 1382 and art. 2294 of the Code Napoléon, as repeatedly interpreted in the Cour de Cassation. So much for this rule as a proposition of general application.

I think that, as the appellants have argued this case as if the action had been brought by a master for the loss of a servant's service, it is better to deal also with this aspect of it. The point was concluded against the appellants in the courts below by Osborn (Osborne) v. Gillett (2) and Clark v. London General Omnibus Co., Ltd. (3). The question is whether there is any ground of principle on which your Lordships ought to overrule decisions of such authority and long standing. The case is put thus: "It is admitted that a master has an interest in his servant's life, such as to support an action if the servant is maimed; how can it be right that the tortfeasor should escape if instead of maiming the servant he kills him? Is the general rule of liability for tortious injury to the servant's health subject to an exception in relief of the tortfeasor if death ensue?" Some most learned writers have expressed dissatisfaction with the rule. It has been even suggested that LORD ELLENBOROUGH was "the victim of a confusion of ideas" and that the rule arose from a misunderstanding of the principle that a right of action for a tort, where the act done was felonious, is suspended till the tortfeasor has been prosecuted. The hope—perhaps a faint one—was long ago expressed that some day your Lordships might overrule Baker v. Bolton (1).

I think it is clear that the relation of master and servant presents in this matter some peculiar features. What is the right in the master which the tortfeasor infringes, or the duty towards him which he disregards? Ordinarily an action of tort is given to defend rights of property or rights of personal safety, personal freedom, and personal reputation. The latter must be confined to the person of the master, and in the person of the servant he has no property. Here is the beginning of anomaly. I do not know, and doubt if it can now be ascertained, when or pursuant to what theory this special right of the master in relation to his servant was first established. The inquiry belongs to history rather than to positive law. TINDALL, C.J., in Grinnell v. Wells (27) observes of the most highly artificial aspect of this cause of action (7 Man. & G. at p. 1041):

"The foundation of the action by a father to recover damages against the wrongdoer for the seduction of his daughter has been uniformly placed from the earliest times hitherto not upon the seduction itself, which is the wrongful act of the defendant, but upon the loss of service of the daughter, in which service he is supposed to have a legal right or interest. . . . It is the invasion of the legal right of the master to the services of his servant that gives him the right of action for beating his servant, and it is the invasion of the same legal right, and no other, which gives the father the right of action against the seducer of his daughter."

A So nearly did the wrong, which is the subject of this cause of action, approximate to wrongs to his property that a count for debauching the plaintiff's daughter could be joined with a count for breaking and entering his house (Woodward v. Walton (28)), and a man could join with a count for an assault on himself another for an assault on his wife "per quod consortium uxoris for three days amisit": Guy v. Livesey (29). Thus it is that the tortfeasor is liable to another's servant if he beats him, for the act is actionable per se; but he is only liable to the master of the servant if the beating interferes with the service, for at the master's suit it is only actionable per quod: Marys's Case (30) (9 Co. Rep. at p. 113a). They are two separate causes of action in two different persons in respect of the same act. Again, where there is no capacity for service, as in the case of an infant of tender years, the father's action per quod servitium amisit will not lie: Hall v. Hollander (31). If the contract of service had already determined before the wrongful act had any disabling effect upon the capacity to serve, as might be the case when a wrongful act is done to a servant under notice, I take it likewise that the action would not lie. It is the loss of service, which is the gist of the action, and loss of service depends upon a right to the service, and that depends on the contract between the master and the servant. The contract of service D being purely personal determines with the servant's death. As he dies, eo instanti the master's right is extinguished. A cause of action, which essentially depends on the present existence of a right to services, cannot be asserted in respect of a state of things which is inconsistent with the existence of such a right. It cannot be changed from an action for injury to the right (for in tort the wrongful act of the defendant and an invasion of the right of the plaintiff must concur) into E an action for damage arising upon an event, otherwise an action would lie for causing the death of one's cestui que vie. A similar explanation is applicable to the case of a husband's action for injury to his wife per quod consortium amisit. The right is not in the life but in the service or consortium during life. In Lucas v. New York Central Railroad Co. (32) the Supreme Court of the United States said:

F "Death following instantly upon the act complained of, there was no time during her life when it could be said that the husband had lost the services of his wife in consequence of the injury complained of."

G Such an explanation was offered by the court in Re The Garland, Monaghan v. Horn (21), and it had the approval of SIR GORELL BARNES, P., in Clark's Case (3). For my own part I think it is sound in this sense, that, whether or not it be the theory on which those who introduced these causes of action would have justified them, as indeed we may be sure it is not, it, at any rate, provides, though somewhat imperfectly, an intelligible basis for the existing rule, sufficient to prevent your Lordships from interfering with long-standing decisions on the plea that they are insensible or arbitrary.

H The Solicitor-General urged that such a principle is highly technical and that, if a minor hurt to a servant gives a cause of action to a master, a fortiori must the major hurt, which results fatally, and he reminded your Lordships that this House in Mills v. Armstrong, The Bernina (33) overruled Thorogood v. Bryan (34), a case of long standing, and exhorted your Lordships to take heart and do likewise. I This is hardly the right view to take of your Lordships' judicial functions nowadays, nor does it follow, in the case of a legal system such as ours, that a principle can be said to be truly a part of the law merely because it would be a more perfect expression of imperfect rules, which, however imperfect, are well established and well defined. Again, an established rule does not become questionable merely because different conjectural justifications of it have been offered, or because none is forthcoming that is not fanciful. The explanations given of the rule in question are singularly varied. HALE (PLEAS OF THE CROWN, i. 476) says that a man shall forfeit his goods, though the verdict be quod interfecit per infortunium et non per feloniam. "because the King has lost his subject and that men should be more careful." Certainly the idea of liability for breach of a duty to use care towards one's fellow-subjects was of slow growth. Again, PARKE, B., says in Armsworth v. South Eastern Rail. Co. (35) (11 Jur. at p. 759) that the rule had two reasons, "first, because the law provides remedies for such mischiefs only as affect legal rights, and a man has not such a legal right in the life of his parent as he has in his own," while, secondly, "it was considered impossible to form an estimate of the value of human life either to a man himself or to others connected with him."

Whether, as some have thought, the Roman law affected the matter in the distinction which it drew in various connections between the value of a slave's life and that of a free man it is probably impossible now to tell. The true explanation and the basis may be, and in our law often are, purely historical. As is well known it was long part of English law when civil injuries and criminal offences had not been clearly distinguished, that among emendable offences there was included homicide, for which payment of wite to the King, or in some cases to the lord, and of bot to the kinsfolk constituted satisfaction. The elaboration of this tariff and the heavy burden of the payments for which it provided in the case of various injuries seem to have been the cause of the disappearance of this system. It passed away very rapidly, partly through the rise of criminal jurisdiction over offences against the King's peace and partly through the attraction of the new action of trespass. The change had taken place before records of decision begin. Thereafter, while damages were recoverable by the injured man in his lifetime for trespass to his person, homicide became punishable upon indictment, and in BRACON'S day was regarded as felonious. Those homicides, which were due to negligence, could be and were dealt with by the exercise of the King's mercy. On the one hand, homicide, which deserved punishment, ceased to be emendable; on the other, personal torts, actionable in trespass, were compensated in damages; the intermediate case of an act, tortious but not heinous, causing death was dealt with by the Royal mitigation of the punishment naturally attaching to homicide. There was, I imagine, in early times no actual decision in which it was held that in a civil court the death of a human being could not be complained of, still less was any legal theory advanced in justification of such a rule. Following the development of law through the modification and development of procedure, the system of making satisfaction for homicide by payment of wer and wite died out after the twelfth century; it was dealt with as a punishable felony, with or without mitigation of punishment, in proceedings on the King's behalf. Relatives, who in the time of Henry I would have been paid by the manslayer in accordance with the rank of his victim, in the time of Edward I had lost that right and yet could not bring trespass, and this by a process of procedural change and not, so far at least as is known, on any analysis of the nature of the cause of action. Doubtless lawyers as familiar with fatal accidents due to mere negligence as we are would have analysed the injury and have distinguished fully between killing with intent to kill, killing by an intended act without intent to kill but in breach of a duty towards the victim, and killing without either intent or breach of duty by mere misadventure, but in days when negligence causing death was probably rare as compared with our day, and the guilty party more often than not had nothing with which to pay damages, men acquiesced without discussion in a procedure by which the Royal justice dealt with homicide of all kinds, and actions of trespass did not deal with homicide at all. No doubt it is the tradition of this change that was preserved in the language of TANFIELD, J., in Huggins v. Butcher (5) (Yelv. 89): "the servant dying of the extremity of the battery it is now become an offence to the Crown, being converted into felony," to which the report in Noy, p. 18, adds "for the King only is to pursue felony except the party brings an appeal." Though no longer in accordance with the formal law as stated by COCKBURN, C.J., in Wells v. Abrahams (15), and by BAGGALLAY, L.J., in Re Shepherd, Ex parte Ball (16) (10 Ch.D. at p. 674), this was historically not far from the truth.

Pari passu with the respective proceedings in trespass and on the case and on indictment there remained the right of appeal. For many years an appeal was more common than an indictment in cases of homicide, and the judges were careful to preserve the relatives' private right to the appeal and to secure that they should not be prejudiced by the course taken by or in the name of the Crown. The liability of the manslayer to punishment might be discharged by the King's pardon, or by the appellant's release, but in case of the former the appellant's right was saved, so that the King's pardon could not be pleaded to defeat the appeal. Out of this there arose the practice of using the appeal as an engine of compulsion, by which the slayer was driven to make compensation in order to obtain the appellant's release. In the appeal there were risks on both sides, for if the appeal failed the appellee had his action on the case for a false and malicious appeal. Down to the end of the fifteenth century appeals were nevertheless common, but the statute 3 Hen. 7, c. 1, after reciting that "in appeals the party is oftentimes slow and also agreed with . . . also he that will sue any appeal must sue in proper person, which suit is long and costly, that it maketh the party appellant weary to sue," enacts that indictments should no longer be held back "so that the suit of the party may be saved," but are to be proceeded with at once. Eventually appeals fell much into disuse; but they are mentioned from time to time and a reported instance occurs, which is instructive, in Cro. Eliz. pp. 632 and 682, Shuckborough (Shuckborough) v. Biggins (Biggen) (36). Here in a widow's appeal for murder, in which the act was held to have only been manslaughter, the Queen's pardon was relied on. It was decided, with some difference of opinion, that the pardon did not get rid of the appellee's liability to be burnt in the hand, it being the suit of the party and not an information in the Star Chamber, which is the suit of the Queen. On this the appellee promptly paid the appellant forty marks, and the suit was discontinued.

There is little subsequent record of similar cases. In 1770 in Bigby v. Kennedy (37) it is stated that there had been no such case for nearly half a century, and, as eventually the appellant did not appear and a non-suit was entered, no doubt the appellee had satisfied her demands. In Ashford v. Thornton (38) in 1818, the case which led to the abolition of appeals by 59 Geo. 3, c. 46, s. 1, BAYLEY, J., observes (1 B. & Ald. at p. 457):

"This mode of proceeding by appeal is unusual in our law, being brought not for the benefit of the public, but for that of the party, and being a private suit wholly under his control. It ought, therefore, to be watched very narrowly by the court, for it may take place after trial and acquittal on an indictment at the suit of the King, and the execution under it is entirely at the option of the party suing, whose sole object may be to obtain pecuniary satisfaction."

In this sense down to 1819 the death of a human being could be complained of in a civil court, for the appeal, though "a vindictive action," was on the civil side of the court, but it could not be complained of "as an injury," and the rule as stated by LORD ELLENBOROUGH stands untouched.

I think the history of the disappearance of wergild and the persistence of the appeal for homicide, which is to be found in full in the words of HAWKINS, FITZJAMES STEPHEN, and POLLOCK and MAITLAND, proves, if proof were needed, that LORD ELLENBOROUGH's canon correctly states the law and is one which is not now susceptible of expansion by judicial interpretation. There never was an action in the sense now contended for to recover damages for the death of a human being, and the remedy by appeal, which so long persisted in the case of the widow, the most crying case of all, was one which the most hardened formalist would not have tolerated, had any such action at law been possible, for it was long a form of legalised blackmail. The historical explanation of the absence of such an action at the suit of relatives applies equally to the case of a master's claim for the death of a member of his familia, for example, a servant. It is equally incapable of judicial creation. Indeed, what is anomalous about the action per quod servitium amisit is not that it does not extend to the loss of service, in the event of the servant being killed, but that it should exist at all. It appears to be a survival from the time when service was a status. The canon in question has often been classified under the maxim actio personalis moritur cum persona, and ill-advised arguments have sometimes suggested that, even as applied to the case of master and servant, it has something to do with the abatement of actions. The maxim itself has many critics; it has been coldly disparaged as post-classical, meaning thereby that it is bad Latin: Finlay v. Chirney (39) (20 Q.B.D. at p. 502); it has been suggested to be a mistake for actio poenalis (POSTE'S GAIUS, 493), whence it is sometimes insinuated that it is bad law; and it has been peevishly described as "a wretched saw" and as "a purely identical proposition" (AUSTIN'S JURISPRUDENCE (3rd Edn.), vol. 2, p. 1013). Of course, reliance on the maxim in this connection leads to the effective retort that the person who has the action is the master and he is alive and sues just because someone else, his servant, to wit, is dead. If, however, this maxim is put aside, since in the present case it is irrelevant, I think that the argument that your Lordships should discover under this ancient form of action some principle hitherto undetected is really an appeal to this House in its legislative and not in its judicial capacity.

Apart from the question of civil liability for the death of a human being, there is another aspect of this case. Injury is the gist of any action of negligence—if the negligence does no damage no action lies. In the present case the sums claimed were paid to widows and other dependants of the drowned men under Admiralty Regulations (paras. 1974 A 1 and 2011 A), which expressly declare that these are compassionate payments, and granted of grace and not of right both in kind and in degree. True that in such cases they are always made, and most properly made, but none the less the money claimed was lost to the Exchequer directly because the Crown through its officers was pleased to pay it. The collision was the causa sine qua non; the consequent drowning of the men was the occasion of the bounty; but the causa causans of the payment was the voluntary act of the Crown. Had the present action been brought upon a contract it might well be the case that these payments would have been within the contemplation of the contracting parties, but they are not the natural consequences of the tort which is sued for. Nor would it have assisted the appellants' case if they could have established that the making of these compassionate allowances by the Crown was in the nature of a contractual obligation. In any case the contract would have been a contract with the deceased man, and the damages must be measured by the value of his services which were lost, not by the incidents of his remuneration under the terms of his contract of employment. Just as the damages recoverable by an injured man cannot be reduced by the fact that he has effected and recovered upon an accident policy: Brathburn v. Great Western Rail. Co. (40); and those recovered under Lord Campbell's Act are not affected by the fact that his life was insured, so conversely a master cannot count as part of his damage by the loss of his employee's service sums which he has to pay because his contract of employment binds him to pay wages to the servant while alive and a pension to his widow when he is dead. The appeal is enterprising and has been of considerable interest, but, I think, it fails.

Appeal dismissed.

DAIMLER CO., LTD. v. CONTINENTAL TYRE AND RUBBER CO. (GREAT BRITAIN), LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Earl of Halsbury, Viscount Mersey, Lord Kinnear, Lord Atkinson, Lord Shaw, Lord Parker of Waddington, Lord Sumner and Lord Parmoor), February 21, 22, 24, 25, June 30, 1916]

[Reported [1916] 2 A.C. 307; 85 L.J.K.B. 1333; 114 L.T. 1049; 32 T.L.R. 624; 60 Sol. Jo. 602; 22 Com. Cas. 32]

Company—Enemy alien—Enemy directors and shareholders—Rights suspended during war—Conservation of property of company.

A company incorporated in the United Kingdom may assume an enemy character if its agents or the persons in de facto control of its affairs, whether authorised or not, are resident in an enemy country, or, wherever resident, are adhering to the enemy or taking instructions from or acting under the control of the enemy, but the character of individual shareholders cannot of itself affect the character of the company, and a company does not assume an enemy character because its shareholders are wholly or largely alien enemies. The enemy character of individual shareholders and their conduct may, however, be very material on the question whether the company's agents, or the persons in de facto control of its affairs are in fact adhering to, taking instructions from, or acting under the control of, enemies. This materiality will vary with the number of shareholders who are enemies and the value of their holdings. A person knowingly dealing with a company which has acquired enemy character commits the offence of trading with the enemy, and any transaction between the company and its enemy directors and shareholders would also be illegal. Enemy directors and enemy shareholders cannot have anything to do with the management of the company, and no payment of dividends or other sums may be made to them. Their rights are suspended during the period of the war. On the other hand, the property of the company may be conserved, and acts otherwise lawful are not rendered unlawful by the fact that they might tend to the enrichment of the enemy when the war is over.

Per LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON: A company registered in the United Kingdom, but carrying on business in a neutral country through agents properly authorised and resident here or in the neutral country, is prima facie to be regarded as a friend, but may, through its agents or persons in de facto control of its affairs, assume an enemy character. A company registered in the United Kingdom, but carrying on business in an enemy country is to be regarded as an enemy.

Company—Legal proceedings—Initiation by secretary—Need for authority of directors.

Observations regarding the incapacity of the secretary of a company to initiate on behalf of the company legal proceedings without the authority of the directors which should be expressed by resolution.

Appeal by the defendants in the action, the Daimler Co., Ltd., from an order of the Court of Appeal which affirmed an order of SCRUTTON, J., in chambers giving the plaintiffs, the Continental Tyre & Rubber Co. (Great Britain), Ltd., leave to sign summary judgment against the defendants for the amount of the claim.

The plaintiff company was incorporated in 1905 under the Companies Acts to trade in England in motor-car tyres made in Germany by a company incorporated in that country under German law. The plaintiff company had its registered office in London. The capital of the company was £25,000 in £1 shares, all but one of which were held either by the German company or by Germans resident abroad. The remaining share was held by one Wolter, who was born in Germany, but was resident in England, and had become a naturalised British subject, and was at all material times the secretary to the company. At the time of the outbreak of the war between Great Britain and the German Empire on Aug. 4, 1914, there were four directors, of whom three resided in Germany. The fourth, one Bradtmann, lived in England before the war, but left this country early in August, 1914. The plaintiff company brought an action against the defendant company as acceptors of three bills of exchange in payment of goods supplied by the plaintiffs to the defendants before the outbreak of war. The defendants contended that (i) it was illegal to trade with or pay money to or for the benefit of alien enemies during the war, and that in substance and in fact the respondent company was an alien enemy, and (ii) the solicitors for the respondent company had no authority to issue the writ in the action. The respondent company issued the writ in the action on Oct. 23, 1914. They obtained leave from the master to sign judgment for the amount of the claim and costs. That order was affirmed by SCRUTTON, J., and by the Court of Appeal (LORD READING, C.J., LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., and KENNEDY, PHILLIMORE and PICKFORD, L.JJ., BECKLEY, L.J., dissenting). The defendants appealed to the House of Lords.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and Maddocks for the appellants.

Upjohn, K.C., and Douglas Hogg for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

June 30, 1916. The following opinions were read.

EARL OF HALSBURY.—I am of opinion that this judgment should be reversed. In my opinion, the whole discussion is solved by a very simple proposition that in our law when the object to be obtained is unlawful the indirectness of the means by which it is to be obtained will not get rid of the unlawfulness, and in this cause the object of the means adopted is to enable thousands of pounds to be paid to the King's enemies.

Before war existed between Great Britain and Germany, an associated body of Germans availed themselves of our English law to carry on a business for manufacturing motor car tyres in Germany and selling them here in England and elsewhere, as they were entitled to do, but in doing so were bound to observe the directions which the Act of Parliament under which they were incorporated required. They were entitled to receive in the shape of dividends the profits of the concern in proportion to their shares in it. They were all Germans originally, though one afterwards became a naturalised Englishman. Now the right and proper course to deal in the matter—and I have no reason to suppose that any other course was followed—was to distribute to them rateably, according to their shares, the profits of their adventure. But this machinery, while perfectly lawful in peace time, becomes absolutely unlawful when the German traders are at war with this country. I confess it seems to me that the question becomes very plain when one applies the language of the law to the condition of things when war is declared, between the German who is in the character of shareholder and in control of the company. They can neither meet here nor can they authorise any agent to meet on any company business. They can neither trade with us nor can any British subject trade with them. Nor can they comply with the provisions for the government of the company which they were bound by their incorporated character to observe.

Under these circumstances it becomes material to consider what is this thing which is described as a "corporation." It is, in fact, a partnership in all that constitutes a partnership except the names, and in some respects the position, of those who I shall call the managing partners. No one can doubt that the names and the incorporation were but the machinery by which the purpose (giving moneys to the enemy) would be accomplished. The absence of the authority to issue the writ is only a part of the larger question. No one has authority to issue a writ on behalf of an alien enemy because he has no right himself to sue in the courts of a King with whom his own Sovereign is at war. No person or any body of persons to whom attaches the disability of suing under such circumstances can have authority, and to attempt to shield the fact of giving the enemy the money due to them by the machinery invented for a lawful purpose would be equivalent to inclosing the gold and attempting to excuse it by alleging that the bag containing it was of English manufacture. I observe the Lord Chief Justice says that the company is a live thing. If it were, it would be capable of loyalty and disloyalty. But it is not; and the argument of its being incapable of being loyal or disloyal is founded on its not being "a live thing." Neither is the bag in my illustration "a live thing." And the mere machinery to do an illegal act will not purge its illegality—fraus circuitu non purgatur. After all, this is a question of rigorous words, useful for the purpose for which they were designed, but wholly incapable

A of being strained to an illegal purpose. The limited liability was a very useful introduction into our system, and there was no reason why foreigners should not, while dealing honestly with us, partake of the benefits of that institution, but it seems to me too monstrous to suppose that for an unlawful, because, after a declaration of war, a hostile, purpose the forms of that institution should be used, and enemies of the State, while actually at war with us, be allowed to continue trading and actually to sue for their profits in trade in an English court of justice.

B There are one or two observations which I think it right to make upon this very singular performance. This is a joint appeal partly upon a judgment under Ord. 14, partly upon a cause—Continental Tyre and Rubber Co. (Great Britain), Ltd. v. Thomas Tilling, Ltd. (112 L.T. 324)—tried before LUSH, J. With respect to Ord. 14, it is almost ludicrous to treat seriously an order made under such circumstances as these, and that observation is sufficiently proved by the short history of this litigation. The second observation I have to make is that if this question turned only upon the question of the secretary's authority to issue the writ, I should certainly not be contented with the position in which that question was left. In the somewhat flippant evidence given by Mr. Wolter, it was stated that the secretary was given authority, and a minute recorded of the fact; but in the absence of the learned judge some search was made for the minute in question, and no such document could be found. I will say no more, since the witness was not again brought before the learned judge, and, therefore, had no opportunity of explanation, but I certainly would not act upon evidence such as I have described. I am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal should be allowed, and I so move your Lordships. I would like to add that I by no means desire to minimise the value of the weighty judgments to be delivered by your Lordships, but I have thought it important that all may understand the principle that the unlawfulness of trading with the enemy could not be excused by the ingenuity of the means adopted.

E VISCOUNT MERSEY.—I had prepared an opinion expressing my view that this appeal ought to be allowed, but since then I have had the opportunity of reading the opinion prepared by my noble and learned friend LORD PARKER, and in that opinion my reasons are so fully expressed that I have thought it better to withdraw the opinion I had written. I am desirous to say that LORD KINNEAR also had prepared his opinion, but that he will withdraw it in favour of the opinion of my noble and learned friend LORD PARKER.

G LORD ATKINSON.—This is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal, dated Jan. 19, 1915, affirming an order of SCRUTTON, J., dated Nov. 27, 1914, made in an action brought in the name of the respondent company (a private company) to recover from the appellant company on a specially indorsed writ, dated Oct. 23, 1914, a sum of £5,605 16s., with interest, the amount due on three bills of exchange drawn by the former company and accepted by the latter. The legal question for decision is whether the order appealed from, made upon additional evidence not before the master or SCRUTTON, J., is right. I, therefore, abstain from considering whether, in the events which have happened, this appeal is now necessary for the protection of the appellant company.

I On Oct. 30, 1914, the respondents issued a summons pursuant to R.S.C., Ord. 14, for leave to sign final judgment in the action. Affidavits were filed on behalf of both the parties litigant respectively in support of an in opposition to the respondents' application. MASTER MACDONELL, upon the affidavits and the documents made exhibits by them, made an order of Nov. 24, 1914, granting the leave asked for. Presumably the memorandum or articles of association of the respondent company were brought before the master and examined by him, as they should have been, although this does not appear on the face of the proceedings. On appeal from this order by the appellant company, SCRUTTON, J., presumably on the evidence before the master, made the order already mentioned, dismissing the appeal and upholding the order of the master. An appeal was heard in the Court of Appeal, together with an appeal raising somewhat the same questions arising out of an action brought by the present respondents against a third company, Thomas Tilling, Ltd. (reported 112 L.T. 324), tried before LUSH, J., without a jury. It does not appear from the appendix what were the particular issues raised in that action, but it certainly would appear that not only was the evidence given in it by one of the plaintiffs' witnesses, the secretary, referred to and relied upon by the lords justices in the appeal in the present case, but the findings of the learned judge at the trial were apparently also relied upon against the present appellants as if they had been parties to the suit in which those rulings were made. The evidence of the secretary was, however, much relied on by both sides in argument before your Lordships. Strange as it may appear, the minute book of the company, showing presumably from what centre the business of the company was managed and directed, was not given in evidence before any one of the three tribunals. The embarrassing and, as I think, rather unfortunate result of this omission is, that the full facts, showing in what country—England or Germany—lay the real business centre from which the governing and directing minds of the company or its directors operated, regulating and controlling its important affairs, were, save so far as revealed in the evidence of its secretary, never disclosed. These are, however, the very things which, for the purpose of income tax at all events, have been held to determine the place of residence of a company like the respondent company, so far as such a fictitious legal entity can have a residence: De Beers Consolidated Mines, Ltd. v. Howe (1). And I can see no reason why for the purpose of deciding whether the carrying on by such a company of its trade or business does or does not amount to a trading with the enemy they should not equally determine its place of residence. It is well established that trading with the most loyal British subject, if he be resident in Germany, would, during the present war, amount to trading with the enemy, and be a misdemeanour if carried on without the consent of the Crown, the reason being that thereby he might furnish resources against his own country: M'Connell v. Hector (2). The same principle would presumably apply to a trading company resident in an enemy country. It would certainly appear to me, therefore, that, having regard to the issue raised in this suit, the residence of the respondent company was of necessity a vital matter for consideration. During the argument a passage was read out from the shorthand writer's notes of the argument before the Court of Appeal, from which it appeared that the leading counsel for the Daimler Co., Ltd., admitted that the residence of the respondent company was in England. He could not well do otherwise, since the company was registered and incorporated in England, and all the facts going to show where it really resided were, with the exception already mentioned, shut out from the view of the court. It by no means follows, however, that, despite that admission of counsel, your Lordships could not, if sufficient facts were disclosed in evidence before you, hold that the residence of the company was not in England, but, in truth, in Germany.

In Crump v. Cavendish (3) THESIGER, L.J., dealing with the above-mentioned Ord. 14, said (5 Ex.D. at p. 214):

"He [the judge] has to form an opinion on the facts before him, and is to stay his hand only if he is satisfied that the defendant has a good defence upon the merits, or thinks the facts disclosed by the defendant sufficient to entitle him to be permitted to defend the action."

I turn to the affidavits and documents before the master and SUTTON, J., to consider whether the facts therein disclosed were sufficient to entitle the appellant company within this rule to be permitted to defend the action brought against them. What are those facts? They are (i) that the 25,000 shares into which the capital of the respondent company is divided are held by five individuals and a joint stock company called the parent company; that this company, incorporated

A and resident in Hanover, holds 23,398 of these shares, that the three individuals who hold between them 1,600 shares are all German subjects resident in Hanover; that the two remaining shares are held, one by the secretary, Hans Frederik Wolter, and one by the managing director, Paul Scharnhorst Brodtmann, both according to the list of shareholders having residences in England; (ii) that the directors, three in number, excluding the managing director, are also German subjects resident in Hanover; (iii) that, with the exception of the secretary, all the directors and shareholders are German subjects; that the secretary is also a German, but, unlike the others, took out naturalisation papers on Jan. 1, 1910; (iv) that the appellant company were ready and willing to pay the amount sued for on two conditions—first, that in doing so they were not acting in contravention of the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1914, and, second, that the respondent company were able to institute this action and also were entitled to give a good and valid discharge for the amount claimed; (v) that it is averred that the so-called parent company controlled the respondent company; that the former and all the officers of the latter are alien enemies, that alien enemies who were officers or agents of the company were incapable of acting either in the name of, or on behalf of, the company, or individually; that the appellant company were advised and believed that the respondent company were incapable of instituting proceedings or giving receipts for sums due to them, or doing any of those acts which must be done through agents or officers, unless and until agents and officers who were not alien enemies have been appointed; that for these reasons the proceedings were wrongly instituted, and that unconditional leave to defend should be given.

E The affidavit making these averments distinctly challenged the right of the respondent company, or any of its officers acting on its behalf, to institute the present action, or to give a valid discharge for the amount claimed by it. Their secretary filed an affidavit in reply. He contented himself with asserting that his company is an "English company, being registered at Somerset House under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, and that he himself is a British subject, F having been naturalised on Jan. 1, 1910." He adds lengthy paragraphs relative to his dealings with the Committee on Trade, with sales made to the War Office, with the payments made to his company by some others of its creditors, but not a word as to the place where its important business was conducted, or from which its action was directed by its governing minds, and not a syllable as to his ever having been authorised by the directors, or any of them, or any person connected G with the company, to institute actions of any kind on its behalf. This, if ever, was the time for him to have disclosed the fact that he was clothed with authority to bring this action, if the fact were so. In my view, his silence, on the assumption that he had the authority, is inexplicable. It was greatly pressed in argument that LUSH, J., had, in the action tried before him (Continental Tyre and Rubber Co. (Great Britain), Ltd. v. Thomas Tilling, Ltd.) (a) come to the conclusion that H the secretary was a truthful, though a forgetful and inaccurate, witness, and also that he had authority to institute the suit against Thomas Tilling, Ltd. I have the utmost confidence in any conclusion at which that learned judge would arrive on the evidence given before him. These affidavits were, as I understand, not before him, and it is, in my view, quite unjust to press against the appellant I company the conclusions arrived at by LUSH, J., without the light which this unaccountable reticence throws on the secretary's character and veracity.

[His LORDSHIP considered the articles of association of the respondent company and the evidence, and said that there was not a scrap of writing of any kind given in evidence to prove that any power to institute actions or give receipts for money recovered was ever conferred upon the secretary of the company. The only document he referred to as conferring it upon him contradicted every statement made by him on the point. It seemed incredible that he ever was clothed with the power, without consulting his directors or managing directors, to institute in the name of the company any actions of any kind he pleased. There was no proof other than his own testimony that he ever instituted any action or gave instructions for its institution. The burden of proving that the secretary had power and authority to institute the present action some months after the outbreak of the war rested on the respondent company. He (His Lordship) was clearly of opinion that they had not discharged that burden.]

Having formed this opinion, I do not desire to express any opinion on the other and main point raised in the case further than to say that, the question of residence of the company apart, I do not think that the legal entity the company can be so identified with its shareholders, or the majority of them, as to make their nationality its nationality or their status its status, so completely as to make it an alien enemy because they are alien enemies, or to give it an enemy character because they have that character. I think the judgment of LORD MACNAGHTEN in Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines, Ltd. (4) is inconsistent with any such view. Speaking of a Transvaal company, he said ([1902] A.C. at p. 497):

"If all its members had been subjects of the British Crown the corporation itself would have been none the less a foreign corporation and none the less in regard to this country an alien."

I think it is much to be regretted that the appellant company were not permitted to defend, as, in my opinion, they should have been, so that all the facts might have been elicited, and it could be determined whether the company resides and trades in Germany or not. I think the order suggested by my noble and learned friend LORD PARKER should be made.

LORD SHAW.—The Daimler company is indebted to the Continental company in certain sums of money. It was willing to pay these sums if payment could have been made with safety. The Continental company took legal proceedings to recover the moneys. To these proceedings the Daimler Company tabled two defences. The first is that payment would be of the nature of trading with the enemy, and the second is a challenge of the authority to institute the action. Upon the first point I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal is right. Upon the second point and with regret I am of opinion that it is erroneous.

The first point is of much general importance: it was carefully and anxiously argued. My views upon it in its general aspect and apart from the statutes and proclamations—which were the subject of a keen analysis and which are afterwards referred to—may be expressed in the following propositions. Before stating them, however, may I say that I have found myself to be in substantial agreement with LORD PARMOOR in the judgment about to be pronounced by him, supported, as in my humble opinion it is, by the authorities which he has cited and which I do not here repeat. The propositions I have mentioned are these. (i) There is no debate at this time of day on the general proposition that the direct and immediate consequence of a declaration of war by or against this country is to make all trading with the enemy illegal. The proposition was dealt with recently in this House in Horlock v. Beal (5). War is war, not between Sovereigns or governments alone. It puts each subject of the one belligerent into the position of being the legal enemy of each subject of the other belligerent; and all persons bound in allegiance and loyalty to His Majesty are consequently and immediately, by the force of the common law, forbidden to trade with the enemy Power or its subjects. (ii) This obligation and restraint is binding in every sense. It is, therefore, no defence to a breach of the duty to forbear from trading with the enemy that the act was done, not for personal benefit or advantage, but in the service or under the agency or orders of another who is not so bound. No one subject to the laws of this country could be permitted to escape from obedience thereto by pleading that he was acting merely as the hand of others, say a German, Austrian, or Turkish company. The prohibition against trading is binding in regard to all action direct or indirect,

A personal or representative. (iii) In so far as the obligation and restraint imposed by the common law are rested upon the allegiance or loyalty of the subject, the application of such ideas to a limited company is incongruous; allegiance and loyalty are personal, by the nature of the case. An incorporated company cannot with propriety have such terms applied to it, as if it were a mind subject to emotions or passions or a sense of duty. It is a creation of the law convenient for the purposes of management, of the holding of property, of the association of individuals in business transactions, in short for all the purposes and with the limitations and remedies set forth in the Companies Acts. (iv) Once, however, it is clear that, although this may be so under proposition (iii), yet that under proposition (ii) every individual subject to the common law is inhibited and inter-
C pelled from trading with the enemy, then trading with the enemy on behalf of a company is just as much prohibited as personal trading. A limited company, incorporated in England and although English as regards all the results which flow from such incorporation, is thus completely barred by the Trading with the Enemy Acts—not by reason of the company's allegiance or loyalty, but by reason of the fact that there is no human agency possible within the realm through which, and within the law, trading with the enemy could be accomplished. In obedience to that law all trading with the enemy, direct or indirect, stops; no firm or company
D wheresoever or howsoever directed can so trade, nor can anything be negotiated or transacted for it through any person or agency in this country. (v) Transactions and trading require two parties, and the same principle applies to trading by the enemy as to trading with the enemy. In this way a company registered in Britain may have shareholders and directors who are alien enemies. Transactions or trading with any one of them become illegal. They have no power to interfere in any particular with the policy or acts of companies registered in Britain; alien enemy shareholders cannot vote; alien enemy directors cannot direct; the rights of all these are in complete suspense during the war. (vi) As to shareholders or directors who are not alien enemies, they stand pendente bello legally bereft of all their coadjutors who are. And, if the company be a company registered in Great Britain, they must face the situation thus created by adopting the courses suitable either under the Companies Acts or the recent legislation. In this way, while no payments of assets, dividends, or profits can be made to alien enemy shareholders, yet the property and business of the company may be conserved. There may be loss consequent on commercial dislocation, but neither loss nor forfeiture is imposed by the law. The law is completely satisfied if in the conduct and range of the business trading with the enemy is avoided. To put in a word one plain instance: All
G British trading by the company is still permitted if there are British shareholders who can carry it on. With much respect I see no advantage to be gained, but much confusion to result, from proceeding to a further stage and treating or even characterising British registered companies as either alien enemies or companies with an alien enemy character. As stated, all the enemy shareholders' rights
H being placed in suspense and all trading with these shareholders or with any other enemy being interpellated, there is no principle of law which would, in my humble opinion, justify the incongruity of denominating or regarding the company itself as enemy either in character or in fact.

I Much of the discussion at your Lordships' Bar—probably the major part of it—had reference to the recent legislation. This was minutely and anxiously analysed. I think it necessary accordingly to deal with it; but I may say at once that I do not think that it invades or varies any of the principles which I have humbly ventured to sketch. The question, however, with whom this trading is forbidden is one of wide and serious importance. So much of the commerce of the country is now carried on by incorporated companies that it is manifestly critical for the citizen to know what is the scope of the term "enemy," and if it can apply to such companies, and if so to which of them. This is all the more so because the legislation upon the subject almost at its opening creates trading with the enemy a misdeemeanour. The obligation under the common law is backed by criminal sanction. Once such a statute is passed it would, of course, not be open to any citizen to plead his ignorance of the law of the land as a defence against the charge of misdeemeanour. This, however, makes it clear that courts of law should give a strict interpretation to statutory provisions of this character—an interpretation which in any case of dubiety or ambiguity shall be favourable to the liberty of the subject. Speaking for myself, I do not find that the Trading with the Enemy Acts and proclamations now to be considered were such as to leave any substantial doubt in the mind of the citizen as to what should be his attitude with regard to incorporated companies.

By the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1914 [repealed by Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939] it was provided, s. 1 (2) :

"For the purposes of this Act a person shall be deemed to have traded with the enemy if he has entered into any transaction or done any act which was at the time of such transaction or act prohibited by or under any proclamation by His Majesty dealing with trading with the enemy for the time being in force or which by common law or statute constitutes an offence of trading with the enemy: Provided that any transaction or act permitted by or under any such proclamation shall not be deemed to be trading with the enemy."

There was much discussion as to this proviso. It appears to me to be a proviso applicable to the whole of the sub-section, and, if so, applicable to all transactions or acts of trading which either by common law or by this or any other statute constitute trading with the enemy. This, in my view, is equivalent to a statutory declaration that every transaction or act permitted under proclamation shall, notwithstanding all such common law or statutory prohibitions not be deemed to be trading with the enemy. I look upon this statute as one for direction and guidance; and it does not appear to me legitimate to contend that the direction and guidance were not of this character—that if a thing was permitted by a proclamation it was not trading with the enemy or a contravention of the law. The statute was dated Sept. 18, 1914; and the question accordingly is: What did the proclamation then in force—namely, that of date Sept. 9—provide? It provided, art. 5:

"From and after the date of this proclamation the following prohibitions shall have effect (save so far as licences may be issued as hereinafter provided), and we do hereby accordingly warn all persons resident carrying on business or being in our dominion: (1) Not to pay any sum of money to or for the benefit of an enemy."

There occurs in art. 3 of the proclamation a definition of enemy. It is as follows:

"The expression 'enemy' in this proclamation means any person or body of persons of whatever nationality resident or carrying on business in the enemy country, but does not include persons of enemy nationality who are neither resident nor carrying on business in the enemy country. In the case of incorporated bodies, enemy character attaches only to those incorporated in an enemy country."

It appears to me that this was a plain guide and instruction to persons in the position of the appellants. They were told first that a transaction permitted under the proclamation should not be deemed trading with the enemy; secondly, that in the case of incorporated bodies enemy character attached to those incorporated in an enemy country; but, thirdly, that it attached only to those. I think, in short, that it was a very plain intimation that if a company was not incorporated in an enemy country, but was incorporated in our own country, then this was, though negatively expressed, the exact case in which a payment to such a company became unexceptionable and legitimate.

It is not to be forgotten that under the very same statute provisions were enacted to cover the case of companies whose share capital or directorate was either wholly

A or in certain proportion held by alien enemies. By s. 2 (2), for example, in the case of such companies, when a third or more of the issued share capital or the directorate was so held, the Board of Trade might obtain authority to inspect the books, &c., and appoint an inspector. By s. 3 further cautionary provisions were made giving to the Board of Trade power to apply to the court for the appointment of a controller. So that—to carry the legislation no further than the one Act of Parliament referred to—it was clear that the case of companies held by a majority or even by a minority of alien enemies was put under surveillance to such an extent that payments made or transactions carried on with such a company in this country would have been under official inspection. It appears to me to be a somewhat strong proposition under these circumstances to hold that one is entitled to go behind the English incorporation of the company and to declare that all these statutory stipulations were vain, seeing that such a company was an enemy, to trade with whom, directly or indirectly, was a misdemeanour. Further, it appears to me to be equally unsound for a court of law to announce that, notwithstanding all those statutory provisions, the law of the land is such that the shareholding of a company incorporated in England has to be investigated, and trading with it is forbidden if the substantial majority of shares is found to be, say, German. Such an operation would write out a large portion of the statute. It would render meaningless the particular proviso which declared that enemy character attached only to companies incorporated in an enemy country. It is also fairly clear that under the word “substantially” every kind of inquiry would have to be made in individual instances, say, for instance, as to whether there were enough of alien enemy shareholders to make it an alien enemy company; as to whether a majority would determine the matter, with the possible result of seriously injuring large minorities of British shareholders; and, indeed, whether a company whose shares might be transferred from day to day stood to change into and out of its character as an alien enemy in consequence of the change of personnel in its shareholders. Such results would necessarily follow from upsetting the plain announcement of the statute which makes British incorporation settle high or low that the company so incorporated is not “enemy.”

What happened in the present case? Under the statute the Board of Trade did appoint an inspector. Since the beginning of August—that is since the war broke out—that inspector has initialled the cheques given by the company. The company has two banking accounts, into one of which moneys received are paid. When the company receives a sum of money it gives a receipt, and that receipt goes through the hands of the inspector, so that he knows exactly the details. The inspector has charge of the bank account and the company is not able to pay any money to the shareholders. The fact is, that all these shareholders are German except one; but not one of these shareholders can receive under such a régime, and during the war, any part of the assets, dividends, or profits of this concern. The company has, however, a stock of rubber goods. I put to the learned counsel for the appellants what would be the result of the argument with regard to such stock; he replied that it could not be dealt with. To the further question: “If the stock were perishable?” he replied in effect that it must perish. I think that this was a perfectly logical result, but it appears to confirm the view that the argument itself was unfounded either upon the general law of the case or upon the legislation to which I have referred. I do not detain your Lordships with what I think to be the extraordinary argument that if assets are realised and a business kept up, enemy shareholders of an English company will, at the end of the war, be benefited. Possibly they may. It is true enough that on the other argument both they and the English shareholders might enormously suffer, so that a species of indirect pillage seems to be involved—pillage first of the enemy and secondly of English shareholders—thus presumably penalised for their association with others. I must respectfully decline to admit the validity of any argument of the kind. I may, however, further point out that if the statute and proclamation be construed as the Court of Appeal have, I think, very rightly construed them, the results post bellum would be results depending upon the state of British legislation and of the terms of peace. So far as British legislation is concerned it may be mentioned that by the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1914, various provisions were made for the constitution of an office of Custodian of Enemy Property, the custodian being appointed to hold such property "until the termination of the present war," and thereafter to "deal with the same in such manner as His Majesty may by Order in Council direct" [s. 5 (1)]. In short, it seems plain beyond question that under the existing legislation or under future Acts, or as part of a diplomatic settlement after the war, the question of the disposal of enemy property will be fully dealt with. This does not seem to afford any argument in support of its deterioration or destruction, meanwhile, together with the deterioration and destruction of British rights associated with it.

In conclusion—on this head of the case—I may point out that the amending Act of 1914 provides by s. 14 that it "shall be construed as one with the principal Act," that is, the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1914, and that

It is, of course, true that this Act cannot bind the parties to the present litigation; but it appears to be entirely in accord with the view of the former Act and of the proclamation of September which has been taken in this opinion. So far as Parliament is concerned, the situation is, as stated, that the country of incorporation of the company if English excludes the company from being either an enemy company or of an enemy character; and that all the provisions relative to the working of a company whose shareholders are mixed are provisions which proceed upon that foundation. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the official of the Daimler company, charged with the payment of moneys, who would have ventured to make payment of the debt due by that company to the Continental company or to a person properly acting as its representative, would have been safe in doing so and guilty of no misdemeanour. The view taken upon this part of the case by the majority of the Court of Appeal appears to me to be well founded.

It is with regret that—this being so—I find myself constrained to concur in the opinion which your Lordships take as to the initiation of these legal proceedings. I think they naturally followed as part of a course of previous dealings; and I am not surprised at the view taken by LUSH, J., in regard to this point. But, on the other hand, the point, it is only fair to the appellants to say, has been from the first raised by them. Authority to raise legal proceedings appears to be in the directors, who are all Germans, or in some person to whom they delegated the authority. They did not before the war make such delegation of authority to raise these proceedings. Since the outbreak of war it is not, according to my opinion, competent for enemy directors or shareholders to have anything to do with the management of this company's affairs in England. A different course might possibly have been adopted by the single shareholder in England. But the point against agency and authority to take these particular legal proceedings has been taken; and I do not differ from the view of your Lordships that it is well founded. I agree, accordingly, to the suit being dismissed upon that ground; but if I may venture to say so, it does not appear to me to be a case in which costs should be awarded, even if such an award could be effective.

LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—The opinion I am about to read has been prepared with the assistance and collaboration of LORD SUMNER, who authorises me to state that he agrees with it.

In my opinion, this appeal ought to be allowed. When the action was instituted all the directors of the plaintiff company were Germans resident in Germany. In other words they were the King's enemies, and as such incapable of exercising any of the powers vested in them as directors of a company incorporated in the United Kingdom. They were incapable, therefore, of authorising the institution of this action. The contention that the secretary of the company could authorise such institution is untenable. The resolution by which he was appointed secretary would confer on him such powers only as were incident to the performance of his secretarial duties. It is true that the directors of the company might by a proper resolution in that behalf have conferred on him a power to authorise the institution of proceedings in the company's name, but they did not do so. Their conduct in holding him out as a person having this power, if they in fact so held him out, may in particular cases have operated to estop the company from denying the authority of a solicitor whom he retained, but it could not confer the power in question. It follows that this action was instituted without authority from the company, and, in my opinion, the court, having notice of the fact, should have refused relief. It is true that a question whether the plaintiff's solicitor has or has not been validly retained is in general brought before the court by motion to which the solicitor is made a party. But when the court in the course of an action becomes aware that the plaintiff is incapable of giving any retainer at all, it ought not to allow the action to proceed. It clearly would not do so in the case of an infant plaintiff, and I can see no difference in principle between the case of an infant and the case of a company which has no directors or other officers capable of giving instructions for the institution of legal proceedings. This is more especially so when, by reason of all the shareholders (with one exception) being the King's enemies, no agent or officer capable of giving such instructions can be validly appointed. It was suggested that the secretary, being the only shareholder who is not an enemy, could in some way or other call and hold a meeting of the company at which he might appoint himself to be a director or agent of the company with such powers as he might think fit. He has not attempted to do so, and after a careful examination of the articles I think it reasonably clear that any such attempt would fail. Further, it is quite clear that the articles of association of the company do not contemplate or provide for the continuance of the company's trading without any directors at all, nor is a secretary of a company an official who virtute officii can manage all its affairs, with or without the help of servants, in the absence of a regular directorate.

Under these circumstances it is, strictly speaking, unnecessary to consider whether a company incorporated in the United Kingdom can under any and what circumstances be an enemy or assume an enemy character. The question has, however, been so elaborately argued both here and in the Court of Appeal and is of such general importance that it would not be right to ignore it. The principle, upon which the judgment under appeal proceeds, is that trading with an incorporated company cannot be trading with an enemy, where the company is registered in England under the Companies Acts and carries on its business here. Such a company it calls an "English company," obviously likens it to a natural-born Englishman, and accordingly holds that payment to it of a debt, which is due to it, and of money, which is its own, cannot be trading with the enemy, be its corporators who they may. The view is that an English company's enemy officers vacate their office on becoming enemies and so affect it no longer, and that its enemy shareholders, being neither its agents nor its principals, never in law affect it at all. Much of the reasoning by which this principle is supported is quite indisputable. No one can question that a corporation is a legal person distinct from its corporators; that the relation of a shareholder to a company, which is limited by shares, is not in itself the relation of principal and agent or the reverse; that the assets of the company belong to it and the acts of its servants and agents are its acts, while its shareholders, as such, have no property in the assets and no personal responsibility for those acts. The law on the subject is clearly laid down in a passage in LORD HALSBURY'S opinion in Salomon v. Salomon & Co. (6) where he says ([1897] A.C. at p. 30):

"I am simply here dealing with the provisions of the statute, and it seems to me to be essential to the artificial creation that the law should recognise only that artificial existence—quite apart from the motives or conduct of individual corporators. . . . Short of such proof [i.e., proof in appropriate proceedings that the company had no real legal existence] it seems to me impossible to dispute that once the company is legally incorporated it must be treated like any other independent person, with its rights and liabilities appropriate to itself, and that the motives of those who took part in the promotion of the company are absolutely irrelevant in discussing what those rights and liabilities are."

I do not think, however, that it is a necessary corollary of this reasoning to say that the character of its corporators must be irrelevant to the character of the company; and this is crucial, for the rule against trading with the enemy depends upon enemy character.

A natural person, though an English-born subject of His Majesty, may bear an enemy character and be under liability and disability as such by adhering to His Majesty's enemies. If he gives them active aid, he is a traitor; but he may fall far short of that and still be invested with enemy character. If he has what is known in prize law as a commercial domicile among the King's enemies, his merchandise is good prize at sea, just as if it belonged to a subject of the enemy Power. Not only actively, but passively, he may bring himself under the same disability. Voluntary residence among the enemy, however passive or pacific he may be, identifies an English subject with His Majesty's foes. I do not think it necessary to cite authority for these well-known propositions, nor do I doubt that, if they had seemed material to the Court of Appeal, they would have been accepted. How are such rules to be applied to an artificial person, incorporated by forms of law? So far as active adherence to the enemy goes, there can be no difference, except such as arises from the fact that a company's acts are those of its servants and agents acting within the scope of their authority. An illustration of the application of such rules to a company (as it happens a company of neutral incorporation, which is an à fortiori case) is [to be found] in Netherlands South African Co., Ltd. v. Fisher (7). In the case of an artificial person, what is the analogue to voluntary residence among the King's enemies? Its impersonality can hardly put it in a better position than a natural person and lead to its being unaffected by anything equivalent to residence. It is only by a figure of speech that a company can be said to have a nationality or residence at all. If the place of its incorporation under municipal law fixes its residence, then its residence cannot be changed, which is almost a contradiction in terms, and in the case of a company residence must correspond to the birthplace and country of natural allegiance in the case of a living person and not to residence or commercial domicile. Nevertheless, enemy character depends on these last. It would seem, therefore, logically to follow that, in transferring the application of the rule against trading with the enemy from natural to artificial persons, something more than the mere place or country of registration or incorporation must be looked at. I think that the analogy is to be found in control, an idea which, if not very familiar in law, is of capital importance and is very well understood in commerce and finance. The acts of a company's organs, its directors, managers, secretary and so forth, functioning within the scope of their authority, are the company's acts and may invest it definitely with enemy character. It seems to me that similarly the character of those, who can make and unmake those officers, dictate their conduct mediately or immediately, prescribe their duties and call them to account, may also be material in a question of the enemy character of the company. If not definite and conclusive, it must at

A least be primâ facie relevant, as raising a presumption that those who are purporting to act in the name of the company are, in fact, under the control of those whom it is their interest to satisfy. Certainly I have found no authority to the contrary. Such a view reconciles the positions of natural and artificial persons in this regard, and the opposite view leads to the paradoxical result that the King's enemies, who chance during war to constitute the entire body of corporators in a company

B registered in England, thereby pass out of the range of legal vision, and instead, the corporation, which in itself is incapable of loyalty, or enmity, or residence, or of anything but of bare existence in contemplation of law and of registration under some system of law, takes their place for almost the most important of all purposes, that of being classed among the King's friends or among his foes in time of war.

C What is involved in the decision of the Court of Appeal is that, for all purposes to which the character and not merely the rights and powers of an artificial person are material, the personalities of the natural persons, who are its corporators, are to be ignored. An impassable line is drawn between the one person and the others. When the law is concerned with the artificial person, it is to know nothing of the natural persons, who constitute and control it. In questions of property and

D capacity, of acts done and rights acquired or liabilities assumed thereby, this may be always true. Certainly it is so for the most part. But the character in which property is held, and the character in which the capacity to act is enjoyed and acts are done, are not in pari materiâ. The latter character is a quality of the company itself, and conditions its capacities and its acts. It is not a mere part of its energies or acquisitions, and if that character must be derivable, not from

E the circumstances of its incorporation, which arises once for all, but from qualities of enmity and amity, which are dependent on the chances of peace or war and are attributable only to human beings, I know not from what human beings that character should be derived, in cases where the active conduct of the company's officers has not already decided the matter, if resort is not to be had to the predominant character of its shareholders and corporators. So far as I can find,

F this precise question has been asked heretofore once and once only—namely, in argument in Bank of United States v. Deveaux (8) (5 Cranch at p. 81). The judgment of MARSHALL, C.J., did not answer it, though he decided the case in favour of the party whose counsel suggested this point as part of a wider argument. Accordingly, all that can be said is that the suggestion cannot have shocked that

G great jurist, and his actual decision proceeds upon the assumption that for certain purposes a court must look behind the artificial persona—the corporation—and take account of and be guided by the personalities of the natural persons, the corporators. In the Court of Appeal the Lord Chief Justice expressed the opinion that the judgment of MARSHALL, C.J., had not been approved in later cases before the Supreme Court of the United States. I have examined the cases in question—

H Louisville, Cincinnati and Charleston Railroad Co. v. Letson (9) and St. Louis and San Francisco Rail. Co. v. James (10) and have come to the conclusion that, so far as is material to the question in hand, they do not bear out this criticism. This is how the matter stands. Under the constitution of the United States jurisdiction is given to federal circuit courts to decide controversies between "citizens" of different States. In the case in question MARSHALL, C.J., held that an artificial person could not be a citizen for this purpose, but, not to deny justice to a

I corporation, he took cognisance of the corporators and, finding them all to be citizens of the State which had incorporated the plaintiff bank, he admitted jurisdiction, treated the bank like a citizen of that State, and entertained the suit. It was afterwards contended, and for some time with success, that this decision applied only when all the corporators were citizens of that State and that it required a refusal of jurisdiction, when some of them were citizens of another State. It was in this stage that he expressed the doubts referred to in the judgment below. Long after his time the matter was at last set at rest in the case of the St. Louis

Railway (10), when the court surveyed all the different phases of the controversy. What is remarkable is the way in which this was done. The federal courts did not ignore the existence of the corporators and fix their attention on the place where the corporation was chartered, or the State, under whose laws it was registered. They continued to fix their attention on the citizen corporators, but they conclusively and incontestably presumed that they were all citizens of the State of the incorporation. Such bearing, therefore, as these cases have on the present question is in favour of the appellants, for it is plain that great judges, trained in the principles of the English common law, have not found it contrary to principle to look, at least for some purposes, behind the corporation, and consider the quality of its members.

A somewhat similar observation arises upon Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines, Ltd. (4). The question fought throughout in that case was, whether it was against public policy for English underwriters to indemnify a company, registered in the Transvaal, against losses inflicted upon it just before the outbreak of war by the government of the South African Republic in order to strengthen its resources in the impending conflict with this country. The case was tried before the conclusion of peace, but on the common footing that it should be taken that the war was over. The mere suspension of an enemy's right of suit during war never was relied on at all, and the plea that payment on the policy would be an act of trading with the enemy was dropped. The only case made was that payment would relieve enemies of the Crown from losses, which the public policy of this country, applicable to war and warlike conditions, required that they should bear themselves. It was the underwriters who insisted on the enemy character of the company, for the company itself denied it. As I read the judgments of the noble Lords, none purported to decide that the company must be an enemy corporation for all purposes, by reason of its registration in the Transvaal. They held that, even if that assumption were made in the underwriters' favour, yet their appeal must fail. The Lord Chancellor expressly stated that the question might be debatable, as it is now actually being debated, and other noble Lords concurred. LORD LINDLEY, whose observations alone are expressed at length, could not, I think, have meant to intimate thereby that, in such a case as the present, he would decide for the respondents. What really is significant in that case is this: few, if any, of the shareholders in the company were, in fact, subjects of the South African Republic. The vast majority were subjects of various European States. The company's argument was: "How can it be contrary to British public policy that individual Frenchmen and Germans or Italians should get the practical benefit of this policy." In the Court of Appeal SIR A. L. SMITH, M.R., expressly accepted this argument. To him at least there was no impenetrable screen, interposed by registration, between the company and its shareholders. Beyond this, I think for present purposes the case does not go.

Further, Daniel v. Comrs. for Claims on France (11) and Loug v. Comrs. for Claims on France (12), cited to your Lordships from 2 Knapp at pp. 23 and 51, do not seem to me to be in point. They turn on the meaning to be attributed to the expression "British subjects" in a particular treaty. If anything, the reliance placed on the fact of the French government's control over the colleges and on the existing state of English legislation towards Roman Catholic ecclesiastics would militate against the respondent's argument. As an illustration of the view which has been taken (under the Income Tax Acts it is true) of the control which one trading company exercises over another company through the ownership of a controlling interest in the latter's shares, I would refer to St. Louis Breweries, Ltd. v. Aphorpe (13), and Aphorpe v. Peter Schoenhofen Brewing Co., Ltd. (14). In the latter case, in deciding that an English company, which held a controlling interest in the shares of a United States company, carried on business for income tax purposes in the United States by virtue of that holding and of its control over the business of the latter company, COLLINS, L.J., expressly said that he was not

A deterred from so deciding by the decision of your Lordships' House in Salomon v. Salomon & Co. (6), which was so much relied on in the court below. I think this analogy not without importance. In The Roumanian (15) it is to be remembered that the Prize Court was dealing with a matter in which the enemy character of goods is by settled rule determined by ownership, and when that case was affirmed in the Privy Council no decision on this point was invited or given.

B The truth is that considerations, which govern civil liability and rights of property in time of peace, differ radically from those which govern enemy character in time of war. Joint stock enterprise and English legislation and decisions about it have developed mainly since this country was last engaged in a great European war and have taken little, if any, account of warlike conditions. The ideal of joint stock enterprise, that with limited liability, the more unlimited the trading the better, is an ideal of profound peace. The rule against trading with the enemy is a belligerent's weapon of self-protection. I think that it has to be applied to modern circumstances as we find them and not limited to the applications of long ago, with as little desire to cut it down on the one hand as to extend it on the other beyond what those circumstances require. Though it has been said by high authority (see M'Connell v. Hector (2); Esposito v. Bowden (16)) to aim at curtailing the commercial resources of the enemy, it has, according to other and older authorities, the wider object of preventing unregulated intercourse with the enemy altogether. Through the Royal licence, which validates such intercourse and such trade, they are brought under necessary control. Without such control they are forbidden. To my mind, the rule would be deprived of its substantial justification and be reduced to a barren canon, if it were held, in circumstances such as these, that it had no application by reason of the mere fact that the company is registered in London.

Having regard to the foregoing considerations, I think the law on the subject may be summarised in the following propositions. (i) A company incorporated in the United Kingdom is a legal entity, a creation of law with the status and capacity which the law confers. It is not a natural person with mind or conscience. To use the language of BUCKLEY, L.J. ([1915] 1 K.B. at p. 916), "it can be neither loyal nor disloyal. It can be neither friend nor enemy." (ii) Such a company can only act through agents properly authorised, and so long as it is carrying on business in this country through agents so authorised and residing in this or a friendly country it is prima facie to be regarded as a friend, and all His Majesty's lieges may deal with it as such. (iii) Such a company may, however, assume an enemy character. This will be the case if its agents or the persons in de facto control of its affairs, whether authorised or not, are resident in an enemy country, or, wherever resident, are adhering to the enemy or taking instruction from or acting under the control of the enemy. A person knowingly dealing with the company in such a case is trading with the enemy. (iv) The character of individual shareholders cannot of itself affect the character of the company. This is admittedly so in times of peace during which every shareholder is at liberty to exercise and enjoy such rights as are by law incident to his status as shareholder. It would be anomalous if it were not so also in a time of war during which all such rights and privileges are in abeyance. The enemy character of individual shareholders and their conduct may, however, be very material on the question whether the company's agents, or the persons in de facto control of its affairs, are in fact adhering to, taking instructions from, or acting under the control of enemies. This materiality will vary with the number of shareholders who are enemies and the value of their holdings. The fact, if it be the fact, that after eliminating the enemy shareholders the number of shareholders remaining is insufficient for the purpose of holding meetings of the company or appointing directors or other officers, may well raise a presumption in this respect. For example, in the present case, even if the secretary had been fully authorised to manage the affairs of the company and to institute legal proceedings on its behalf, the fact that he held one share only out of 25,000 shares, and was the only shareholder who was not an enemy, might well throw on the company the onus of proving that he was not acting under the control of, taking his instructions from, or adhering to the King's enemies in such manner as to impose an enemy character on the company itself. It is an a fortiori case when the secretary is without authority and necessarily depends for the validity of all he does on the subsequent ratification of enemy shareholders. The circumstances of the present case were, therefore, such as to require close investigation and preclude the propriety of giving leave to sign judgment under Ord. 14, r. 1. (v) In a similar way a company registered in the United Kingdom, but carrying on business in a neutral country through agents properly authorised and resident here or in the neutral country, is prima facie to be regarded as a friend, but may, through its agents or persons in de facto control of its affairs, assume an enemy character. (vi) A company registered in the United Kingdom, but carrying on business in an enemy country is to be regarded as an enemy.

The foregoing propositions are not only consistent with the authorities cited, in argument, and, in particular, with what was said in this House in Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines, Ltd. (4), but they have, I think, the advantage of affording convenient and intelligible guidance to the public on questions of trading with the enemy. It would be a misfortune if the law were such that during war every one proposing to deal with a British company had to examine the character of its shareholders and decide whether the number of the enemy shareholders coupled with the value of their holdings were such as to impose an enemy character on the company itself. It would be still more unfortunate if this question were a question for the jury in each particular case. No one could maintain that a company had assumed an enemy character merely because it had a few enemy shareholders. It might possibly be contended that it assumed an enemy character when its enemy shareholders amount to (say) one-half, or three-fifths, or five-eighths of the whole, but how if the one-half, three-fifths, or five-eighths held only one-sixth, one-fifth, or one-fourth of the shares? The legislature might, but no court could possibly, lay down a hard-and-fast rule, and, if no such rule were laid down, how could anyone proposing to deal with the company ascertain whether he was or was not proposing to deal with the enemy?

I desire to add this. It was suggested in argument that acts otherwise lawful might be rendered unlawful by the fact that they might tend to the enrichment of the enemy when the war was over. I entirely dissent from this view. I see no reason why a company should not trade merely because enemy shareholders may after the war become entitled to their proper share of profits of such trading. I see no reason why the trustee of an English business with enemy cestuis qui trust should not during the war continue to carry on the business, although after the war the profits may go to persons who are now enemies, or why moneys belonging to an enemy, but in the hands of a trustee in this country, should not be paid into court and invested in government stock or other securities for the benefit of the persons entitled after the war. The contention appears to me to extend the principle on which trading with the enemy is forbidden far beyond what reason can approve or the law can warrant. In early days the King's prerogative, probably extended to seizing enemy property on land as well as on sea. As to property on land, this prerogative has long fallen into disuse. Subject to any legislation to the contrary or anything to the contrary contained in the treaty of peace when peace comes, enemy property in this country will be restored to its owners after the war just as property in enemy countries belonging to His Majesty's subjects will or ought to be restored to them after the war. In the meantime it would be lamentable if the trade of this country were fettered, businesses shut down, or money allowed to remain idle, in order to prevent any possible benefit accruing thereby to enemies after peace. The prohibition against doing anything for the

A benefit of an enemy contemplates his benefit during the war and not the possible advantage he may gain when peace comes.

I need only briefly refer to the argument submitted on the effect of the recent statutes against trading with the enemy and the Royal Proclamations connected with them. I have carefully considered them and do not think that they limit or exclude common law rules or principles or, in the case of corporations, restrict the trade which is unlawful to trading with such corporations as are incorporated under the laws of an enemy country. Equally little can the proclamations be read as licences to do anything that they do not in terms prohibit. No suggestion has been made that the position of the respondent company is that of an alien enemy commorant within the realm sub protectione regis, or that the royal licence has specifically been extended to trading with it.

C I feel some little difficulty as to the precise form which your Lordships' order ought to take. The action is altogether irregular and should be struck out, all orders made therein being, of course, discharged. But there is no one before the House who can be made liable for costs or who can be ordered to replace in court the moneys paid out to the secretary. There can therefore be no order as to costs, and the appellants must be left to pursue any remedy they may have against the secretary personally in respect of the money which was erroneously paid to him.

LORD PARMOOR.—The respondents were registered at Somerset House, on Mar. 29, 1905, as a limited liability company under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1900. At the date of the outbreak of war the company was carrying on business in the United Kingdom under a system of local management. It appears not to be open to question that, before the war, the company was a British company, irrespective of the nationality of the directors and other corporators. The respondents brought an action against the appellants as acceptors of three bills of exchange for £1,100, £1,018 4s. 2d., and £3,462 9s. 4d., in payment of goods supplied before the declaration of war. On Nov. 24, 1914, MASTER MACDONNELL gave leave to the plaintiffs to sign final judgment under Ord. 14. This order was affirmed by SCRUTTON, J., and the Court of Appeal. At the date of the writ all shares in the respondent company except one were held by a German company, or by subjects of the German Empire, residing in Germany. One share was registered in the name of the secretary of the company, who resides in London, and in January, 1910, became a naturalised subject of the Crown. All the directors are subjects of the German Empire and reside in Germany. The appellants do not deny that they accepted the three bills of exchange, but raise two points—(i) that having regard to the enemy character of the shareholders and directors of the respondent company no payment can be enforced by the company during the war of debts owing to the company, and (ii) that there was no authority in the solicitors for the company to issue the writ in the action. Both matters are of importance, but the main argument both in this House and in the Court of Appeal has been directed to the question how far the enemy nationality of the directors, and of the shareholders of the company for the time being on the register, affects the status of the company after the outbreak of war, and its right to sue in the British courts.

A company incorporated under the Companies Acts has a continued existence, irrespective of the shareholders for the time being on the register. It is a legal person or entity, which comprises not only those shareholders, but their predecessors and successors. It has a right to sue, and a liability to be sued, in the corporate name. It possesses powers and is subject to obligations distinct from those of the shareholders for the time being on the register, acting either individually or in their collective capacity. I see no reason why the word nationality may not be properly applied to a corporate body. The nationality of such a body is wholly distinct from that either of a majority or of the whole number of shareholders for the time being on the register. The contention of the appellants is that when, at the outbreak of war, the shareholders on the register of a British company, carrying on business within the United Kingdom, are wholly or largely alien enemies, the company loses the right, which it would otherwise have, to sue in the British courts. I do not think that this contention is well founded, and I agree in this respect with the opinion expressed by LORD SHAW. The company, after the outbreak of war, does not lose the status of a company registered in this country. If there is an agent duly appointed, who may or may not be a shareholder, the outbreak of war does not per se terminate the agency, and the company is liable to be sued in respect of obligations and is enabled to sue to enforce its rights. In other words, the company still owes obedience to the laws of this country, and is entitled to their protection.

It is not necessary to go through the numerous cases quoted to your Lordships. I agree with the conclusion in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice that, subject to the doubtful exception of one case (City of London v. Wood (17)), there is no English authority which supports the contention of the appellants. On the other hand, there is no direct authority against this contention. Two cases decided in this House support the principle on which the decision of the Court of Appeal is based. In Salomon v. Salomon & Co. (6), LORD MACNAGHTEN, in specific terms, states his opinion that a company is a different person altogether from the subscribers to the memorandum or the shareholders on the register. In Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines, Ltd. (4) the question now in debate was indirectly involved, and there are passages in the opinion of the noble and learned Lords which are entitled to be regarded as a high authority. LORD MACNAGHTEN says ([1902] A.C. at p. 487):

"If all the members of the corporation had been subjects of the British Crown, the corporation itself would be none the less a foreign corporation and none the less in regard to this country an alien."

LORD DAVEY says (ibid. at p. 498):

"I think it must be taken that the respondent company was technically an alien, and became, on the breaking out of hostilities between this country and the South African Republic, an alien enemy."

LORD BRAMPTON says (ibid. at p. 501):

"The company clearly must be treated as a subject of the republic, notwithstanding the nationality of its shareholders."

LORD ROBERTSON says (ibid. at p. 504):

"That this company was a Transvaal company, and that the nationality of its shareholders is immaterial."

LORD LINDLEY says (ibid. at p. 505):

"For all purposes material for the determination of the present appeal, the company must, in my opinion, be regarded as a company resident and carrying on business in the Transvaal, although not exclusively there. It was subject to the laws of that country. When war broke out the company became an alien enemy of this country: see the American case of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel v. Wheeler (18). If it becomes material to attribute nationality to the company it would, in my opinion, be correct to say that the company was a Transvaal company and a subject of the Transvaal government, although almost all its shareholders were foreigners resident elsewhere and subjects of other countries. But when considering questions arising with an alien enemy, it is not the nationality of the person, but his place of business during the war that is important."

I have troubled your Lordships at some length with quotations from the opinions of noble and learned Lords in the above case in order to avoid the necessity of further references to other cases. I do not doubt the proposition that a company registered in this country would, if proved to be carrying on its business, through

A its agent or agents, in an enemy country, become enemy in character. I draw no distinction in this respect between a British company and a British born subject. The enemy character would be the same, though every shareholder and every director was a British born subject. In the present case there is no evidence that since the outbreak of the war the respondents have carried on business in an enemy country. In the absence of such evidence the respondents have the same
B right of access to the courts as any other British subject or subject of a friendly State, and if it is relevant to clothe the company with a nationality, their nationality was British.

In the Court of Appeal BUCKLEY, L.J. (now LORD WRENBURY) has expressed the opinion that, though the respondent company has an independent legal existence and is a British legal person, all its directors and all its corporators on the register
C are German residents in Germany, and that these apart from technicality determine the thoughts, wishes, or intention of the company. "The question for determination is whether when all the natural persons who express and give effect to their wishes through the corporation as a legal abstraction are Germans, resident in Germany, the corporation can sue in this country, because those persons who could not sue are, as a matter of law, absorbed in a separate legal person which is British, and
D which (regarding the corporation as a legal person existing apart from and irrespective of its corporators) can sue." Assuming that it is permissible for some purposes to consider the nationality of the corporators on the register, I find it difficult to accept the conclusion that, after the outbreak of war, the thoughts, wishes, or intentions of the company are the thoughts, wishes or intentions of
E Germans resident in Germany. The effect of the outbreak of the war is to suspend, as from that date, and during the war, all rights of the enemy directors or corporators to take any part in the management and direction or control of a British company carrying on business in this country. This is in no sense a technical question, but one of substance and reality. If any official of the company in this country entered into any intercourse with the enemy directors or corporators he would be liable to a charge of misdemeanour, and subject, if
F convicted, to a heavy punishment. It is fair to say that the secretary of the company has denied that he has had any intercourse with the German directors or corporators since the outbreak of the war, or that any payment to the respondent company since that date has been remitted to the enemy. Furthermore, the Board of Trade has taken control of the books of the respondent company in accordance with the powers conferred upon them by statute. Counsel for the appellants
G argued that the enemy corporators had disappeared during the period of the war. It is more accurate to say that their rights have been suspended by the outbreak of the war and will remain in suspense during the period of the war. The principle applicable is well stated in Ex parte Boussmaker (19) where a bankruptcy claim was admitted on behalf of an alien enemy, the dividend to be reserved during the continuance of the war. The Lord Chancellor, after referring to the general
H principle that a contract with an alien enemy would be void, says:

"But if the two nations were at peace at the date of the contract, from the time of war taking place the creditor could not sue; but, the contract being originally good, upon the return of peace the right would survive."

I Special reference was made in the argument to the case of a corporation sole. Corporations sole are, in the main, ecclesiastical, but, by the Public Trustee Act, 1906, a public trustee has been constituted a corporation sole, with perpetual succession and an official seal, and may sue or be sued under the above name like any other corporation sole. The object is to give the corporation a continued existence irrespective of the person holding the office of public trustee for the time being. If the person holding the office for the time being became an alien enemy, or in any other way became disentitled to sue or be sued in the British courts, this would not affect the right of the corporation to sue, or its liability to be sued by any persons entitled to receive payment due from funds held by the corporation as trustees. The distinction between the corporators for the time being, and the corporation with perpetual succession, is not technical, but of essential importance. Similar considerations arise in the case of an ecclesiastical corporation sole. Many of these corporations have existed for centuries with a succession of individual corporators, who are considered in law as one person. A particular bishop or rector might be a person whose rights to sue or be sued had been suspended, but the funds of the corporation are not on that account relieved from liability, and the work of the corporation is not brought to a standstill by a disability to recover debts due in the British courts. A

The principle that the enemy character of shareholders on the registers does not take away the right of a British company to sue, or its liability to be sued, is recognised in the proclamation against trading with the enemy of Sept. 9, 1914, read in connection with the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1914, and the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1914. The proclamation, taken by itself, can in no way affect the legal position, but it is different if the terms of the proclamation subsequently receive statutory confirmation. Article 3 of the proclamation states: "In the case of incorporated bodies, enemy character attaches only to those incorporated in an enemy country." In s. 1 (2) of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1914, it is enacted that, for the purposes of that Act, a person should be deemed to have traded with the enemy if he has entered into any transaction or done any act which was, at the time of such transaction or act, prohibited by or under any proclamation issued by His Majesty dealing with trading with the enemy, for the time being in force, or which at common law, or by statute, constitutes an offence of trading with the enemy; provided that any transaction or act permitted by or under any such proclamation shall not be deemed to be trading with the enemy. This section is not directed to the determination of what constitutes an enemy, but to transactions and acts prohibited either by proclamation, common law, or statute. The proviso does not in my opinion, assist the argument of the appellant company and is not relevant to the question now in debate. It is indeed essential not to confuse the question of enemy character with the question of trading with the enemy. A British subject is liable to all the penalties which attach to enemy trading, but he does not thereby cease to be a British subject or divest himself of his status as a British citizen. Section 14 (2) of the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1914, is directed to a determination of the persons or body of persons to be treated as enemy. It provides: B

"No person or body of persons shall, for the purposes of this Act, be treated as an enemy who would not be so treated for the purpose of any proclamation issued by His Majesty dealing with trading with the enemy, for the time being in force . . ."

This definition is limited to the purposes of this Act, but the Act is to be construed as one with the principal Act, and the purpose of the Act is stated in the preamble to be to prevent the payment of money to persons or bodies of persons resident or carrying on business in any country with which His Majesty is, for the time being, at war. The effect is that a company registered in this country, which is not carrying on business in an enemy country, is not an enemy company, and that any person paying debts, due from him to such company, is not trading with the enemy or committing any offence, whatever may be the nationality of its directors and corporators. H

At the conclusion of his judgment BUCKLEY, L.J., quotes the language of Bank of United States v. Deveaux (8) (5 Cranch at p. 91): "The action is by aliens suing by a corporate name." I think that this dictum is not applicable where the aliens are alien enemies, whose rights of interference or control in the management of the corporation have been wholly suspended; but it is clear that a British company cannot claim to be in a more favourable position than an ordinary British I

A subject, and that the fact of registration in this country would be no answer if it can be proved that its agent is acting under enemy control or holding any intercourse with alien enemies.

The second question raised by the appellants is that there was no authority in the solicitor for the company to issue the writ in the action. The question is not whether there was a retainer to the solicitor to issue the writ in the action, but whether, under the conditions consequent on the outbreak of the war, there was any representative of the company with authority to give instructions to a solicitor to commence an action on behalf of the company. The cases which decide the practice to be followed when an objection is made to the retainer of a solicitor do not apply. There is no reason why the objection raised in this case on behalf of the appellants could not be entertained at the trial as a defence to the action, and to refuse to entertain it might lead to serious injustice. In Continental Tyre and Rubber Co., (Great Britain), Ltd. v. Thomas Tilling, Ltd., which was tried before LUSH, J. (and in the Court of Appeal was consolidated with the present case (see 112 L.T. 324)) in November, 1914, evidence was adduced for the purpose of proving that, prior to the outbreak of the war, the secretary had been given the necessary authority by the company. By arrangement this evidence was admitted as though it had been given on the hearing of the case under debate. The Court of Appeal agreed with LUSH, J., that, upon the evidence before him, there was sufficient ground for holding that the authority of the secretary had been established. If the secretary had the necessary authority at the outbreak of the war there is no evidence that such authority has been revoked, and there is no revocation by operation of law. LUSH, J., finds that the secretary has constantly brought such actions as the present, and that the directors have left it to him to cause a writ to be issued when necessary, and that he has done so in this case with their authority express or implied. Assuming that this finding is justified by the evidence, it does not, in my opinion, support the proposition that at the outbreak of the war the secretary had authority of the company to initiate litigation on its behalf. There is no minute conferring such authority on the secretary, and there is no satisfactory evidence of any resolution giving such authority, although not recorded in a minute. It is advisable that a resolution giving such authority should be formally recorded in a minute, but this would not be conclusive if the fact that such resolution had been passed could be proved from other sources. In my opinion, there is no evidence that any such resolution was ever passed and the finding of LUSH, J., comes to nothing more than that it was found convenient to allow the secretary to initiate litigation from time to time, whether his authority is to be regarded as conferred in each case, or as ratified by subsequent acquiescence. Counsel for the respondents argued that if the secretary had not authority he could obtain it by taking the necessary steps, and that the objection was of a technical character. It is a sufficient answer to this argument to say that, whatever steps may be necessary to confer authority on the secretary, no such steps have, in fact, been taken. As at present advised, I think that there is no way in which the necessary authority could be conferred upon the secretary. The difficulty is certainly not met by the provisions in the articles of association which purports to provide that a quorum of one is sufficient to constitute an adjourned meeting. In the main contention the respondents have succeeded. I agree in the form of the order proposed by LORD PARKER.

Appeal allowed: action struck out.

R. v. CASEMENT

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Darling, Bray, A. T. Lawrence, Scrutton and Atkin, JJ.), July 17, 18, 1916]

[Reported [1917] 1 K.B. 98; 86 L.J.K.B. 467; 115 L.T. 267, 277; 32 T.L.R. 601, 667; 60 Sol. Jo. 656; 25 Cox, C.C. 480, 503; 12 Cr. App. Rep. 99]

Criminal Law—Treason—Adhering to King's enemies—Adherence without the realm—Trial in the King's Bench—Treason Act, 1351 (25 Edw. 3, st. 5, c. 2)—Treason Act, 1543 (35 Hen. 8, c. 2).

By the Treason Act, 1351, the following shall be declared to be treason: "If a man do levy war against our Lord the King in his realm, or be adherent to the King's enemies in his realm, giving to them aid and comfort, in the realm, or elsewhere, and thereof be proveably attainted of open deed by the people of their condition."

The appellant, a British subject, went to reside in Germany during the early part of the war between England and Germany in 1914-1918. While there he tried to persuade Irish soldiers who had been taken prisoners and were interned in Germany to join an Irish brigade and assist Germany to fight against England. In 1916 he landed in Ireland as one of a party carrying arms and ammunition which, it was alleged, were to be supplied to Irishmen and used on behalf of Germany in the prosecution of the war. He was taken in Ireland, and later, after a trial in the King's Bench, he was convicted of an offence under the provisions quoted of the Act of 1351 and was sentenced to death. On appeal, Held: the offence prescribed by the statute was committed by a person adhering and giving aid and comfort to the King's enemies outside his realm just as much as if the adherence had taken place and the aid and comfort been given within the realm; under the Treason Act, 1543, the offender was triable in the King's Bench; and, therefore, the appellant had been rightly convicted.

A Appeal against a conviction and sentence of death on a trial at Bar in the King's Bench Division before LORD READING, C.J., AVORY and HORRIDGE, JJ., for high treason by adhering to the King's enemies elsewhere than in the King's realm—to wit, in Germany during the war between Great Britain and Germany from 1914 to 1918.

The facts are stated in the headnote.

B A. M. Sullivan (Second Serjeant of the Irish Bar and also of the English Bar), T. Artemus Jones, and J. H. Morgan for the appellant.

The Attorney-General (Sir F. E. Smith, K.C.), The Solicitor-General (Sir George Cave, K.C.), Bodkin, Travers Humphreys and Branson for the Crown were not called on to argue.

C The judgment of the court was delivered by

DARLING, J.—The appellant was indicted for high treason in adhering to the King's enemies elsewhere than in the King's realm, that is to say, within the Empire of Germany, and his act was said to be contrary to the provisions of the statute 25, Edw. 3, c. 2, known as the Treason Act, 1351. That statute says:

D "Whereas divers opinions have been before this time in what case treason shall be said, and in what not; the King, at the request of the Lords and of the Commons, hath made a declaration in the manner as hereafter followeth . . ."

Various treasons are defined. After the treason of levying war against the King, in his kingdom, there is defined this treason:

E "ou soit aherdant as enemys nostre seigneur le Roi en le roialme, donant a eux aid ou confort, en son roialme ou par aillours."

That has been translated, "or be adherent to the King's enemies in his realm, giving to them aid and comfort, in the realm, or elsewhere." These few words have given rise to all the arguments addressed to the court at the trial at Bar and to this court.

F The main point raised in the exceedingly able argument of counsel for the appellant was that this statute had neither created nor declared the offence of being adherent to the King's enemies beyond the realm of the King; and that the giving of aid and comfort, "par aillours"—that is, outside the realm—did not constitute a treason which could be tried in this country unless the person who gave the aid and comfort outside the realm (in the present case in Germany) was himself within the realm at the time when he gave the aid and comfort. This argument was founded upon the difficulties which must arise owing to the doctrine of venue and the fact that people were only triable within certain districts when the venue could be alleged—that if a man committed a crime in a county he must be indicted and tried for it in that county; that if he committed a crime against the King he must be tried within the realm; and that if the aid and comfort was given outside the realm by a person being then outside the realm he could not be tried there, because it was not within the King's realm; and that, as the appellant could not be tried by the King's courts in Germany, he could not be tried in the King's courts at all for what he had done in Germany unless, when he gave the aid and comfort in Germany, he was himself actually resident in the King's realm. It was said this must be so or a case could be found where a man had, altogether outside the realm, given aid and comfort to the King's enemies, and had been indicted within the realm and tried for it. Such a case would be difficult to find, because it cannot be a very common offence. First, if a man did those things pure and simple, it is highly improbable that he would then put himself in peril by coming within the realm where what he had done might be investigated and he might be punished for it. Very few offenders would put themselves in a position where they could be charged; if they did come back it is so highly probable that they would commit some offence within the realm, such as levying war or compassing the King's death, that they would very likely be arrested and charged with some such offence which anybody within the King's realm could commit, and which would be much more easily proved. The court is, therefore, not much impressed by the fact that there is very A little precedent for a trial the nature of which we are dealing with to-day.

There is, however, considerable authority for the proposition that what the jury have found was done by the appellant is an offence triable in the King's Bench.
Taking the words of the statute themselves, we do not think that the construction for which counsel for the appellant contends is the true one. He would have it said B that "be adherent to the King's enemies in his realm, giving to them aid and comfort, in the realm, or elsewhere" means that the adherence must be given by a person who, being in this country, gives the aid and comfort, it may be in this country, it may be outside of it. We agree that if a person being within this country gives aid and comfort to the King's enemies in this country he is adherent to the King's enemies. We agree that if he is in this country and gives aid and comfort to the King's enemies outside this country he is adherent to the King's enemies. But we C think there is another offence, and that these words must mean something more than that. We think that "giving aid and comfort to the King's enemies" are words of apposition; they are words to explain what is meant by being adherent to, and we think that, if a man be adherent to the King's enemies in his realm by giving to them aid and comfort in his realm, or if he be adherent to the King's enemies elsewhere—that is, by giving to them aid and comfort elsewhere—he is D equally adherent to the King's enemies, and, if he is adherent to the King's enemies, then he commits the treason which the statute of Edward III defines. A very good reason for that opinion is that the subjects of the King owe him allegiance, and the allegiance follows the person of the subject. He is the King's liege wherever he may be, and he may violate his allegiance in a foreign country just as well as he may violate it in this country. If authority were wanted on this point it is E to be found in R. v. Cundell (1). The only reason why that case is not decisive of the present one is that it does not dispose of the question where the person who has committed the particular treason can be tried or how he can be tried.

I have said that in the opinion of this court there is a large amount of authority for the proposition that adherence to the King's enemy's outside the King's dominions by a person who is himself outside those dominions constitutes the com- F mission of this treason. There is a long and ancient opinion, as will be shown later on, for the proposition that it is treason to do what the appellant has been convicted of doing in the present case. A statute was passed which has been often cited before us, the Treason Act, 1543 (35 Hen. 8, c. 2), the title of which is "An Act for the trial of treasons committed out of the King's dominions." That is a G distinct statement that one can commit treason out of the King's dominions; it is only a question of how the offender is to be tried; and it says:

"Forasmuch as some doubts and questions have been moved that certain kinds of treasons, misprisions, and concealments of treason done, perpetrated, or committed out of the King's Majesty's Realm of England and other his Grace's H Dominions cannot by the common laws of this realm be inquired of, heard, and determined within this his said realm of England; for a plain remedy, order, and declaration therein to be had and made. Be it enacted by authority of this present Parliament that all manner of offences being already made or declared or hereafter to be made or declared by any of the laws and statutes of this realm to be treasons, misprisions of treasons, or concealments of treason, I and done, perpetrated, or committed, or hereafter to be done, perpetrated, and committed by any person or persons out of this realm of England shall be from henceforth inquired of, heard, and determined before the King's justices of his Bench for pleas to be holden before himself . . ."

that is to say, tried in the King's Bench. Therefore this trial was rightly had in the King's Bench, provided that what the appellant had done amounted to treason by virtue of the statute of Edward III. If it was such a treason it was rightly tried.

A Whether it was such a treason or not depends upon the construction which this court, reading this statute, puts upon it.

We have been asked to take the statute and read it as though we had seen it for the first time. That is not altogether an acceptable view. In MAXWELL ON THE INTERPRETATION OF STATUTES (5th Edn.), chap. 11, p. 489, the following passage occurs:

B "It is said that the best exposition of a statute or any other document is that which it has received from contemporary authority. Optima est legum interpretatio consuetudo. Contemporanea expositio est optima et fortissima in lege. Where this has been given by enactment or judicial decision, it is, of course, to be accepted as conclusive. But, further, the meaning publicly given by contemporary or long professional usage is presumed to be the true one, even when the language has etymologically and popularly a different meaning. It is obvious that the language of a statute must be understood in the sense in which it was understood when it was passed, and those who lived at or near the time when it was passed may reasonably be supposed to be better acquainted than their descendants with the circumstances to which it had relation, as well as with the sense then attached to its legislative expressions. Moreover, the long acquiescence of the legislature in the interpretation put upon its enactment by notorious practice may, perhaps, be regarded as some sanction and approval of it."

This statute of 1351 has been understood long before to-day, has been understood by lawyers of great learning, has been understood by lawyers of very exceptional erudition who have been members of the King's Bench, and understood in the sense in which we have to-day said we understand it. Their authority has been attacked by counsel for the appellant. He has attacked the authority of LORD COKE; he has questioned the reasons, if there be any, for the statements which LORD COKE has made concerning the law; and if we were to accede to his argument we should have absolutely to disregard the opinion of LORD COKE, the opinion of F SERJEANT HAWKINS, and the opinion of SIR MATTHEW HALE—all great names in the law, and persons whose opinions have long been followed in many questions of extreme difficulty which have puzzled lawyers for many generations. SIR MATTHEW HALE in his PLEAS OF THE CROWN, chap. 15, says this:

G "Touching the trial of foreign treason, viz., adhering to the King's enemies, as also for compassing the King's death without his kingdom at this day, the statute of 35 Hen. 8, c. 2, hath sufficiently provided for it."

Then he cites Story's Case (2) and says:

"but at common law he might have been indicted in any county of England, and especially where the offender's lands lie, if he have any."

H That is a very definite statement, and, if we were to allow this appeal, we should be bound to say that that statement did not state the law. We are not entitled to throw over the opinion of SIR MATTHEW HALE as cavalierly as we are invited to do. Then there is MR. SERJEANT HAWKINS. In his PLEAS OF THE CROWN, vol. 2, p. 306, s. 48, he says this:

I "It seems to have been a great doubt before the making of the statute 35 Hen. 8, c. 2, in what manner and in what place high treason done out of the realm was to be tried. For some seem to have holden that it was triable only upon an appeal before the constable and marshal; others that it might be tried upon an indictment, laying the offence in any county where the King pleased; and others, that it was triable by way of indictment in that county only wherein the offender had lands; but surely it cannot be reasonably doubted but that it was triable some way or other; for it cannot be imagined that an offence of such dangerous consequence, and expressly within the purview of 25 Edw. 3, should be wholly punishable, as it must have been if it were no way triable."

The argument before us to-day is that it was dishonourable because you could not try it, if the kind of treason alleged were what is alleged in this case. We are confessedly relying upon the authority of SIR MATTHEW HALE and of SERJEANT HAWKINS in the judgment which we are giving, and also upon the opinion of LORD COKE, to which I will come. In Butt v. Conant (3) DALLAS, C.J., himself no mean authority, says this (1 Brod. & Bing. at p. 570):

"We are told that we must look to the authorities, and find what we can in the books upon the subject. Now, if the authority of LORD HALE and that of MR. SERJEANT HAWKINS are to be treated lightly, we may be without any authority whatever. With respect to LORD HALE, it is needless to remind those whom I am now addressing [this was in 1820] of the general character for learning and legal knowledge of that person, of whom it was said that what was not known by him was not known by any other person who preceded or followed him; and that what he knew, he knew better than any other person who preceded or followed him. With respect to SERJEANT HAWKINS, we know his authority. There are books which are in the hand and head of every lawyer and constantly referred to on every occasion of this sort. I must therefore look to these books, and I shall proceed to examine the exposition given by text-writers of the words of those statutes and the commission of the peace."

With regard to LORD COKE, his opinion is precisely the same as that given by SIR MATTHEW HALE and MR. SERJEANT HAWKINS, but it has been said that we should not follow LORD COKE because STEPHEN in his COMMENTARIES and other writers elsewhere have spoken lightly of the authority and learning of LORD COKE. That may be so. But, although STEPHEN and others have perhaps flouted the authority of LORD COKE, he has been recognised as a great authority in these courts for centuries, and nowhere perhaps more than in the passage I am now about to read, which occurs in Garland v. Jekyll (4) (2 Bing. at p. 296):

"I know it has been said that LORD COKE in this case must be mistaken, for in the margin is a reference to LORD COKE'S REPORTS, and upon referring to the page you find nothing to warrant his opinion. I have looked into the report and the observation is correct; but it will be found that the same observation will apply to cases relied on by the other side. It appears to me that the reference was not made by LORD COKE, but that it has been introduced by some ignorant editor who fancied something confirmatory of the opinion in 4 COKE. The fact is LORD COKE had no authority for what he states, but I am afraid we should get rid of a good deal of what is considered law in Westminster Hall if what LORD COKE says without authority is not law. He was one of the most eminent lawyers that ever presided as a judge in any court of justice, and what is said by such a person is good evidence of what the law is, particularly when it is in conformity with justice and common sense."

Those are the words of BEST, C.J.

There are other authorities who understood this matter in precisely the same way, not authorities as great as LORD COKE, but it is worth while to show what was the volume of opinion during ages when lawyers were considering this matter. There is a treatise not perhaps very commonly known by MR. FERDINANDO PULTON, a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, published in 1609 (DE PACIS REGIS). He says:

"These views are collected out of the reports of the common laws of this realm and of the statutes in force, and out of the painfull works of the reverend judges."

He mentions them, and then there is this passage:

"And because by the said statute of 25 Edw. 3 it is declared to be high treason to levy war against the King in his realm, or to be adherent to his enemies, aiding them in his realm, or elsewhere; therefore if a subject born of the

A realm being beyond the seas doth practice with a prince or governor of another country to invade this realm with great power, and do declare where, how, and by what means the invasion may best be made, it is high treason; for an invasion with great power cannot be, but of likelihood it will tend to the destruction or great peril of the King and hurt to the realm; moreover, the said offender hath manifested himself to be adherent to the King's enemy and to aid him with his counsel, though not in the realm, yet elsewhere, and this offence shall be tried in the King's Bench or elsewhere before such commissioners and in such county as the King by commission shall appoint according to the statute 35 Hen. 8, c. 2."

C SIR JAMES FITZJAMES STEPHEN in his DIGEST OF THE CRIMINAL LAW (5th Edn.) art. 55, p. 44, says :

"Everyone commits high treason who, either in the realm or without it, actively assists a public enemy at war with the King."

D A valuable opinion to the same effect was given in the year 1775. The case was exactly this case. The treason was not committed within the King's realm; it was committed elsewhere. There is no pretence that the person who committed it by being adherent, or whatever form the treason took, was within the King's realm. It is a distinct statement which covers this case exactly, and is the opinion of two such law officers as LORD THURLOW and LORD LOUGHBOROUGH, absolutely consistent with the opinion which this court is expressing to-day.

E We do not think it necessary to give further reasons for the conclusion to which we have come. We purposely do not rely upon a recent case which has been questioned by counsel for the appellant, because we are of opinion that there is ample authority for the conclusion to which the court came in that case, ample authority to be found in the decisions and in the opinions of great lawyers which have already been referred to in giving the judgment of this court. It only remains to say that the appeal is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

BRACKLEY v. MIDLAND RAIL. CO.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Swinfen Eady, Phillimore and Bankes, L.JJ.), May 8, 1916]

[Reported 85 L.J.K.B. 1596; 114 L.T. 1150; 80 J.P. 369; 14 L.G.R. 632]

Bridge—Railway bridge—Dedication to public as highway—Liability of railway company to maintain.

Where a way is dedicated by the owner of the land to the public, the public may accept it as a public way by using it as such, but, if they do, they must take what the grantor gives as he gives it, and cannot require him to keep it in repair or free from obstruction.

Accordingly, where a railway company built over their lines a bridge which they dedicated to the public, and, after a fall of snow ice and lumps of hard snow formed on the steps, rendering them slippery so that the plaintiff, while using the bridge to reach the company's station and go by train, fell and sustained injury,

Held: there was no duty on the company to clean the bridge, and, therefore, they were under no liability to the plaintiff.

Appeal by the defendant railway company from a decision of the Divisional Court (AVORY and LUSH, JJ.) affirming a decision of the learned judge sitting at the Southend County Court, who gave judgment for the plaintiff for £70.

The facts appear from the judgment of SWINFEN EADY, L.J.

Talbot, K.C., and F. Gover for the defendants.

F. L. Hinde for the plaintiff.

May 8, 1916. SWINFEN EADY L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of the Divisional Court, consisting of AVORY, and LUSH, JJ., who disagreed upon an appeal from a county court. The plaintiff brought an action for personal injuries in the

A county court, and recovered judgment for a sum of £70. Upon appeal to the Divisional Court, AVORY, J., thought that the plaintiff should retain her judgment. LUSH, J., was of a different opinion. Upon that the judgment of the court below stood, hence the appeal to this court.

B The action is one for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff, Mrs. Ada Brackley, on crossing a bridge at Leigh-on-Sea. It appears that the defendants, the railway company, in or about the year 1897 erected a footbridge for the purpose of enabling persons to pass from one side of their line to the other. Immediately before the erection of this footbridge there was within a few yards of the place a level crossing open for full carriage traffic, with gates to protect the crossing. The railway company, in addition to the large gates for vehicular traffic, had placed there side wicket gates, which were opened and closed by the company's servants. C The railway company were bound by statute to make and maintain the level crossing, but there was no statutory obligation to maintain the wicket gates. In 1897 they effected some improvements near Leigh station. They widened the level crossing by throwing a substantial part of their land into the public thoroughfare, so as to render the level crossing across the railway substantially wider than it was before, and at the same time the crossing was protected only by the large carriage D gates. There were no wicket gates in the new gates rendered necessary by the widening of the crossing, but the railway company built, a few yards to the west, a footbridge. It passed over their line, and at each end of it communicated with the public highway. There were no gates or any fence, or any protection to prevent the public passing freely over this new footbridge. It was open to the highway at each end, and the public passed over it without let or hindrance. No notice was E ever put up prohibiting the public from so using it; the bridge was never closed; no steps were at any time taken to indicate that it was not intended to be a public footpath, and the defendants in their answers to interrogatories have admitted that the path is a public footway. I think it appears from what took place before the learned county court judge that his view was that the bridge was a public footpath. During the course of the hearing in the county court the question arose whether F the plaintiff challenged the issue that this was a public footpath, and upon the facts we intimated during the hearing of the appeal that we were unanimously of opinion on the case as it stood that this bridge was a public footbridge.

On Jan. 22, 1915, about 2 p.m., the plaintiff with a friend was passing from the north side to the south side over this public footpath intending to travel by the G defendant company's railway. There had been a blizzard on that day. According to the plaintiff's evidence it had snowed up to about one o'clock, and the snow had then ceased. She arrived on the other side of the bridge shortly after two o'clock. On the south side of the bridge there are two flights of steps separated by a landing. The plaintiff had passed down the first flight of steps, had reached the landing, and was passing down the second flight of steps to reach the street, which she would H have to cross in order to get to the station, when she slipped on a mass of frozen snow and ice and sustained a broken ankle. There is no question with regard to the amount of damages. She was awarded in that respect a sum of £70. The account which she herself gave of the conditions of the place was this: "We made our way across the bridge. I went up the steps." That is on the north side. "The steps were in a dirty condition. One of the little girls was on the top [one of her I children]. I began to descend on the other side. The steps were in the same condition as the other side. I told my little girl to be careful as the steps were in such a dirty condition. There was snow and ice on the steps. The snow was in hard lumps on the steps. The steps were covered with it. I stepped on one, . . . The steps were slippery all over. I slipped on ice. I think it was ice. There was no sand or anything sprinkled over it to prevent slipping. I was carrying a cape and muff and umbrella. I put them on my left arm. I did this to get hold of the handrail on the right side. I just got hold of it. I slipped on my left foot, and I fell. I fell over two or three steps. I was between the last [landing place] and the bottom of the steps." Cross-examined, she said: "The gates [that is, the double gates] were closed. I could have waited till gates were open." That refers to the fact that she was going by a train at 2.45, and this was only about two o'clock; the station was near at hand, and she had no need to cross until the gates were open. "The lump was whitish colour, hard and frozen. It had been a blizzard. It wanted great care." In re-examination she said: "I call it ice [the lump on which she slipped]. I had half an hour [before the train departed]. I did see steps were risky and not safe." She noticed what was no doubt sufficiently obvious—namely, what the condition of the steps was.

LUSH, J., summarised the evidence, and counsel for the plaintiff has found fault with the accuracy of his summary of the facts. It seems to me that LUSH, J., summarised the facts quite accurately in this way. He said: "The admitted facts were these. The plaintiff admitted that she knew that there had been a blizzard, that there was snow and ice on the steps (which one of her witnesses described as trodden down and very hard), that the steps were risky and not safe, and that they were the same on both sides of the bridge. She herself warned her children of the risk. On those admissions I think that the learned judge ought to have held that there was no concealed danger, nothing in the nature of a trap." That is the way in which the learned judge summarised the facts, and it seems to me to be a very accurate statement. It was urged by the plaintiff that the bridge was obviously erected by the railway company for their own purposes, to provide a way from the up platform to the down platform or vice versa, or to enable persons to catch a train for which they were late and the large gates were closed. But that is not an inference of fact that can be drawn from any evidence adduced at the trial. It might equally be urged that it was sufficiently obvious that one of the principal reasons why the railway company erected the bridge was that there was here a level crossing in a populous and growing place, and there might have been an agitation for the removal of the level crossing or the substitution of a bridge for the level crossing for foot passengers who had been detained for any considerable time by reason of the gates being shut, and the company erected this foot-bridge and dedicated it to the public, in order to prevent any question arising with regard to the obstruction of the traffic by reason of their level crossing. It seems to me that considerations of that kind are beside the point; they are not material to the present matter. It is not necessary to consider the motive which actuated the railway company in building the bridge. They built the bridge and dedicated it to the public, throwing it open to the public to cross over at their will and pleasure; the public have accepted it and crossed over it as they pleased, and the present position is that there is a public footpath over the bridge in question.

It is well established that where a way is dedicated by the owner of the land to the public, the public must take it as they find it; that is to say the public may or may not accept it by using it as a public way. But, if it is accepted in the sense of being taken advantage of by the public so as to become a public way, they must take what the grantor gives as he gives it. There is a well known passage, which I should like to read, of BLACKBURN, J., when delivering the judgment of the court in Cooper v. Walker (1) (2 B. & S. at p. 780):

"It is, of course, not obligatory on the owner of land to dedicate the use of it as a highway to the public. It is equally clear that it is not compulsory on the public to accept the use of a way when offered to them. If the use of the soil as a way is offered by the owner to the public under given conditions and subject to certain reservations, and the public accept under such circumstances, there can be no injustice in holding them to the terms on which the benefit was conferred. On the other hand, great injustice and hardship would often arise if, when a public right of way has been acquired under a given state of circumstances, the owner of the soil should be held bound to alter that state of circumstances to his own disadvantage and loss, and to make

A further concessions to the public altogether beyond the scope of his original intention. More especially would this be the case when public rights of way have been acquired by mere user. For instance, the owner of the bank of a canal or sewer may, without considering the effect of what he is doing, permit passengers to pass along until the public have acquired a right of way there. It is often hard upon him that the public right should have been thus acquired; B it would be doubly so if the consequence were that he was bound to fill up or fence off his canal."

In the present case, assuming that this is a public highway, I see no obligation upon the defendant railway company to cleanse the bridge, or to repair it, or to clear the snow away. But supposing there was a duty upon the company, a duty C first towards the public, and, secondly, towards, not necessarily the public as such, but towards those persons who were passing across the bridge intending to travel by the train, what duty was it that they owed? It cannot be put higher than that the railway company must be taken to have invited intending passengers to approach their station on the south side of the way by means of this public foot-path, and, therefore, owed to those intending passengers, of whom the plaintiff was one, the duty of an invitor to an invitee. That, shortly stated, is as it is dealt D with in Indermaur v. Dames (2). To such a case as that the language of LORD ATKINSON in Cavalier v. Pope (3) is applicable. He said ([1906] A.C. at p. 432):

"It is, I think, clear that the case does not come within the principle of Indermaur v. Dames (2) and the cases which followed it down to Earl v. Lubbock (4), because one of the essential facts necessary to bring a case within E that principle is that the injured person must not have had knowledge or notice of the existence of the danger through which he has suffered. If he knows of the danger and runs the risks he has no cause of action."

Here, assuming that it was the duty of the railway company to bring to the notice of a person intending to travel the existence of an unusual or unexpected danger, F this was a risk of which the plaintiff was aware. She saw the state of the steps; she warned her little girl; she prepared herself; the conditions on the one side were the same as on the other, and she put her muff and cape and various things on her left arm and took hold of the rail by her right hand, so that she might steady herself in going down, and she had already warned her children with regard to them. [But see now the Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, s. 2 (2) (37 HALSBURY'S STATUTES G (2nd Edn.) 834) which, in place of the common law rules relating to invitor, invitee, &c., places on an occupier of premises a duty "to take such care as in all the circumstances of the case is reasonable to see that the visitor will be reasonably safe in using the premises for the purposes for which he is invited or permitted by the occupier to be there."]

Then it is said that the present case cannot be distinguished from Osborne v. H London and North Western Rail. Co. (5), which was relied upon by the county court judge. That was the case of a passenger who intended to take a train at Perry Barr, and he slipped going down the steps to the station. They were stone steps, out of repair, there was ice and snow upon them, and in consequence they were slippery. At the trial the learned county court judge came to the conclusion

I "that the accident was primarily caused by the worn and defective state of the steps, which was aggravated by the frosty weather, which made them slippery in addition, that the steps had not been properly and efficiently swept and cleansed from the caked snow, which, added to the worn condition of the steps, caused the plaintiff to fall, and that there was no contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff."

The defendants contended in the Divisional Court that, notwithstanding that the county court judge had found negligence on the part of the defendants and no contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, still the railway company were entitled to judgment, and it was in such a state of things as that that WILLS, J., in his judgment, said:

"It seems to me to follow that in such a case as the present, where the existence of negligence on the part of the defendants and the absence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff are specifically found as matters of fact, if the defendants desire to succeed on the ground that the maxim volenti non fit injuria is applicable, they must obtain a finding of fact 'that the plaintiff freely and voluntarily, with full knowledge of the nature and extent of the risk he ran, impliedly agreed to incur it.' I agree with Mr. Wills that this is a question of fact, and this being so, it follows that the defendants could not succeed unless either they had a finding of fact in their favour or we had all the facts before us, so that we were in a position to decide the question. . . . In order to succeed the defendants should have gone further in cross-examination, for, unless the question of fact had been found in their favour, the application of the maxim on which they relied could not be established. The county court judge has not found the fact the defendants need; and upon the present materials I am certainly not prepared to supply the deficiency."

When the case is regarded from that point of view, it is wholly different from the case now before us. In my opinion, the plaintiff has failed to establish any cause of action against the defendant company, and under those circumstances I am of opinion that the judgment ought to be entered for the defendants.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—I agree. This bridge had become a highway, and was none the less a highway because it was a convenient access for intending passengers who wished to go to the station on one side or other of the line to arrive at that station from the opposite side. What the purpose was for which it was originally intended seems to me to be quite unimportant. In all probability, however, it was erected for a double, if not a treble, purpose. It was erected to facilitate the access to the opposite side of the station of people living in the town. It was probably also erected to facilitate the passage across the railway from one side of the town to the other, and to take away some of the objections which might be raised, as the town grew more populous, to the existence of a level crossing. I think it likely that some consideration was also given to its usefulness as a means of transit on some occasion to the railway company's own servants from one side of the line to the other. The objects of its erection are unimportant. It had become a highway. It was also a convenient access, and it was used by the plaintiff on this occasion, not as a member of the public, but as a convenient access to the side of the railway where the station lay to which she wished to go.

What was the duty of the railway company with regard to keeping this bridge in repair? The answer is: There was none. The man who dedicates a highway to the public has no duty to keep that highway in repair, even although since the Highway Act, 1835, there is nobody who really has to keep it in repair. The public must take it as it finds it, and if nobody will undertake the repair, ultimately it will fall out of repair and the dedication will become valueless. That cannot be helped. Was there any duty on the company to repair it as an access to their station? None, because they might cut it off the next day and say: "We will not let you go this way at all." They were not bound to provide this access; they were not bound to maintain it.

But there is a further point we must consider, which was much relied upon by AVORY, J., in the court below, and, perhaps, by the county court judge. I would like to state that point in this way. As a rule there is no duty upon the occupier of business premises who invites customers to come to his premises to warn them of any peril of the highway. They must take their own chance about like other

A members of the public. But it may be, and I am prepared to decide this case on the assumption that it may be, that a portion of the highway is so singularly and solely an approach to the business premises that the duty of warning which arises where there is a hidden danger on the premises may be extended to a duty to warn them of a hidden danger on the access being approached which is not on the business premises. I think that Bede Steamship Co. v. River Weir Co. (6) may B be an instance of this, the case being one where a portion of the sea, all of which is a highway, was the immediate access to a dock. I will assume that this is the law, and that this bridge with its steps, although a highway, was yet so much an approach or access to the railway station that intending passengers, not the ordinary public, but intending passengers, were entitled to a warning against hidden perils, such a warning as any business man must give to the customers he invites. Our C decision in Norman v. Great Western Rail. Co. (7) had the effect that there is no greater duty on a railway company in this respect than on any other business person. Then was this lady entitled to a warning against any hidden danger?
Was there here any hidden danger? I think that there was no hidden danger here;
therefore, no duty to warn; and, therefore, no breach of duty by the railway company. On this ground I think that the railway company is entitled to succeed. I D will only add that Oshorne v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (5) is clearly distinguishable upon the grounds stated by SWINFEN EADY, L.J.

BANKES, L.J.—In this case the court is bound by the findings of the learned county court judge on any question of fact, and among other questions before him was whether or not this bridge was a highway. I think it must be taken that the E learned judge did find that this bridge was a highway, and there was clearly evidence upon which he could find that. The learned judge also found that this bridge formed part of the railway accommodation. If it were necessary to come to a decision on that point, I am not at all sure that there was evidence to support that finding, but it is not necessary to come to any decision upon that part of the case. It has been strenuously contended before us that because this footbridge was a public F highway the railway company could be under no duty whatever to any person passing over it, whether he was an intending passenger or not. LUSH, J., and AVORY, J., took a different view of the law applicable to such a case. LUSH, J., said that, in the peculiar circumstances of this case, he considered that the footbridge was a highway and something else. That seems to me to raise a very important G question, upon which again it is not necessary to come to any conclusion, and I do not propose to express any opinion about it, for I am prepared to deal with this case upon the assumption, without deciding it, that there was an invitation by the railway company to the plaintiff to use this footbridge as an access to the platform to which she desired to go. Under those circumstances, what was the duty of the railway company to the plaintiff? A great many expressions have been used in H different cases with regard to that duty, but I cannot help thinking that the way in which the duty was expressed in Norman v. Great Western Rail. Co. (7) and in Cavalier v. Pope (3) is the best and the simplest way to regard that duty—that is, that the duty which arises out of the relationship of an invitor and an invitee is a duty in respect of any danger which was known to the defendants or ought to have been known to the defendants and of which the plaintiff had either no
I knowledge or notice [see now s. 2 of Occupiers' Liability Act, 1957, noted supra].
If that is a correct statement of the law, it follows that in any case when the proper conclusion upon the evidence is either that the defendants did not know or ought not to have known the danger, or that the plaintiff did not know or had notice of the danger, the defendants' duty is not established, and the duty not being established, no question can arise of any breach of their duty, and no question will arise as to any necessity for a defence on the part of the defendants arising out of contributory negligence or otherwise. In the present case the conclusion to which I come upon the evidence is that, whatever the position might be with regard to the defendants' knowledge of the condition of the bridge, or whether, if they did not know, they ought to have known of its condition, the plaintiff knew fully and completely the condition of these steps. Under those circumstances she failed to establish the duty which arises in the case of herself and the railway company, she being the invitee and the railway company being the invitor.

Agent—Commission agent—Contract for indefinite time—Termination—Agent's right to notice—"Repeat" orders received after contract terminated from customers previously introduced by agent—Liability to pay commission on repeat orders—Measure of damages.

The plaintiff while travelling about the country for his own business obtained orders for other traders on commission. By a letter dated May 5, 1915, and written by the defendant to the plaintiff the defendant stated: "I agree to pay you half profits on receipt of orders (provided the customer is good) . . . Same applies to repeats on any accounts introduced by you." The plaintiff obtained orders for the defendant, but disputes arose between the parties, and, on Mar. 7, 1916, without giving the plaintiff notice, the defendant terminated the agreement and repudiated liability to make any payment to the plaintiff in respect of repeat orders from customers introduced by the plaintiff received by the defendant after that date.

Held: (i) since the plaintiff was not in the employment of the defendant, in the sense that he was not his servant, he was not entitled to notice of termination of the agreement and could not recover damages for wrongful dismissal: Joynson v. Hunt (1) (1905), 93 L.T. 470, applied; (ii) on the true construction of the agreement, the plaintiff was entitled to commission on all orders received by the defendant after termination of the agreement from customers introduced by the plaintiff during the subsistence of the agreement, and, accordingly, the defendant was in breach of contract for which the plaintiff was entitled to damages: Bilbee v. Hasse & Co. (2) (1889), 5 T.L.R. 677, applied; Faulkner v. Cooper & Co., Ltd. (3) (1899), 4 Com. Cas. 213, applied as to the measure of damages.

The plaintiff carried on various businesses of his own, and also obtained orders for other traders on terms of commission. The defendant, Shirley Goldhill, traded as Goldhill & Co., in sponges, brushes, and hardware. In May, 1915, it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that the plaintiff should travel and obtain orders for the defendant, and on May 5, 1915, the defendant wrote the following letter to the plaintiff: "Dear Sir,—I agree to pay you half profits on receipt of orders (provided the customer is good)." Then there was a list of various articles with the prices attached to them, and a note against them: "These are our cost prices, and profits are based upon these terms," and the letter concluded as follows: "Same applies to repeats on any accounts introduced by you.—Yours truly, SHIRLEY GOLDHILL." The plaintiff obtained and transmitted orders to the defendant under this agreement. Subsequently disputes arose between the parties, and on Mar. 7, 1916, the defendant wrote to the plaintiff a letter determining the contract.

G

The plaintiff contended that it was an implied term of the contract that, after the determination thereof, the defendant should continue to pay to the plaintiff commissions on all repeat orders received from customers introduced by him to the defendant, and also that he was entitled to reasonable notice of the determination of the contract, and, therefore, to damages for wrongful dismissal. In this action the plaintiff claimed to have an account taken of the profits made by the defendant on all orders and repeat orders given to the defendant by customers introduced by the plaintiff, and of the commission payable to him in respect thereof.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 25, 1917. PETERSON, J., having stated the facts and referred to the letter of May 5, 1915, continued: The meaning of that document is this, as I understand it: "You are to be entitled to half the profits ascertained in the manner stated in the document, but, of course, if there are no profits at all, the result would be that you would not be entitled to any commission." I think that involves this, that it must be open to the defendant to accept or refuse any particular order that is presented. The agreement is that half the profits shall be ascertained in the way which is specified in the document, and shall be paid on receipt of the orders.

provided the customer is good—that is to say, provided the customer is recommended to be a person of credit. Then there comes at the end of the decision a sentence which has raised one of the questions in this case: “The same applies to repeats on any accounts introduced by you.” That appears to me to be equivalent to a provision that the plaintiff is to be entitled to one-half of the profits derived from any repeat orders given by customers who have been introduced by him. The question is whether that agreement extends to orders by customers introduced by the plaintiff given after the termination of the relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant.

Now, the agreement is not for a definite period. It is for an indefinite term. There are various cases to which my attention has been directed. The chief of them is one which went to the Court of Appeal, Bilbee v. Hassa & Co. (2). The plaintiff in that case had a very large connection in London and the home counties, and the defendants gave the plaintiff a letter which contained this provision:

“As regards your commission, we hereby agree to allow you 1½ per cent. upon all orders executed by us and paid for by the customers arising from your introduction.”

There the agreement was also for an indefinite period. There was a quarrel, the relationship was determined, and the action was tried by LOPES, L.J., who was sitting on this occasion in the Queen’s Bench Division as a judge of first instance. LOPES, L.J., in giving judgment said (5 T.L.R. at p. 678):

“It was contended by the plaintiff that the true construction of the agreement was that he was to receive commission in respect of all orders executed by the defendants and paid for by their customers arising from his introduction, not only during the time he was in their employment, but afterwards. The defendants, on the other hand, said that this agreement only applied to the time he was in their employment, and that as soon as that employment was terminated they were no longer liable to pay commissions, even although the orders arose from the introduction of the plaintiff. He thought the view the plaintiff put upon it was the correct one. He was impressed at first by the view that when the agreement terminated it would be a hardship for the defendants to have to account to the plaintiff. Mr. Finlay had said, however, that no such hardship existed, because they were not obliged to execute those orders which arose from his introduction. That suggestion was weighty and cogent, and in the result he had come to the conclusion that the plaintiff was entitled to commission, provided the order arose from his introduction, although the employment had terminated.”

That case went to the Court of Appeal, and the decision was confirmed. As BOWEN, L.J., put it:

“The measure of his [that is, the plaintiff’s] payment was to be calculated, not by the work done by him, but by the fruits of that work, and those fruits might very well accrue to the defendants after the determination of the agency.”

There is a case that came before MATHEW, J. (Salomon v. Brownfield and Brownfield Guild Pottery Society, Ltd. (4)). There the agreement was of a somewhat similar nature. The plaintiff was to travel for the defendants in Australia on terms that he was to get

“7½ per cent. upon the net amount of cash in payment of goods, orders for which were obtained through him, also 7½ per cent. upon all orders from customers introduced by him, on payment being made by them, whether such orders were obtained through the plaintiff’s representation or not.”

MATHEW, J., said

“No period was put to the duration of the contract, the reason being that payment should be made upon all orders received from customers introduced

A by the plaintiff. It was said the contract was only to last a reasonable time or until it was ended by a reasonable notice. He saw no reason to import that into the contract. It was open to the defendants to cease to deal with the customers introduced."

Accordingly he gave judgment for the plaintiff. Faulkner v. Cooper & Co., Ltd. (3) was a similar case in which COLLINS and MATHEW, JJ., arrived at a similar conclusion. In Wilson v. Harper (5) a similar result was reached, but the agreement in that case was clearer and more definite in its terms.

For the defendant three cases were cited. One was Morris v. Hunt & Co. (6), which came before COLLINS, J., with a common jury. I cannot, however, derive any assistance from it. There was a contract by which the defendants stated that they should be pleased to allow the plaintiff five per cent. discount on all orders received from the firms named—that is to say, in a list which the defendants inclosed for the purposes of the plaintiff's work—"and on any fresh ones you can introduce. You will keep a record of your calls and send us particulars from time to time, for which purpose we send you a manifold book." The relations between the parties were severed, and litigation ensued. The learned judge, according to the report, held in the first instance that "with regard to new customers introduced by the plaintiff the case was governed by the case in the Court of Appeal"—that is to say, Bilbee v. Hasse & Co. (2). At a later stage he appears to have left the following questions to the jury: "(1) Was it an implied term of the contract that the plaintiff's right to commission should continue after his dismissal in respect of all orders accepted by the defendants from customers from whom he had obtained orders before his dismissal (a) from persons not named in the original list"—that means all customers introduced by the plaintiff himself—" (b) from persons named therein"—that is to say, from customers whose names were supplied by the defendants? The jury answered the questions in the negative, and, accordingly, judgment was given on their finding in favour of the defendants. The result, therefore, is simply this, that, whether rightly or wrongly, it was left to the jury to determine whether there was in the contract an implied term under which the plaintiff was entitled to commission on orders given, after his dismissal, by customers previously introduced by him, and the jury took the view that there was not. Barrett v. Gilmour & Co. (7) is, owing to the extraordinary brevity of the judgment, as reported (6 Com. Cas. 72), somewhat difficult to understand. In that case there was the following offer to the plaintiff, which was accepted by him:

G "We hereby offer you our representation in the towns in margin of this note on the following terms—viz.: 1. Commission at the rate of four per cent. on all business done either through your own sheets, spot sales, or letter orders. 2. No commission to be paid on bad debts."

Then the relations between the parties came to an end and litigation followed, and, the plaintiff claimed

H "a declaration that he was entitled to be paid by the defendants commission on all orders which they should thereafter receive from customers in the towns specified who were customers between April, 1896 and December, 1899, or, alternatively, who were customers introduced by the plaintiff";

I and he asked also for damages for breach of contract and illegal dismissal. Witnesses were called as to the length of notice which should be given in the case of a traveller; and PHILLIMORE, J., held that on the evidence the agreement could be terminated by notice, and that the notice given was a sufficient notice. Then the learned judge went on, and disposed of the rest of the case in one sentence (ibid. at p. 73):

"The plaintiff is not entitled to the declaration asked for, because by the terms of the agreement the commission is payable, not on customers, but on custom."

I have difficulty in understanding exactly what the learned judge meant; but it may be that the view which he took was that commission under the agreement was payable on all business done either through the plaintiff's own sheets, spot sales, or letter orders, and that that amounted to a provision that commission was to be payable on all business done by the plaintiff in any of these three ways, and that, consequently, orders which came in from customers introduced by the plaintiff after the termination of the relationship were not included.

There is only one other case, Weare v. Brimsdown Lead Co., Ltd. (8). There the plaintiff was employed by the defendants for twelve months as agent for the sale of white lead manufactured by them upon the terms that he was to receive 2½ per cent. commission upon all sales, direct or indirect. The agreement was entered into in August, 1899, and after the expiration of twelve months the plaintiff remained in the defendants' service upon the same terms, so far as they were applicable. AVORY, J., with whom PHILLIMORE, J., agreed, said:

"I think the question in this case is simply whether the parties contracted either that the plaintiff should be employed for all time or that he should be paid commission after he had left the defendants' service on orders given by customers previously introduced by him. The authorities which have been cited may all be reconciled in this way; in some of them the court has construed the contract as implying a term that the plaintiff is to be employed for all time, or as implying a term that the plaintiff is to be paid commission after he has left his service. Applying that test to this case, I can find nothing in the terms of this contract importing either that the plaintiff was to be employed for all time, or that he was to be paid commission on orders given by customers after he had left the defendants' service."

In that case the agreement of employment was for a fixed term, and the learned judge came to the conclusion that the remuneration was only payable to the plaintiff in respect of orders obtained during the term of the employment.

The question in this case is one of construction, and I have come to the conclusion that under his agreement the plaintiff is entitled to commission on orders whenever received, if they come from customers who have been introduced by the plaintiff. Now, that being so, the only question is as to the exact form of relief. There has been a repudiation by the defendant of his obligation to pay in respect of repeat orders; accordingly there has been a breach of the contract, and, as was held by MATHEW, J., damages can be obtained for the breach of the contract. In Faulkner v. Cooper & Co., Ltd. (3), which was a similar case, MATHEW, J., held that the plaintiff was entitled to damages for breach of contract. He then proceeded to state what the measure of damages was in the following terms (4 Com. Cas. at p. 215):

"The question in this case must therefore, in my opinion, be treated solely as a question as to what sum is to be paid to the plaintiff by the defendant company as damages for the breach of contract. In deciding that question, I have to consider what amount of commission would have been earned by the plaintiff if the relations between him and the defendant company had not been broken off, and, in arriving at a conclusion upon that point, I must take into account the chances of human life, the vicissitudes of trade, the probability of the plaintiff's customers ceasing to deal with the defendant company, and various other considerations."

It appears to me that all those considerations, with one exception, ought to be taken into account in ascertaining the amount of damages. The exception is this. As the result of my judgment, the relationship between the plaintiff and the defendant has been properly determined, and the plaintiff is not entitled to commission on fresh customers whom he now seeks to introduce; and therefore it appears to me that it is impossible to say in the present case that any person who assesses the damages payable by the defendant ought to consider what amount

A of commission would have been earned by the plaintiff if the relations between him and the defendant had not been broken off, because that would necessarily let in the possibility of the plaintiff introducing fresh customers. What was to be ascertained is the present value of the probability or the possibility of the defendant receiving orders in the future from customers who were introduced by the plaintiff before the relations between him and the defendant were terminated.

B Part of the plaintiff's claim in the present action is for damages for wrongful dismissal, on the ground that he was entitled to reasonable notice. It was not attempted to prove a custom of the trade, but it was said the plaintiff was entitled to reasonable notice. Now, in this case there was, in my opinion, no employment in the strict sense of the term. The plaintiff was not the servant in any way of the defendant; he was not bound to do any work whatever. The agreement merely
C provided that if the plaintiff introduced customers, and if the orders were accepted by the defendant, then the plaintiff should be entitled to half of any profits which were derived from those orders. There was no obligation on the part of the plaintiff to do work for the defendant, nor was there any obligation on the part of the defendant to provide work for the plaintiff, but there was merely a provision that the defendant would, in a certain event, pay certain remuneration to the plaintiff.
D In those circumstances Joynson v. Hunt & Son (1) appears to me to be very much in point. That was a case which came before the Court of Appeal. The defendants wrote a letter to the plaintiff in these terms:

E "In reply to your favour, I beg to say we will give you the 2½ per cent. commission on all business you do for us in London, whether you send the buyers to buy or orders come through the post, or you take them and send them direct. You let us know to whom you show our samples, and, if business results from the transaction, we will forward your commission quarterly as you suggest. This refers to orders executed."

The question in that case was whether the plaintiff was entitled to notice. The plaintiff tendered the evidence of witnesses to prove that there was a custom in the glove trade that six months' notice must be given to terminate the agency of a
F commission agent. The learned judge held that the defendants were entitled to terminate the agency without notice, and rejected the evidence of the alleged custom. The plaintiff appealed, and the Court of Appeal held the learned judge was right in rejecting the evidence as to custom, on the ground that the custom would be inconsistent with the terms of the written agreement. COLLINS, M.R.,
G said this (93 L.T. at p. 471):

H "Having examined carefully the terms of this particular contract, I have come to the conclusion that the learned judge was right in excluding evidence of the alleged custom. I think that the pleading in the statement of claim is somewhat misleading, inasmuch as it suggests an agreement between principal and agent to employ the agent, and sets up a custom in that employment. It seems to me to allege an employment of the plaintiff by the defendants as their agent, carrying with it the usual incidents of that employment. Then the defence set out the exact terms of the bargain, which are admitted. It seems to me that those terms exclude the essential factor of employment by the defendants of the plaintiff as their agent as part of the agreement. Those terms are contained in a letter from the defendants to the plaintiff as follows [then he reads the letter]: Now that letter, it seems to me, does not import any requirement by the principal to the agent to do anything, or any undertaking that the agent shall be employed or that the agent shall do anything to obtain orders. It is contended that by custom this arrangement cannot be terminated except by notice. It seems to me that would be inconsistent with the terms of the
I express agreement. The written agreement excludes any employment by the defendants of the plaintiff, and any obligation on the plaintiff to do any work at all. An implied term as to notice would be quite inconsistent, the terms of the express contract being such as to negative any added obligation to give notice to terminate the arrangement. The letter only expresses willingness to pay a certain commission if the defendants choose to accept any orders which the plaintiff may choose to obtain for them."

ROMER and MATHEW, L.J.J., came to the same view. There are earlier cases to the same effect—namely, Alexander v. Davis & Co. (9), Henry v. Lawson (10), and Motion v. Michaud (11). In my opinion, therefore, on this part of the case the plaintiff is wrong as he was not entitled to any notice whatever. There was no case of employment of the plaintiff, and therefore no wrongful dismissal.

HOLLIDAY v. LOCKWOOD

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Astbury, J.), April 26, 27, 30, May 1, 1917]

61 Sol. Jo. 525]

Sale of Land—Sale by lots—Purchase at auction of two lots by separate contracts—Rescission as to one lot for innocent misrepresentation by vendor—Right of purchaser to rescind as to other lot—Interdependence of contracts. Specific Performance—Refusal of decree—Discretion of court—Exercise according to equitable rules.

Where a purchaser acquires two lots by separate contracts at an auction and there is rescission as to one lot for innocent misrepresentation on the part of the vendor, the purchaser is entitled to rescind the purchase of the other lot if, to the knowledge of both the purchaser and the vendor, the two contracts were interdependent. The mere fact that one lot is contiguous to the other or that the purchaser in his own mind acquired the two lots with the intention of occupying them together or to enhance the value of one lot by the acquisition of the other is not sufficient to make the contracts interdependent.

Casamajor v. Strodé (1) (1834), 2 My. & K. 706 and Dykes v. Blake (2) (1838), 4 Bing. N.C. 463, explained and applied.

At a sale by auction of the vendor's estate lot 2 was described in the particulars of sale as a farm and lot 3 as a sporting estate. The two lots adjoined each other and the boundary of lot 2 intersected parts of lot 3. Before the sale the auctioneer told the purchaser, in accordance with a statement made to him by the vendor, that the bag of grouse on lot 3 was about 100 brace. The auctioneer also told the purchaser that he would be wise to buy lot 2 if he was purchasing lot 3 for sporting purposes. The sale took place on July 18, 1916, when the purchaser bought lot 2 and lot 3 by separate contracts. Later, owing to an innocent misrepresentation by the vendor as to the bag of grouse on lot 3, the sale of that lot was rescinded by the vendor and the purchaser's deposit on the lot returned. The purchaser now claimed to rescind the purchase of lot 2, but the vendor contended that the transactions regarding the two lots were independent transactions and he counterclaimed for specific performance of the contract to purchase lot 2.

Held: (i) in the circumstances of the case the purchases of lot 2 and lot 3 were not sufficiently commingled as to make them interdependent transactions since the statement of the auctioneer as to the wisdom of buying lot 2 with lot 3 was a mere expression of opinion which did not enable the purchaser to say

A that the enjoyment of either lot depended on the other; accordingly, the purchaser could not rescind his contract to purchase lot 2; (ii) the court would exercise its discretion to grant or refuse a decree of specific performance according to equitable rules, and in the present case would refuse specific performance of the contract to purchase lot 2 since it was probable that the innocent misrepresentation as to lot 3 had induced the purchaser to buy lot 2 and there was no evidence that damage would be suffered by the vendor.

Witness Action.

In July, 1916, the defendant advertised his estate near Huddersfield for sale by auction in three lots. Of the two material to this action lot 2 was described as a farm, with farmhouse and buildings, and as being of about 91 acres. Lot 3, which comprised over 191 acres, was chiefly moorland, with a shooting box, and was described in the particulars as a sporting estate. These two lots adjoined each other for practically their entire length, being only separated by a narrow roadway. Prior to the sale the plaintiff called upon the auctioneer and inquired as to the sporting possibilities of lot 3. He was told that the yearly bag of grouse was about 100 brace. The defendant had in fact made this statement to the auctioneer, but had forgotten that this total included birds shot upon an adjoining piece of moor subsequently leased to the Territorial Association, and also a few birds shot upon lots 1 and 2. On July 18 the sale took place, and the plaintiff purchased lot 2 for £22,000, the auctioneer having stated that birds had been shot upon it. When lot 3 was put up, the auctioneer repeated the statement that the average bag of grouse was about 100, and the lot was knocked down to the plaintiff for £3,000. Next day the plaintiff visited the property for the first time, and discovered that the statement as to the bag of grouse obtainable was incorrect; upon which he wrote to the defendant, who replied regretting the error, rescinding the purchase of lot 3. and returning the deposit paid.

The plaintiff claimed to rescind the purchase of lot 2 and for the return of his deposit. The defendant contended that the two lots formed separate and independent contracts, and counterclaimed for specific performance of the agreement to purchase lot 2. In his evidence the plaintiff stated that he had intended to purchase lot 2 in order that he might enjoy the occupation of it while shooting over lot 3, using the farmhouse as a residence. He alleged that in his interview with the auctioneer prior to the sale he had made this fact known, and that the auctioneer had told him that birds were also shot upon lot 2, and that a purchaser of lot 3 for sporting purposes should also buy lot 2. The auctioneer stated that he was unwilling to deny the statements of the plaintiff, but he did not remember stating the latter fact, and, so far as he could recollect, had not looked upon the plaintiff as a likely buyer of lot 2 at all.

Micklem, K.C., and W. A. Peck for the defendant.

ASTBURY, J., stated the facts, and continued: The plaintiff claims to rescind the purchase of lot 2, on the ground that lots 2 and 3 are so complicated together, as stated in a large number of old authorities, as to form in fact only one contract. Curiously enough, the authority on this point is contained in a number of cases bordering on antiquity. Practically the whole of these authorities, with the exception of Dykes v. Blake (2), are referred to by LORD BROUGHAM in Casamajor v. Strode (1). In that case the purchaser bought lots 25 and 30, and, the vendor being unable to make title to one, the purchaser refused the other. LORD BROUGHAM, after stating that the matter could not be disposed of on the motion before him, said (2 My. & K. at p. 724):

"LORD KENYON is reported to have held at nisi prius that where a party purchases several distinct lots at a sale, . . . and a title to one of the lots cannot be made, the purchaser is at liberty to repudiate the whole, so that he shall be loose as to the other lots, while the seller is fast; and this upon the supposition that the whole contract is necessarily entire; Chambers v. Griffiths (3). That this is not a sound doctrine at law any more than in equity, I hold to be very clear. LORD ELDON is said to have expressed a similar opinion in Drew v. Hanson (4), but if so, it has escaped the reporter."

Then he says (ibid. at p. 730):

"It may therefore be concluded, that in determining whether a purchaser who fails to obtain a good title to one lot, shall be let off from his contract for another, the whole circumstances may be examined in order to prove that the two contracts are one, by showing that the two parcels are complicated together, and that upon the whole transaction the court will determine as a jury would, the question did or did not the party purchase the one with reference to the other; would he or would he not have taken the one, had he not reckoned upon also having the other."

In my view, having given the best attention I can to the case, the mere fact that one lot is contiguous to the other, or that the purchaser in his own mind had formed an intention to buy the two lots for his own convenience in occupying them both together, is not sufficient to complicate the two lots within the meaning of the old authorities. Of course, if the parties agreed to treat the two lots as one it might be different, or if, by reason of situation or description or circumstances known to both parties, a court is able to draw the inference that one transaction is dependent on the other, then there is such a complication as to make one contract rather than two. But if not, then the summing up of LORD BROUGHAM must mean, I think, that the two contracts, within the knowledge of both parties, are one in the sense that there is an interdependence between the lots. I think

- A he must have intended to refer to circumstances in which there was enough to make the two lots complicated, and not merely so by the motives of one party. In Dykes v. Blake (2), which in some respects is the nearest authority to the present case, the plaintiff purchased lots 12 and 13, intending to enhance the building value of 13 by doing away with a right of way, and the question was whether he was entitled to rescind the purchase of 12 through a misdescription in regard to 13.
- B TINDAL, C.J., said (4 Bing. N.C. at p. 477):

C "although it has been argued that the objection can apply at most to lot 13, and that the purchaser of lot 12 can have no right to rescind that purchase by reason of the misdescription in the lot 13, we answer that in this case the seller has been contented to treat the two purchases as one contract, by entering into one agreement for the sale of both at once at the aggregate price; and secondly, that the purchaser of lot 12, upon the facts of this case, may be reasonably understood to have purchased lot 12 in order that he might, by unity of seisin, extinguish the right of way over lot 13, and thereby render lot 13 more valuable as building ground."

D Now, the question arises whether TINDAL, C.J., intended to define two grounds for rescission, or whether he was describing a composite objection. On the whole, I think the latter is a rather better construction. If, on the other hand, the court defined a second and independent ground upon which relief might be granted, then it is very like the present case. If this be the true construction, it seems to me that the principle underlying it requires careful consideration, and possibly it goes beyond LORD BROUGHAM's view in Casamajor v. Strode (1). It is, in my

E opinion, quite clear that a mere determination or motive on the part of the purchaser that he will buy one lot in order to enhance the value of another is not enough to complicate the purchases within the meaning of the authorities. It may be that the second ground was intended to be limited to a case where the court could infer that, in regard to the representations and descriptions of the property

F given by the vendor, an ordinary and not very particular purchaser would be led to the view that to enjoy one lot for the purpose for which it was sold it was desirable to purchase the other. In other words, if you can find that the lots are complicated through the description or misdescription of the vendor, then the contract can be regarded as one within the meaning of Casamajor v. Strode (1).

G There is no doubt that at a sale by auction there is, unless the case comes within the exceptions, a distinct transaction in respect of each lot. This may be important, both as to the question of rescission and of a claim for specific performance. If the properties are not complicated by reason of facts known to both parties, then the right to rescission does not arise. If, on the other hand, the purchaser's decision to buy one lot in order to enjoy another has arisen through the representations of the vendor, though only as to one lot, then, in my view, it may be a defence

H to an action for specific performance. In the ordinary way the motive of contract is irrelevant unless expressed or assented to by the other party. As was said in Tamplin v. James (5), there is no injustice in holding a man to a contract which specifically describes the property sold in a way not calculated to mislead. Now, before I pass to apply as best I can the law in this case, I desire to refer to the way

I the authorities are treated by certain authors. In SUGDEN ON VENDORS AND PURCHASERS (14th Edn.) p. 319, it is stated:

"When an estate is sold by auction, or by the court, in lots, and the vendor has not a title to all the lots sold, equity will compel the purchaser to take the lot to which a title can be made, if they are not complicated with the rest, and will allow him a compensation pro tanto."

In FRY ON SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (5th Edn.) p. 404, the authority of Dykes v. Blake (2) is referred to, and the author says:

"After some vacillation in the older cases, it has been decided at common law that where property is sold in distinct lots there is a separate contract for each lot, each buyers having a complete right of action after he is declared the purchaser of each lot. And in equity the same is prima facie the case, so that, in the absence of special circumstances, a vendor is entitled to compel the purchaser of two lots to complete his purchase of the one, though he may fail in making out a title to the other. But where from the nature of the contract, or the property that is the subject of it, or upon matters known to both parties, one of them can prove that the one transaction was dependent on the other, the two form one contract, although there may be no express statement to that effect."

On the whole, my own leaning is to approve the way the matter is put by FRY rather than by STUBBS. That being so, the question I have to decide is—Were these lots so complicated, by circumstances known to both parties, and so interdependent as to justify the court in rescinding the purchase of lot 2 because lot 3 has gone? In the first place, as far as the particulars of sale are concerned, there is no ground for so holding. The one is described as a farm, the other as a sporting estate. Nor is the fact that the properties are contiguous, and that the boundary of lot 2 intersects portions of lot 3, sufficient to "complicate" within the meaning of the authorities. But it is contended that by what took place between the plaintiff and the auctioneer a sufficient complication was recognised by the vendor's agent, and that the plaintiff was induced to form the opinion he did by the auctioneer's statement. It is not at all clear that, apart from the representations as to the shooting, the plaintiff would have bid for either lot, and he may have been induced, on the whole, by the innocent misrepresentation as to lot 3. It may be true that the auctioneer said that the lots were contiguous, that there was shooting on both lots, and that the purchaser of lot 3 should also buy lot 2. The first two statements are not very important, as they are sufficiently obvious from the plan, but the difficulty is that the defendant's agent, knowing that the plaintiff desired a shooting estate, may have said that the purchaser of lot 3 should also buy lot 2. It seems to me, however, that, on the whole, there was not sufficient to "complicate" the purchase of the two lots. The statement that the purchaser of lot 3 would be wise in buying lot 2 seems to me a mere expression of opinion by the auctioneer, and does not enable the plaintiff to say that there was a complication of the purchases, and that the enjoyment of either lot depended on the other. It was, in my view, quite clear that shooting on this small moor could be enjoyed without buying lot 2, and the farming on lot 2 could be carried on without lot 3. It was also quite clear that for a gentleman desiring a combined property the purchase of both lots was essential. But I do not think the court ought to attach too much importance to the language used by an auctioneer. I accept both his evidence and the plaintiff's, and I think that in substance I ought to infer that there was a discussion between them about the lots, but more in regard to lot 3 than lot 2, and I think that the auctioneer did express the view that the purchaser of lot 3 would be well advised in buying lot 2. On the whole, however, I am of opinion that there is not a sufficient complication and interdependence between the lots for the plaintiff to succeed, and that he fails in his claim for rescission.

The next matter is the counterclaim for specific performance of the contract to purchase lot 2. In FRY ON SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (5th Edn.) p. 19, the author says:

"There is an observation often made with regard to the jurisdiction in specific performance which remains to be noticed. It is said to be in the discretion of the court. The meaning of this proposition is not that the court may arbitrarily or capriciously perform one contract and refuse to perform another, but that the court has regard to the conduct of the plaintiff and to circumstances outside the contract itself, and that the mere fact of the existence of a valid

A contract is not conclusive in the plaintiff's favour. 'If the defendant,' said PLUMER, V.-C. [in Clowes v. Higginson (6), 1 Ves. & B. at p. 527], 'can show any circumstances dehors, independent of the writing, making it inequitable to interpose for the purpose of a specific performance, a court of equity, having satisfactory information upon that subject, will not interpose'."

B That means, I think, as has been pointed out in many cases, that though a discretion exists it should be exercised according to settled rules. Here, the fact that the purchaser wanted a joint estate for farming and shooting, and that it might be a hardship to make him take one without the other, is not conclusive, but, on the whole, I think that the fairest way is to refuse the claim for specific performance as I have refused the claim for rescission. It is not at all clear that, apart from the representation as to the shooting on lot 3, the plaintiff would have bought either lot. There is no evidence of the defendant having suffered any damage, and, on the whole, I think I will exercise my discretion in favour of the plaintiff, and that justice will best be done by dismissing claim and counterclaim without costs.

C Judgment for the defendant on the claim for rescission without costs; judgment for the plaintiff on the counterclaim for specific performance without costs.

F [PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Horridge, J.), June 29, July 13, 1917]

Contract—Illegality—Public policy—Husband and wife—Pre-marital agreement not to cohabit after marriage—Confirmation of agreement after marriage.

G By an agreement in writing dated Dec. 19, 1913, the parties agreed that it should be lawful at all times for the husband to live separate and apart from the wife and that the wife should not require or endeavour to compel him to live with her. The parties were married on Dec. 20, 1913, and on that date an agreement was indorsed on the document of Dec. 19 by which each party purported to confirm the agreement of Dec. 19. The parties never lived together, and in 1917 the wife petitioned for a decree for restitution of conjugal rights.

H

I Held: the two documents of Dec. 19 and 20 formed an agreement entered into before marriage for future separation, and, as such, were against public policy and void; the second agreement was bad as being merely a confirmation of a void and illegal agreement; and, therefore, the wife was entitled to the decree she sought.

Petition by a wife for restitution of conjugal rights.

The facts appear in the headnote.

B. Welford (for Tristram de la P. Beresford, serving with His Majesty's forces) for the petitioner.

The husband appeared in person.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 13, 1917. HORRIDGE, J.—The wife seeks a decree for restitution of conjugal rights, in answer to which the husband relies on a written agreement drawn up and signed by the parties before the marriage, whereby it was agreed that he and the wife should live apart, and confirmed by them after the marriage. By her reply the wife alleges that the agreement is contrary to public policy, and, therefore, void in law.

HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued: I find as a fact that the confirmatory agreement formed part of, and was in no way distinct from, the agreement signed before the marriage, and that the two documents formed an agreement entered into before marriage for future separation. Such an agreement is void and against public policy, vide Cocksedge v. Cocksedge (1) and the judgment of RIGBY, L.J., in Marlborough v. Marlborough (2), and the judgment of KENNEDY, L.J., in Wilson v. Carnley (3). I, therefore, hold that the plea of the husband is no answer to the petition. If the second agreement is to be treated as a confirmatory agreement, I think it was bad in law as being merely a confirmation of a previous illegal and void agreement. In Brook v. Hook (4) KELLY, C.B., in delivering the judgment of himself, CHANNELL, B., and PIGOTT, B., said (L.R. 6 Exch. at p. 99):

"Although a voidable act may be ratified by matter subsequent, it is otherwise when an act is originally and in its inception void."

For these reasons there must be a decree of restitution of conjugal rights.

Landlord and Tenant—Tree on landlord's land overhanging tenant's land—Poisonous leaves—Death of tenant's mare after eating leaves—Tree overhanging at commencement of tenancy—Liability of landlord.

C

The defendant leased a farm to the plaintiff retaining in his occupation adjacent land on which was a shrubbery containing two yew trees. The branches of the trees overhung the boundary fence so as to be within reach of the plaintiff's horses, and the plaintiff's mare ate of the branches, was poisoned, and died. The yew trees overhung the boundary fence to the same degree at the commencement of the tenancy as when the plaintiff's mare ate of them.

D

Held: the plaintiff took the farm as it existed at the date of the lease, and, as the yew trees were overhanging the boundary at that date so as to be within the reach of horses, the defendant was not liable for the death of the mare.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of the Divisional Court (LORD COLERIDGE and ROWLATTE, JJ., LORD COLERIDGE, J., dissenting), affirming a decision of the county court judge of Gloucestershire, sitting at Cirencester, reported [1917] 2 K.B. 516.

The defendant let to the plaintiff a farm on a yearly tenancy from September, 1914. The defendant retained in his own possession land bordering on one of the fields of the farm, and separated from the farm by a fence. On this land was shrubbery containing yew trees. On Jan. 4, 1917, the plaintiff's mare, being in the plaintiff's field, ate of the branches of the yew trees, which overhung the fence to the extent of 3 ft., was poisoned thereby, and died. The plaintiff's evidence was that he was not aware of the existence of the yew trees, or that they were dangerous to horses. The county court judge, on the authority of the judgment of MELLISH, L.J., in Erskine v. Adeane (1) (8 Ch. App. at p. 761), held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. In the Divisional Court Rowlatt, J., approved the judgment of the county court judge, LORD COLERIDGE, J., dissenting. The judgment of the county court judge therefore stood, and the appeal was dismissed. The Court of Appeal, after considering the evidence given in the county court, assumed the fact that the yew trees overhung the fence substantially to the same degree at the date of the letting and at the date when the plaintiff's mare ate of them. The plaintiff appealed.

Vachell, K.C., A. F. Clements and H. W. Samuel for the plaintiff.

J. B. Matthews, K.C., and Rayner Goddard for the defendant.

PICKFORD, L.J.—This action was brought to recover damages for the death of a mare, which ate of some branches of yew trees which were growing on the defendant's land. The question is whether the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. It is unnecessary to consider many of the arguments put forward. In the Divisional Court the learned judges disagreed, but, as it seems to me, the difference between them was on the view taken on the facts and not of the law. LORD COLERIDGE, J., who thought that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, stated the facts ([1917] 2 K.B. at p. 518) to be that "at the time of the demise the tree, although it overhung the demised premises, was harmless. It could not be reached by cattle or horses, but during the tenancy it grew and came within reach of horses"; and when dealing with Erskine v. Adeane (1) he said (ibid. at p. 520):

"I do not think MELLISH, L.J., meant to say that the tenant when he took the lease was bound to guard himself against dangers other than those existing at the date of the lease; he was not bound to assume that the landlord would omit to do what was proper for him to do, that he would neglect to cut the yew tree and would suffer it to become a danger."

A Therefore the basis of his judgment is that at the time of the demise the tree could not be reached by horses, and that the liability of the defendant arose because he allowed the condition of things, at first harmless, to become harmful. ROWLATT, J., who took another view of the facts, held that the case was governed by the judgment of MELLISH, L.J., in Erskine v. Adcane (1), but he went on to say (ibid. at p. 521):

B "I am not clear how the case would stand if the landlord had on his own land a yew tree which at the time of the demise did not overhang the boundary, but afterwards during the tenancy grew over the boundary. MELLISH, L.J., seems to have contemplated such a case when he spoke of 'negligence in allowing the branches of the yew trees to grow over the hurdles,' and said that a claim would, if maintainable at all, be by personal action. But that case is much stronger than the present. In this case the land was taken with the tree already overhanging it, though no doubt it has grown since."

C I think that if ROWLATT, J., had taken the same view of the facts as COLERIDGE, J., he would probably have come to the same conclusion as that learned judge; and if COLERIDGE, J., had taken the same view of the facts as ROWLATT, J., he would have held the case governed by the judgment of MELLISH, L.J. It becomes therefore D necessary to consider the facts as shown by the evidence.

E The case was argued for the plaintiff on the broad ground that, even though the yew trees overhung the plaintiff's land at the date of the demise, or even, as I understood the argument, overhung it so as to be then accessible to horses on the demised land, the defendant would be liable upon the ground that it was his duty to see that the trees existing at the date of the demise were not harmful to the tenant of the demised land. I do not think that proposition well founded. It is not necessary to go through the authorities. Erskine v. Adcane (1) is sufficient authority against that wide proposition. The first sentence in the headnote does not perhaps represent the facts quite accurately. It states (8 Ch. App. 756):

F "There is no implied warranty on the part of a lessor who lets land for agricultural purposes that no noxious plants are growing on the demised premises."

G That seems to indicate that the trees were growing on the demised premises. The facts were that the tenant took a lease of a farm which contained a plantation. The landlord reserved the plantation, which was therefore not included in the demise. Yew trees were growing in the plantation, and the branches extended over the land demised so as to be within reach of the cattle on that land. The trees were therefore which occasioned the damage were not growing on the land demised. The suit in which the claim was made was for the administration of the estate of the deceased landlord. The court held that the claim was not maintainable against the deceased's estate. JAMES, L.J., said that the claim did not rest on warranty, but upon a wrongful act, that is, negligence, of the landlord, and that no such claim could be made at common law against the estate of a deceased person, the cause of action having died with him. That does not throw any light on the present case. MELLISH, L.J., said (ibid. at pp. 760, 761):

H "Now it is clear that this claim, so far as it goes to negligence in keeping up the fences, or negligence in allowing the cuttings from the yew trees to be placed where the cattle could get at them, or the negligence of allowing the branches of the yew trees to grow over the hurdles, would all, if they were maintainable at all, be by personal action."

I So far he is affirming the view of JAMES, L.J. But he went on to say:

"I may say, however, that, in my opinion, as far as regards the yew trees growing over the hurdles, no such claim could be sustained at all. With respect to what the Master of the Rolls seems to have rested his judgment upon, namely, that there was a warranty that no noxious trees should grow on the demised premises, I have never heard of any such warranty. The law of this country is that a tenant, when he takes a farm, must look and judge for himself what the state of the farm is. Just as in the case of a purchaser of a business the rule is caveat emptor, so in the case of taking the lease of property the rule is caveat lessee; he must take the property as he finds it. I never heard that the landlord warranted that the sheep should not eat his yew trees."

That is a distinct statement of the law and not merely a dictum. It is the second ground given by the lord justice for his judgment. If a judge states two grounds for his judgment and bases his decision upon both, neither of those grounds is a dictum. The law so stated by MELLISH, L.J., is in accordance with a series of cases of which Sutton v. Temple (2) is an early instance. In a case of this kind the tenant takes the land demised as it is, and therefore if the tenant here took the land with the yew trees growing over it so that his horses could eat of the branches and they did eat, he cannot recover. Therefore the broad proposition argued on behalf of the plaintiff cannot be maintained.

Next, has the plaintiff established his second proposition, namely, that the condition of things so changed during the tenancy that what was a condition of safety at the date of the demise became a condition of danger during the tenancy? I can see no evidence of this. At the time when the mare ate of the yew tree its branches overhung the plaintiff's field so as to be within her reach. To what extent it overhung the field is left in doubt. If the plaintiff says that the condition of things was safe at the date of the demise, but became unsafe afterwards, the onus is on him to prove it. If he does not make it out he does not establish his cause of action. If there had been any miscarriage at the trial I should say that the case should be sent back to the county court. But it seems to me that the plaintiff rested his case in the county court, as here, upon this, that, whether the trees were safe at the date of the demise or not, they were a source of danger when the mare ate of them and died, and that therefore the defendant was liable. If the question of the trees being safe at the date of the demise was dealt with at all in the county court, it was decided against the plaintiff. The learned judge said that he was bound by the decision of MELLISH, L.J., in Erskine v. Adcane (1), and if so he must have come to the conclusion that the trees were overhanging the plaintiff's field at the date of the demise so as to be a source of danger. I do not say what the rights of the party might be if the plaintiff had proved that the trees were safe at the date of the demise. There was, however, no evidence of any material change of circumstances between the date of the demise and the date when the mare ate of the yew tree and died. It was the simple case of a demise to the plaintiff of land over a portion of which yew trees, growing on the defendant's land, extended so as to be within reach of horses, and the plaintiff's mare ate of the branches and died. That is insufficient to establish liability in the defendant. The appeal must be dismissed, and in saying this I do not think that I am differing from COLERIDGE, J., on the law.

BANKES, L.J.—I agree. The point argued before us is important and interesting, and may be briefly stated thus: What is the duty of a landlord on whose land trees grow and overhang the adjoining land which he has demised and cause damage? It is unnecessary to decide some of the questions raised before us. It seems to me upon the authorities that a clear distinction must be drawn between disputes between adjoining owners and disputes between landlord and tenant. Between adjoining owners the law is clear. Lemmon v. Webb (3), Crookhurst v. Amersham Burial Board (4), and Smith v. Giddy (5) are cases of adjoining owners, and they establish that no real distinction can be drawn between damage caused by trees innocuous in themselves and damage caused by yew trees which may be poisonous. In Lemmon v. Webb (3) the injury was caused by the overhanging branches of oaks and elms. KEKEWICH, J., in giving judgment, said ([1894] 3 Ch. at p. 5):

A "It is too late for counsel or judge to say that a neighbour's trees overhanging my land is not a nuisance. It is a nuisance of omission—that is to say, it is negligence on the part of the owner of the tree to allow the branches to overhang the land."

KAY, L.J., said (ibid. at p. 24):

B "The result of the authorities seems to be this: The encroachment of the boughs and roots over and within the land of the adjoining owner is not a trespass or occupation of that land which by lapse of time could become a right. It is a nuisance. For any damage occasioned by this an action on the case would lie."

C That is exactly followed in Smith v. Giddy (5), the authority of which was challenged by the learned counsel for the defendant. The only substantial difference between those three cases is that in Crowhurst v. Amersham Burial Board (4) the tree was a yew, a poisonous tree. In that case KELLY, C.B., in delivering the judgment of the court, rested the decision not so much on nuisance as on the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (6). There is, however, not much, if any, difference in the result. In either case liability for damage from overhanging branches is

D clearly established.

I pass to the case of landlord and tenant, where the considerations are very different. I accept fully the statement of MELLISH, L.J., in Erskine v. Adeane (1), which is in accordance with a long line of cases. He said:

E "The law of this country is that a tenant, when he takes a farm, must look and judge for himself what the state of the farm is. Just as in the case of a purchaser of a business the rule is caveat emptor, so in the case of taking the lease of property the rule is caveat lessee; he must take the property as he finds it."

F In the present case the plaintiff was unable to show that there was any material difference between the condition of the yew trees at the date of the demise and at the date when his mare ate of the branches. No attempt was made to show that there was any such difference. Upon that ground the plaintiff fails. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the interesting question whether, if it had been proved that a condition of safety existed at the date of the demise and a condition of danger arose afterwards, the defendant would be liable. In that case it would have to be decided—first, whether the rule stated by MELLISH, L.J., in Erskine v. Adeane (1) applies to the natural growth of the yew trees from a condition of safety to a condition of danger; and, secondly, if that were not so, what would be sufficient to constitute a breach of duty in the landlord towards his tenant—whether the tenant ought to bring the condition of things to the notice of the landlord so as to make him liable for negligence. Both these matters may fall to be decided some day; they do not arise here, and I mention them only to show that we are giving

H no decision upon them. The appeal therefore fails.

SARGANT, J.—I agree. I am not sure that the difference of view between LORD COLERIDGE, J., and ROWLATT, J., as to the facts is quite so great as PICKFORD, L.J., suggests. LORD COLERIDGE, J., said ([1917] 2 K.B. at p. 518):

I "At the time of the demise the tree, although it overhung the demised property, was harmless. It could not be reached by cattle or horses, but during the tenancy it grew and came within reach of horses."

ROWLATT, J., said (ibid. at p. 521):

"In this case the land was taken with the tree already overhanging it, though no doubt it has grown since."

I think that ROWLATT, J., was drawing the distinction between the case of a yew tree overhanging the land at the date of the demise and its branches afterwards growing down so as to come within reach of the cattle on the demised land and the case of a yew tree not overhanging the land at all at the date of the demise, but which afterwards during the tenancy grew over the boundary. If the learned judge meant to say that there would be a distinction between these two states of things for the purpose of legal liability I do not know that I should agree with him. For the purpose of legal liability they seem to me to be identical. It is not, however, necessary to consider that distinction. We have not to deal with the question which would arise if the yew trees were harmless by their position at the date of the demise but afterwards became noxious and in consequence the plaintiff's mare died from eating them. The effect of the evidence is to show that there was no substantial difference between the state of the trees at the date of the demise and their state at the date when the mare ate of them. The case is therefore the simple one of a landlord letting land to a tenant with a yew tree on the adjoining land in the occupation of the landlord overhanging the land demised to such an extent as to be dangerous to the tenant's horses. To that state of things the reasoning of MELLISH, L.J., in Erskine v. Adeane (1) applies. The tenant could have seen that the yew trees overhung the demised land in such a way as to be accessible to cattle, and having taken the land in that state he cannot afterwards complain of damage arising from his mare having eaten of the branches. If the damage had arisen from the subsequent growth of the yew trees, I should have reserved my decision upon that state of facts, but I am not, as I have said, prepared to assent to what I understand to be the view of ROWLATT, J., that in that case there could be no liability. If trees on the adjoining property of the landlord subsequently grew so as to become dangerous to the tenant's cattle on his own land, it may be that the rights and obligations arising therefrom would be regulated by those applicable between adjoining landowners rather than by those between landlord and tenant. I notice in the second part of Erskine v. Adeane (1) some observations of JAMES, L.J., at the end of his judgment which bear upon this.

Appeal dismissed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR NEW ZEALAND v. BROWN AND OTHERS

[PRIVY COUNCIL (Lord Buckmaster, Lord Parker of Waddington and Sir Walter Phillimore), March 23, 27, 1917]

Charity—Uncertainty—Gift “for such charitable, benevolent religious and educational institutions, societies, associations and objects” as trustees select.

A testator by his will gave the residue of his estate to trustees to be held by them in trust “for such charitable, benevolent, religious and educational institutions, societies associations and objects as they in their uncontrolled discretion shall select.” An investment clause in the will empowered the trustees to invest money in certain securities “or by depositing the same or any part thereof with any . . . corporation or public body or institution, commercial, municipal, religious, charitable, educational, or otherwise.”

Held: the gift must be construed as if the word “and” meant “or”; having regard to the use of the word “or” in the investment clause the word “charitable” could not be read as covering each of the three following words: and, therefore, the gift failed for uncertainty.

Appeal from a judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal for New Zealand (DENNISTON, EDWARDS, COOPER, and CHAPMAN, J.J., SIR ROBERT STOUT, C.J.). dissentiente), dated Sept. 27, 1915 (reported at [1916] N.Z.L.R. 83), relating to the validity of a bequest for charitable purposes.

The Court of Appeal held by a majority that the gift in question was invalid. The Attorney-General submitted that that decision was wrong. The trustees of the will took out an originating summons to have the question decided, and an order was made that the summons should be dealt with in the Court of Appeal. The testator, Edward William Knowles, who was domiciled in New Zealand and died at Napier on April 29, 1915, by his will, which was duly made and proved there, directed as follows :

"The residue of my residuary estate shall be held by my trustees in trust for such charitable, benevolent, religious, and educational institutions, societies, associations, and objects as they in their unconditional discretion shall select."

The will empowered the trustees to invest money in certain securities

"or by depositing the same or any part thereof with any . . . corporation or public body or institution, commercial, municipal, religious, charitable, educational, or otherwise."

Romer, K.C., and Austen-Cartmell for the appellant.

Clauson, K.C., and Northcote for the respondents (the next of kin).

Mar. 27, 1917. LORD BUCKMASTER.—The difficulty in this case lies in determining the exact values to be given to a series of words which follow each other in the bequest of the testator's residuary estate. The appellant contends that these words constitute a valid charitable gift, and, as representing the public, the Attorney-General for the Dominion of New Zealand has brought this appeal from the judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand, where by a majority of four judges to one it was decided that the gift was void and that the residue passed to the next of kin, who are represented by the third and fourth respondents. The will containing the bequest, dated Sept. 12, 1914, is that of Edward William Knowles, who died on April 23, 1915, domiciled at Napier, in the said Dominion: by its terms the first three respondents were appointed executors and trustees, and by them the will was duly proved on May 13, 1915. The material part of the clause in question is in these words :

"I direct and declare that the residue of the residuary trust funds (into which shall fall all bequests and legacies that may have lapsed) shall be held by my trustees in trust for such charitable, benevolent, religious, and educational institutions, societies, associations, and objects as they in their uncontrolled discretion shall select. And I leave it entirely to the discretion of my trustees to decide upon the amounts to be given and paid to any such institutions, societies, associations, and objects, and also, at their discretion, to decide whether to make periodical payments or one single payment to any such institutions, societies, associations, or objects."

It is obvious that the real obstacle that lies in the appellant's path is due to the word "benevolent." In accordance with a well-established series of authorities, beginning at least as early as James v. Allen (1), a gift for benevolent purposes is bad, because such purposes go beyond the legal definition of charities—a word which, in the construction of wills, has always possessed a limited and technical meaning. It is far too late to question the soundness of these authorities at the present day. It may well be that in the minds of people unversed in the subtleties of legal phrases "benevolent" and "charitable" are equivalent terms. But in the courts the meaning of "charitable" has been influenced by the preamble to the statute 43 Eliz. c. 4, and charitable purposes have been regarded as those which that statute enumerates, or which by analogy are deemed within its spirit and intendment: see Morice v. Bishop of Durham (2), 9 Ves. at p. 405. From

A this it follows that a gift for charitable or benevolent purposes is void for uncertainty, because it is impossible to divide the gift between the two objects, or to determine to which it should be given, and consequently the good cannot be separated from the bad, and the gift fails: see Re Jarman's Estate (3) and Ellis v. Selby (4). If, therefore, the words of the gift in the present case are to be read disjunctively, and the word "benevolent" in New Zealand has, for legal purposes, B the same meaning as that which it possesses here, the gift in the present instance would be bad. But the appellant contends that neither of these conditions is involved in the true interpretation of the words. He says, first, that the word "charitable" governs, or at least explains, all the words that follow, and that, as religious and educational purposes are proper subjects of charitable bequests, the introduction of the words "religious and educational" show that all the words C following "charitable" are covered by its mantle, and that, consequently, "benevolent" objects must be read as though it meant such benevolent objects as are in their nature the proper subject of a charitable gift. This argument derives some force from the fact that there is no need for defining two classes of charities such as religious and educational when they are all included in the first word of the bequest. But the terms of the investment clause in the will really destroy the effect D of this contention, for there the testator directs his moneys to be invested by depositing them "with any firm, bank, company or corporation, or public body or institution, commercial, municipal, religious, charitable, educational, or otherwise"; and, in their Lordships' opinion, this shows that the meaning of the word "charitable" in the testator's mind was something that did not embrace religious or educational purposes, and that it ought rather to be regarded as eleemosynary, E an interpretation which at once prevents tautology and gives a sensible meaning to each of the words.

So construed, however, the gift must fail, subject to the appellant's argument as to the meaning in New Zealand of the word "benevolent," for it is, in their Lordships' opinion, impossible to use the word "and" as a link intended to join all the words together and make the gift available only for such institutions or F objects as satisfied each one of the conditions represented by each of the separate words. Apart from the fact that such a restriction would all but render the gift inoperative, it is plain from the use of the word "and" in the phrase "institutions, societies, associations, and objects," which occurs twice in immediate succession to the words in question, that "and" must be regarded as "or." In Williams v. Kershaw (5), where a gift to "benevolent charitable and religious purposes" was G held bad by LORD COTTENHAM, the same principle of construction must have been applied, and it is, in their Lordships' opinion, impossible to distinguish the principle upon which that case was decided from the principle that ought to govern the present dispute.

There remains the consideration of the true meaning to be attached in this will H to the word "benevolent," owing to the fact that it is used in a New Zealand will by a testator having a New Zealand domicile. It is, of course, quite possible that an English word might be used in New Zealand with a meaning different from that which it possesses here, and it may well be that "benevolent institutions and organisations" are, for the reasons pointed out by STOUT, C.J., charitable institutions in New Zealand according to the strict meaning of the phrase. Indeed, it I seems so to have been regarded in Clarke v. A.-G. and Pritchard (6), and also in the State of Victoria, in Moule v. A.-G. (7). But, even upon this assumption, the appellant's difficulties are not removed, for this reasoning would not endow the word "benevolent" with the same signification, when it is—as it must be in the present will—attached to the word "objects," and their Lordships cannot accept the appellant's argument that if benevolent institutions and benevolent associations in New Zealand are properly regarded as charitable, this involves the conclusion that benevolent objects, where the adjective has no such local limitation of meaning, are necessarily charitable also.

Their Lordships consequently are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was correct, and that this appeal should be dismissed. The trustees will have their costs as between solicitor and client out of the estate. As to the costs of the real litigant parties, their Lordships think that, in the circumstances of this case, the Attorney-General ought not to pay the costs of this appeal, but, on the other hand, they do not think that he ought to receive his costs out of the estate. As to the other respondents, it is possible that it will make no difference in the ultimate incidence of the expense whether their costs are included in the order or not; but it may simplify matters of administration if a formal order be made that their costs as between solicitor and client should come out of the estate, and their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

Insurance—Arbitration clause in policy—"All differences arising" under policy to be referred—Allegation by insurers of untrue answers by assured in proposal form—Reference to arbitration—Jurisdiction of arbitrator—Burden of proof of untruth.

The applicant made a proposal to the respondents for insurance against burglary and the truth of his answers to the questions on the proposal form formed the basis of the contract. A policy was issued to him which contained a condition that if a claim be made which was in any respect fraudulent or if any false declaration be made or used in support thereof all benefit under the policy would be forfeited. The policy also provided that "all differences arising thereunder" should be referred to arbitration. The applicant made a claim which was referred to arbitration. Before the arbitrator the respondents disputed the claim on the ground that the applicant had suppressed material facts and had made untrue answers in the proposal form. The applicant contended that the defence set up by the respondents called in question the validity of the policy, and, therefore, was not within the arbitration clause in the policy.

Held: (i) the respondents were not seeking to avoid the policy, but were relying upon the provision in it that the truth of the answers in the proposal should be the basis of the contract, and whether or not a statement was true was a difference arising under the policy to be referred to the decision of an arbitrator; (ii) the burden of proving the untruth of the answers in the proposal lay on the respondents.

Special Case stated for opinion of the court under s. 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889.

C 1. The respondents issued to the applicant a policy of insurance, dated July 21, 1915, indemnifying the applicant against loss or damage by or in connection with burglary. The policy recited that "Whereas Sydney Stebbing (hereinafter called 'the insured') has submitted to the Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Co., Ltd. (hereinafter called 'the company') a proposal and declaration with certain written statements and particulars as the basis of this contract," and provided that "compliance with the conditions indorsed on this policy shall be a condition precedent to any liability on the part of the company." Condition No. 2 indorsed on the policy was as follows:

D "On the happening of any loss or damage, the insured must forthwith give notice thereof in writing to the company, and must within thirty days or such further time as the company may allow deliver to the company a claim with such particulars and details as are reasonably practicable, and if the claim be in any respect fraudulent, or if any false declaration be made or used in support thereof, all benefit under this policy shall be forfeited."

E The policy also provided that "all differences arising under this policy" should be referred to arbitration. The proposal was in writing, signed by the applicant, and was dated July 7, 1915, and therein the applicant declared as follows:

F "I declare that the answers in this proposal are full and true, that I have withheld no information whatever that might tend in any way to increase the company's risk or to influence their decision regarding this proposal. . . . I agree that this proposal and declaration shall be the basis of the contract between me and the company, and I agree to accept a policy subject to the usual conditions indorsed thereon and to pay the premium when called upon to do so."

G 2. By a letter dated May 3, 1916, the applicant notified the respondents that he had sustained a loss by burglary on the night of May 2, and claimed that by the terms of the policy he was entitled to be indemnified by the respondents against his loss. The applicant's claim was not admitted by the respondents, and they required that the dispute between them should be referred to arbitration in accordance with the conditions of the policy. 3. On Aug. 11, 1916, a letter was written on the applicant's behalf stating that the applicant did not know why his claim was repudiated, and asking that the respondents should state more definitely the grounds on which the claim was refused. On Aug. 18, 1916, a further letter was written on the applicant's behalf. The letter contained the following passage:

H "So far as I can gather from your assessors, you are going to charge my client with fraud or something similar. I think you ought specifically to state what it is you charge my client with. He is anxious to meet it. In an action you would have to give full particulars of such a charge."

I The respondents replied by a letter, dated Aug. 22, stating that they did not make any charge against the applicant, that sufficient proof had not been furnished of a loss as the result of a burglary, and that if the matter had to go further it had better be referred to arbitration in the terms of the policy. On Sept. 6, 1916, the applicant's solicitor again wrote to the respondents saying:

"I should like, if possible, to arrive at a statement of the differences between us. If the company is going to set up anything which impeaches my client's bona fides and honesty, I think in fairness full information with regard thereto should be given to my client."

On Sept. 7, 1916, the respondents' solicitors replied :

"Our clients do not make any charge against your client. They are, however, not satisfied with the proof furnished of loss resulting from burglary. We are rather at a loss to understand what further information we can give you. The onus is surely on your client to prove his loss and its extent in the ordinary way."

On Sept. 8, 1916, the applicant's solicitor wrote :

"You do not answer my questions as to a statement of the differences between our clients for the purpose of any arbitration."

On Oct. 13, 1916, the applicant's solicitor wrote to the respondents enclosing a draft agreement which set out that the matters in difference were as follows :

"(i) Did the said Sydney Stebbing on or about May 2, 1916 suffer any loss or damage by or in connection with burglary, house-breaking, and larceny, or any attempt thereat, within the risks insured against by the said policy, to the property described in the schedule hereto?

"(ii) If so, what is the amount of such loss and damage?"

The draft agreement was returned by the respondents on Oct. 17, 1916, accompanied by a letter of that date. In this letter the respondents stated :

"We think there is perhaps some slight misunderstanding between us in reference to the form of submission necessary. If you will refer to your letter of Oct. 7 last you will see that you suggested that there should be a formal appointment of Mr. Shakespeare as sole arbitrator, and to this we agreed. No other submission is necessary, for the reference is under the contract in the policy. All questions of practice and procedure are, of course, provided for by the Arbitration Act. Apart from this, we cannot agree to restrict the scope of the arbitration in any way. We return the draft in order that it may be altered into an appointment of Mr. Shakespeare as sole arbitrator."

The applicant's solicitor replied by a letter, dated Oct. 18, 1916, saying :

"I observe that you cannot agree to restrict the scope of the arbitration in any way, and you must not be surprised if I point out to you that this is the attitude not only of yourselves, but of your clients and of Messrs. F. Dodd & Co. The policy appears to be to put my client to as much expense as possible to prove his claim, and at the same time there is a refusal to state the company's grounds for refusing to pay. You must excuse me if I am of opinion that this course is oppressive and unfair."

On Oct. 18, 1916, the respondents' solicitor sent to the applicant's solicitor a "joint appointment of a single arbitrator" for signature, and on Oct. 20 the applicant's solicitor wrote :

"Since you decline to define what are the disputes and differences in this case, I will advise my client to sign the appointment."

The joint appointment was subsequently signed by the applicant.

4. On Dec. 1, 1916, the parties appeared before the arbitrator, and an application was made on behalf of the applicant for an order that points of claim and of defence should be delivered. It was then contended by the respondents that the arbitrator had no power to make the order asked for. They, however, stated in the presence of the arbitrator the grounds on which they resisted the applicant's claim, and thereupon the application for an order for delivery of points of claim and defence was withdrawn. The grounds stated were : (i) That it was not admitted

A that the goods were lost by burglary. (ii) That the policy was void because of the suppression of material facts and because the applicant had made untrue answers in the proposal form. The respondents' solicitor was then informed by the applicant's counsel that at the hearing he should contend that in the circumstances set out in the preceding paras. 1, 2, and 3 the questions whether the applicant had suppressed material facts or had made untrue answers in the proposal form, and whether the policy was void for these or other reasons, were not disputes or differences in the arbitration, and that it was not open to the respondents to seek to resist payment on any ground which called in question the validity of the policy.

B 5. At the hearing before the arbitrator the respondents contended (i) that the applicant was not entitled to an indemnity in respect of a loss in fact occasioned by or in connection with a burglary, if (a) the applicant failed to prove affirmatively
C that the answers made in the proposal form were true, or (b) it was established that any of the answers in the proposal form were in fact untrue; and (ii) that they were entitled to rely on (a) or (b) as a defence to the applicant's claim. It was contended on behalf of the applicant (i) that the question whether the answers contained in the proposal form were true or untrue was not a dispute or difference in the arbitration, and that the arbitrator had no power to determine whether
D the answers were true or not, or to determine any matters which called in question the validity of the policy; and (ii) that the applicant's claim to be indemnified against a loss by burglary did not require the applicant to prove affirmatively that the answers in the proposal form were true.

E 6. The questions for the opinion of the court were (i) whether the truth or untruth of the answers in the proposal form was a matter which had been referred to the arbitrator. (ii) Whether the applicant's claim to be indemnified in respect of a loss by burglary necessarily failed unless he proved affirmatively that the answers in the proposal form were true.

Swift, K.C. (C. Herbert-Smith with him) for the respondents.

F LORD READING, C.J.—The applicant was insured against burglary under a policy issued by the respondents, and he claimed to recover from them the value of the property insured. The policy is the contract between the parties, and it recites that the proposal and declaration and certain written statements and particulars are the basis of the contract. In the proposal form, which is thus incorporated in the contract, there is a clause containing a declaration by the applicant
G that the answers to the questions in the proposal form are true, that he has withheld no information, and that he agrees that the proposal and declaration shall be the basis of the contract between himself and the company. It is asserted in answer to his claim that the declaration and answers were not true, and it is contended that the agreement between the parties is on the basis (i) that each of the statements is true, (ii) that each of the statements is material, and (iii) that each of
H the statements induced the company to enter into the contract. That is the effect of the statement that the declaration and answers formed the basis of this contract. There is also a condition, forming part of the policy, that all differences arising out of the policy shall be referred to the decision of an arbitrator. An arbitrator was nominated and appointed under the policy to ascertain and determine the disputes and differences arising out of the policy. When the matter came before
I the arbitrator, it was contended on behalf of the respondents that one or other of the statements was untrue, and the objection was taken on behalf of the applicant that that question was not open to the arbitrator because, as was said, it was not for the arbitrator to determine the truth or untruth of the statements, this not being a difference arising out of the policy and therefore not being the subject of reference to the arbitrator. To make the question involved in this dispute a little plainer, the argument is that inasmuch as the company only raised this point for the purpose of avoiding the policy, it cannot be open to the arbitrator to determine whether the policy is void, since the reference is under the policy, and therefore, as the company has agreed to a reference under the policy, and has agreed to refer all disputes arising under the policy to the arbitrator, it is only such questions as do arise under the policy that can be for him.

I think that for this purpose the real question is whether the truth or untruth of the answers in the proposal form is a difference arising out of the policy, and indeed that is not in dispute. That is the real question. If the effect of the company's contention was that the policy was void, and if that was the true way of expressing their contention and their object was to avoid the policy, I think there would be very great force in the argument for the applicant. The expression "avoid the policy" is used a little loosely in this matter, for a little consideration shows that the company cannot be seeking to avoid the policy, but are really relying upon it in order to set up a defence which prevents the applicant from enforcing any obligation under the policy against the company. I say that for this reason. If a material statement is made inducing the contract and is untrue, it entitles the other party to repudiate the contract; but the essential matters to be proved are (i) that the statement was untrue, (ii) that it was material, and (iii) that it induced the contract. Each of these matters would be a question for a jury, subject to the direction of the judge, if the case was tried by a judge and jury, and often the questions whether a statement was material and whether it induced the contract become very different questions. By the terms of this policy, which is the contract between the parties, in order to settle disputes as to whether a statement is material and whether it has induced the contract, the parties have agreed that the declarations and statements in the proposal form should form the basis of the contract. As soon as the parties have agreed to that, it is no longer open to the applicant to say either that the statement, if untrue, was not material, or that it did not induce the contract. If the contract is void, the result would be that when the company sets up this defence, the questions would have to be tried as to whether the statement is material and whether it induced the contract. The company, to get the benefit of the clause, instead of endeavouring to set aside the policy, rely upon it and say that if one looks at the contract one can see that they have agreed that every one of these statements is material and induced the contract, and therefore the policy itself prevents the denial of these matters. The company is not endeavouring to avoid the policy, but is relying upon it. Therefore the answer to the question whether the truth or untruth of the answers in the proposal has been referred to the arbitrator is in the affirmative. It is a matter referred to the arbitrator because when it is clear that the company is relying on a clause in the contract before him, the question whether the statement is true is a matter in difference arising out of the policy.

The second question is whether the applicant's claim to be indemnified in respect of a loss by burglary necessarily fails unless the applicant proves affirmatively that the answers in the proposal form are true. The question so stated is very wide and could only admit of one answer, namely, in the negative; but we have had the advantage of a discussion before us which has explained the real point of the question. The applicant has been challenged by the company as to the answer given by him in the proposal form that he has not insured with any other company. He has been asked about this, and he has given an explanation. The arbitrator apparently is in doubt about the matter, and in order to help him to decide this point, he has asked the court to state, what I understand both parties agree is the question: Upon whom is the burden of proof of establishing that the statement or statements challenged is or are untrue? The answer to it clearly is: Upon the company, and it is for them to establish, and if they have not satisfied the arbitrator that the statements are untrue, why then that defence fails. The test of it is the very simple proposition, which is an answer to so many of these questions which are raised, which may be expressed in these words: that the burden of proof lies at first on the party against whom judgment would be given if no evidence

A at all were adduced. The moment one realises that that is the test, and assumes in this case the proof of the loss by the burglary, the policy put in evidence, and that is the claimant's case, if no other evidence is given, it follows as a matter of course that the claimant would be entitled to recover. And if he is to be met by the defence that the statement is not true—that one of the statements is not true—then the burden is upon the defence—that is, the company—to establish that it is not true, and if they cannot establish it, then they fail in the defence.

B The answer, therefore, to the first question is Yes, and the answer to the second question is No. I would just say in reference to Anderson v. Fitzgerald (1), which was cited to us, that it is important to observe that in that case the term of the policy was that if the questions were not accurately answered the policy should be void. The term there was that the contract was void at once, not, as in this

C case, merely that it formed the basis of the contract between the parties. The costs, of course, will be dealt with by the arbitrator in the usual way.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree with my Lord in the answers to both questions. One must remember that there is a distinction in cases of this kind. There may be a case in which, on the ground of fraud, the insurance company attack the policy, and say that the policy is void. For instance, that would be the case if the insured were to set up that there had been a burglary and that he had had goods which had been stolen or destroyed, when he had had nothing of the sort. In such a case the result of proving a false statement by the insured is to avoid the policy. Now, it might be supposed that that applied to all cases where fraud is set up as having been committed, or where false statements are alleged to have been made by the insured, but I think that is not so. There is a great distinction between

D that case and the present one where it is made a preliminary to the policy of insurance that upon the proposal form certain questions should be answered, which answers are to be taken as the basis of the contract to be made between the insured and the company. In such a case as that where the company seek to say that the answers made to the questions have been untrue, so that the contract gives them

E the right to say that they are not liable in that case, they do not avoid the contract. They set up as between themselves and the insured a term of the contract which absolves them from the liability of paying. Now, that, I think, is a different position, and it seems to me that although in the first case that I was putting it would not be a part of the policy on which they came before the arbitrator, and therefore the arbitration clause would not apply, in the other case it does, it is

F still in existence, although by one of its conditions it is set up by the company that they are not liable. They are still affirming the contract under which the arbitration takes place. I therefore agree with my Lord, and think that the first answer must be in the affirmative. With regard to the second question, I do not

G propose to add anything. I quite agree with what my Lord has said.

AVORY, J.—I agree as to the answers to both questions.

Nuisance—Statutory nuisance—Abatement notice—Service on owner of premises—Person in default “cannot be found”—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict., c. 55), s. 94.

The appellants were owners of houses occupied by separate tenants and each house had a separate drain which emptied into a sewer vested in the respondents, the local authority. The drains became stopped up, but there was nothing to show what caused the stoppage, and the respondents served a notice on the appellants under s. 94 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to abate the nuisance, with which notice the appellants failed to comply. The magistrate found that the person by whose act, default or sufferance the nuisance arose could not “be found” within s. 94 of the Act of 1875 and that the respondents were entitled to proceed against the appellants as the owners.

Held: the words “cannot be found” in s. 94 of the Act of 1875 meant that the person causing the nuisance could not be found in the then state of knowledge; when satisfied, on inspection, that a nuisance had arisen, the respondents as local authority were under no obligation to take steps to ascertain the cause of the nuisance and thereby the person in default, before serving a notice on the appellants; and, therefore, the decision of the magistrate was right.

Case Stated by the stipendiary magistrate for Merthyr Tydfil.

At a petty sessions held at Merthyr Tydfil on May 12, 1916, a complaint was preferred by the Gelligaer Urban District Council (hereinafter called the “respondents”) under s. 94 of the Public Health Act, 1875, against the Rhymney Iron Co., Ltd. (hereinafter called the “appellants”) for that the appellants, being the owners of premises known as No. 14, Queen Street, and Nos. 3 and 6, Bute Terrace, Pontlotlyn, upon which a certain nuisance existed—namely, a stopped drain—did unlawfully fail to comply with a notice to abate the nuisance, which notice expired on Nov. 13, 1915. On the hearing of the complaint the following

A facts were proved or admitted. The premises were owned by the appellants and occupied by separate tenants. Each house was drained by a separate drain emptying into a sewer vested in the respondents. The drain from No. 14, Queen Street, carried the slop waters therefrom and sewage from a water-closet at the bottom of the garden. The drain had become clogged up so that the slop water and sewage would not pass through. There was nothing to show what caused

B the stoppage. In the past the drain had been cleansed by the appellants. The last time it was cleansed by them was about twelve months before the hearing of the complaint and after a notice had been served upon them by the respondents. The facts with regard to Nos. 3 and 6, Bute Terrace, were similar except that there were no water-closets there. On Nov. 10, 1915, the sanitary inspector of the respondents served notices upon the appellants calling upon them to abate the

C nuisance. On Nov. 16, 1915, a letter was written on behalf of the appellants to the respondents suggesting that the respondents should open the drain in order to ascertain whether there was any structural defect. The same suggestion was repeated by the appellants' solicitors in a letter of Dec. 9, 1915, and an intimation was thereby conveyed that if the stoppage was found to be due to any structural defect, the appellants were prepared to pay the reasonable costs of abating the

D nuisance. This suggestion was not accepted by the respondents. The appellants failed to comply with the notice of Nov. 10, 1915.

The respondents relied on s. 94 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and contended that it was impossible to ascertain the person by whose act or default the nuisance arose, and that the section gave the respondents a choice of serving a notice either on the owner or on the occupier, because the person responsible could not be found.

E The appellants contended that the fact that no person had ascertained whether the nuisance arose or continued by reason of the act, default, or sufferance of the owner, or of the occupier, did not render the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance in fact arose or continued incapable of being found, that therefore the section did not entitle the respondents in the circumstances to serve the notice on the appellants only, and that, the notice being for this reason invalid,

F the summons should be dismissed. The magistrate found on the facts that the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arose or continued could not be found within the meaning of the section, and held that the respondents were entitled to proceed against the appellants as owners. The questions of law for the opinion of the court were: (i) Whether there was evidence to support the finding of fact; (ii) whether the magistrate was right in his interpretation of s. 94

G of the Act.

The Public Health Act, 1875, s. 94, provided :

"On the receipt of any information respecting the existence of a nuisance the local authority shall, if satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, serve a notice on the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues, or, if such person cannot be found, on the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, requiring him to abate the same within a time to be specified in the notice, and to execute such works and do such things as may be necessary for that purpose. Provided—First, that where the nuisance arises from the want or defective construction of any structural convenience, or where there is no occupier of the premises, notice

I under this section shall be served on the owner . . ."

Macmorran, K.C., and Randolph Glen for the appellants.
C. Herbert-Smith for the respondents.

VISCOUNT READING, C.J.—The question in this case is one of some importance to the owners and the occupiers of property. The appellants are the owners, but not the occupiers, of certain premises, and the respondents, the local authority, having ascertained that the drains were stopped and that there was nothing to show what caused the stoppage, served on the appellants notice under s. 94 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to abate the nuisance. The appellants contend that it was a condition precedent to any obligation upon them to obey the notice that it should be established that the person causing the stoppage could not be found, and that, in order to establish this, the local authority must show that they had at least taken reasonable steps to discover the cause of the stoppage. The section provides that if the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues "cannot be found," the notice to abate the nuisance is to be served on the owner or occupier, and the appellants contend that before serving the notice on them it was essential that the respondents should have taken some such step as passing a pipe through the drain, or ascertaining the cause of the stoppage by an inspection of the chamber if there is one, or by opening up the street. The appellants do not particularise the steps to be taken, but merely contend that the local authority must show that they have taken reasonable steps before the magistrate can find as a fact that the person causing the nuisance could not be found. If that contention is right, the appellants are entitled to succeed. On the other hand, it is said for the respondents that the true meaning of the words "cannot be found" is that the person causing the nuisance "cannot be found in the then state of knowledge," i.e., that the local authority are unable to determine whether the nuisance has arisen through a misuse of the drains by the occupier or whether it has arisen through a structural defect, and it is contended that, although under various sections of the Act of 1875, the local authority have power to take such steps as may be necessary to ascertain the cause of the nuisance, there is no obligation upon them to do so before serving a notice on the owner or on the occupier and seeking to make him liable.

The question really depends on whether the Act of 1875 imposes upon the local authority an obligation to take such reasonable steps as I have indicated for the purpose of ascertaining the person who caused the nuisance. There is great force in the argument used by counsel for the appellants that the owner ought not to be put under this liability and ought not to be called upon to defend his failure to obey the notice unless a prima facie case has been established against him. With that we agree, but when he adds that on the facts of this case we must decide in favour of the owners, because the local authority have not taken such steps as I have referred to, he goes further than the language of the section warrants. One must bear in mind the aim and purpose of the Public Health Acts. They were designed to protect the public and to safeguard them against nuisances which might cause illness or, at any rate, serious discomfort, and it was determined that the local authority should have power to step in at once, provided that they are satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, and that in their then state of knowledge they are not able, without putting in operation the powers given to them by these Acts, of entering and searching and opening up the drains, to ascertain who is responsible. If the aim and purpose of the Acts are kept in mind it follows, as was said by DAY, J., in Gebhardt v. Sanders (1) and approved by LORD RUSSELL or KILLOWEN, C.J., in Andrew v. St. Olave's Board of Works (2), that common sense and the necessity of the case make it necessary for something to be done forthwith, and in my opinion that is the key to this Act and to the powers given under the various Public Health Acts.

We have been pressed in argument with the hardship that would be imposed upon owners if we affirmed the decision of the magistrate, and at first sight that argument had some weight with me, because we are not entitled, even if we wished, to extend obligations resting upon owners, but on further consideration I do not think that there is any hardship. If the owner is served with the notice and the defect is caused by some misuse for which the occupier is liable and is not a structural defect for which the owner is liable, the mere fact of the service of the notice on the owner does not create any liability upon him. He may decline to obey the notice, and the next step is to summon the owner and ask for an order

A upon him to abate the nuisance. The owner may prove that the nuisance is not caused by a structural defect, or he may prove other circumstances showing that it is not he, but the occupier, who is liable. In that event an order to abate the nuisance could not be made upon him. If the owner pays no attention and allows an order to be made against him, no doubt a penalty could be imposed upon him under s. 96 of the Act of 1875. But if an order has been made upon him B because he has not resisted it, and if it turns out that he is not liable, he can still recover from the person who ex hypothesi is liable, as was done in Gebhardt v. Saunders (1) and in Andrew v. St. Olave's Board of Works (2). I agree that one cannot put upon the owner the necessity of having to sue his tenant, for in many cases the owner would not be able to recover the fruits of his judgment. But the owner's remedy is to prevent the order from being made against him, by showing C facts which entitle him to succeed. For these reasons I am of opinion that the magistrate was right in the view which he expressed, and that upon the facts as stated, more particularly that there was nothing to show what caused the stoppage, there was evidence in law to support the finding of fact that the person causing the nuisance "could not be found" within the meaning of s. 94 of the Act of 1875. Therefore the appeal must be dismissed.

D RIDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion. In construing s. 94 of the Act of 1875 one must not forget that its real object is, not to put upon the local authority the duty of ascertaining upon whom the ultimate responsibility for the nuisance will rest, but that they should procure the abatement of the nuisance. They have the duty of inquiry only up to a certain point. If they are satisfied of the existence E of a nuisance, they may serve on the person causing it a notice to abate it. That is the first alternative. That refers to a case in which on going and looking it is apparent by whose act the nuisance was caused and there is no structural defect. The amount of examination required to be made by the local authority must be limited in some way. It cannot be contended that they have the duty of pushing rods through the drain or of taking the other steps which inspectors of nuisances F have to take in order to find out where the defect is. I cannot think that that is the intention of s. 94. I am satisfied that it means that if on going and looking it is possible to see who is the person causing the nuisance, then he is the person on whom the notice must be served. Then comes the second alternative, where on such an inspection as I have described it is not possible to discover who caused the nuisance, and where the question whether it was caused by a structural defect G or by a misuse of the drains cannot be determined without an examination which may be lengthy and difficult. In such a case the statute has given the local authority the right to serve notice on the owner or occupier as they think fit. Indeed, the local authority might serve notice on both. Gebhardt v. Saunders (1) is an authority for saying that it could be given, not nominatim, but generally, to the owner or occupier. On the other hand, it may be given to the owner by name or H to the occupier by name. It might be regarded as a hardship that the notice may be given to a person who may ultimately be found not to be liable to obey it. But the hardship is modified by the fact that the owner may appear and show by evidence that not he, but the occupier, is responsible. Even then it is possible that the magistrate may give a wrong decision, and the owner, when he proceeds to do the work necessary to abate the nuisance, may ascertain that it was not I due to any structural defect for which he was responsible, but was merely due to a misuse of the drains by the occupier. In such a case the owner could ultimately recover from the occupier. The owner may regard that as an insufficient remedy, but, in view of the object of the statute, this hardship cannot be helped. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD COLERIDGE, J.—The whole case turns on the meaning of the words "cannot be found" in s. 94 of the Act of 1875. I do not think that the opening of the drain or the other examination which the statute enables the local authority to make is a condition precedent to their inability to find the person causing the nuisance. The object of the Act is to give power to bring about in the public interest the abatement of nuisances with as much dispatch as possible, and it leaves the liability, which is not concluded by the service of the notice, to be determined by the magistrate on the application of the local authority. The words "cannot be found" are sufficiently satisfied if, to use the language of CHARLES, J., in Gebhardt v. Saunders (1), the cause of the nuisance cannot be found on inspection. That does not imply the execution of any work by the local authority. If on an inspection it is not possible to see clearly whether it is the owner or the occupier who is responsible, the local authority may serve the owner or the occupier with notice to abate the nuisance. If the question of ultimate liability is disputed, it can be raised before the magistrate, and the person who has been served with the notice can obtain his remedy against the local authority if he succeeds. If he does not dispute his liability, but some other person is ultimately found to be liable, he can then recover against that person. It is true that in the case of a stopped drain the occupier is prima facie responsible, but to hold that this means that the person causing the nuisance "can be found" within the meaning of the section would make s. 94 futile. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

The testator devised the whole of his estate to trustees on trust for sale and directed the proceeds of such sale to be invested and held on trust to pay the income to his wife for life with remainder to his children. The trustees were given power to postpone sale with a direction that pending such sale the whole of the income of property actually producing income should be applied as from the testator's death as income. On the question whether the direction was within s. 7 of the Apportionment Act, 1870, so as to preclude application of the Act,

Held: the direction was not an express stipulation within s. 7 of the Apportionment Act, 1870, that no apportionment should take place, and, accordingly, dividends on shares paid after the testator's death in respect of periods wholly or partially before his death were apportionable.

ASTBURY, J.—The question raised by this summons is whether or not certain dividends which were declared and paid after the testator's death ought to be apportioned in respect of the periods for which they were declared; that is, whether all the dividends are payable to the testator's widow, who is entitled to the income of the residuary estate, or whether they are apportionable. The testator gave all his property to the trustees on trust for sale, and subject to the payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, legacies, and any duties payable on legacies free of duty, directed them to invest the proceeds, which he called the residuary trust fund, on trust to pay the income to his wife for life, with remainder to his children. By a subsequent clause, which has nothing to do with the operative gift, the testator authorised his trustees to retain in its then state of investment for such period as they should think fit such part of his estate as at his decease was invested in rubber shares, and he then provided :

"I further declare that my trustees may postpone the sale, calling in, and conversion of any part of my real or personal estate for such period as they may in their absolute discretion deem fit, notwithstanding that it may be of wasting, speculative, or reversionary nature, and that, pending such sale, calling in, and conversion, the whole of the income of property actually producing income shall be applied as from my death as income, and, on the other hand, on such sale, calling in, and conversion, or on the falling in of any reversionary property, no part of the proceeds of such sale, calling in, and conversion of such property shall be paid or applied as part income."

H

It is on this provision that the whole question turns. The wife, who is the tenant for life, says that this is a direction that all the dividends, whether they accrued before or after the testator's death, which were paid on the investments after the testator's death are free from the provisions of the Apportionment Act, 1870, and are payable as income. Two cases are relied on—namely, Re Lysaght, Lysaght v. Lysaght (1) and Re Meredith, Stone v. Meredith (2). I accept, as an accurate statement of the law, the statement founded on these cases in THEOBALD ON WILLS (7th Edn.) p. 187 [see (11th Edn.) p. 170] :

I

"The Act does not extend to any case in which it is expressly stipulated that no apportionment shall take place (see s. 7). It does not, therefore, apply if there is a direction that every share given by the will shall carry the dividend accruing thereon at the testator's death: Re Lysaght (1); or if the gift is of the whole of the income derived under a particular deed: Re Meredith (2)."

I am content to rest my judgment on that statement as to the effect of these two cases. I may add that in Lysaght's Case (1) there was a provision in the will that "every share in the said company hereby bequeathed shall carry the dividend accruing thereon at my death." The Court of Appeal held that the meaning and effect of that clause was that so much of the dividend as but for the clause would have gone to the residuary legatees was not to go to them, but to the legatees of the shares. The effect was to exclude the Apportionment Act, 1870, and to give to the legatees of the shares the dividends accrued thereon at the date of the testator's death. In Meredith's Case (2) the testator had assigned to trustees of a separation deed certain shares, out of the dividends and annual income of which they were to pay to his wife the annual sum of £500 and then hand over any balance to him. By his will the testator, after reciting the settlement, and that he himself was entitled to any balance of the income arising from the settled shares and subject to the trusts of the said indenture to the said shares, declared that "the whole of the income derived under the said indenture shall, after my decease, be paid to my said wife during her life." There was nothing to discuss there, for the income under the trust was income received by the trustees on the trusts I have mentioned, and the testator directed that the whole should be paid to his wife. But in this case there is nothing to exclude the application of the Apportionment Act, and the dividends are therefore apportionable.

E Case Stated by the justices of Birmingham.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Birmingham on Aug. 31, 1916, the respondent, Robert Ellnor, was charged under s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, with being a suspected person frequenting a certain street in Birmingham—namely, Martineau Street—at 3.40 p.m. on Aug. 27, 1916, with intent to commit a felony. From the evidence of the appellant, Hartley, a police constable, adduced at the hearing before the justices, it appeared that the appellant, who was in the company of another police constable, saw the respondent near a tram terminus in Martineau Street, Birmingham, at about 3 p.m. on Sunday, Aug. 27, 1916. A number of people were about to board a stationary tramcar, and the respondent pushed his way amongst them. He had his hands before him, and he was seen to tap the pockets of several persons. He did not attempt to board the tramcar himself, although there was plenty of room upon it, and when the tramcar started he stepped back on to the footpath. A second and a third tramcar arrived at the terminus, and on each occasion the respondent repeated his actions. After the departure of the third tramcar he went down Martineau Street to High Street, where there was another tram terminus. Here he pursued the same course as at the Martineau Street tram terminus on four separate occasions, after which he returned to the place where he had first been under observation. There was at that time no tramcar standing at the Martineau Street terminus, but the respondent loitered on the footpath. Altogether he was under observation for about forty minutes, when the appellant arrested him. There was no other evidence to show that the respondent was a suspected person, and no previous offence was proved against him.

I It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the respondent became a suspected person within the meaning of s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, when he had been seen loitering and tapping the pockets of various persons at different places during the period of forty minutes whilst he was under observation. The attention of the justices was called to Cowles v. Dunbar and Callow (1). It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the court could not find that he was a suspected person within the meaning of s. 4 of the Act of 1824 in the absence of evidence that he had been previously convicted, or that he was a person of bad character.

The justices came to the conclusion that the charge was not made out, and dismissed the respondent.

By s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, it is provided (inter alia):

"Every suspected person or reputed thief frequenting any river, canal, or navigable stream, dock, or basin, or any quay, wharf, or warehouse near or adjoining thereto, or any street, highway, or avenue leading thereto, or any place of public resort, or any avenue leading thereto, or any street, highway, or place adjacent, with intent to commit felony . . . shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond within the true intent and meaning of this Act. . . ."

By s. 15 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, it is provided, amending the provisions of s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824 (inter alia):

"In proving the intent to commit a felony it shall not be necessary to show that the person suspected was guilty of any particular act or acts tending to show his purpose or intent, and he may be convicted if from the circumstances of the case, and from his known character as proved to the justice of the peace or court before whom or which he is brought, it appears to such justice or court that his intent was to commit a felony. . . ."

Willes for the appellant.

Sadler for the respondent.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

AYORY, J.—In this case the respondent, Robert Ellnor, was charged before the justices of Birmingham, under s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, with being a suspected person, frequenting a certain street in Birmingham—namely, Martineau Street—with intent to commit a felony. The justices dismissed the charge on the ground that, in the absence of any evidence before them showing that the respondent had been previously convicted or that he was a person of previous bad character, they were not entitled to find that he was a suspected person within the meaning of the section under which the charge was made against him. It was upon the narrow point that I have mentioned that the justices dismissed the charge, and the only question which we are called upon to decide is whether they were right in coming to the conclusion that there must be evidence of a previous conviction or of previous bad character in order to render an individual a suspected person within the meaning of the section of the statute under which these proceedings were taken.

It will be seen, then, that the whole case turns upon the use of the words "suspected person or reputed thief." It seems that the justices considered the phrases "suspected person" and "reputed thief" to be synonymous, but it is quite clear to us that these words have not the same meaning. A person may be a suspected person on a particular day, even though he has not been previously convicted, or even though he has not had a reputation for bad character in the past. When one examines the facts of the present case there can be no doubt whatever that the respondent was a suspected person on the day in question. For a period of about forty minutes he had been kept under observation by police officers, and during the whole of that time he was engaged on and off in doing acts which, to say the least, gave rise to a reasonable suspicion that he was attempting to pick the pockets of various passengers who were boarding trams. He was seen to be acting in a suspicious manner on no less than seven separate occasions in different parts of the city of Birmingham during the forty minutes that he was being watched by the police, and, as a matter of fact, the respondent was, on the day in question, irrespective of anything in the past, a suspected person. But it has been contended on the respondent's behalf that a different construction and a limited meaning must be placed upon the construction of s. 4 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, by reason of the provisions of s. 15 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, which is a statute amending the Act of 1824. The contention is that a person cannot be convicted as a suspected person unless there is evidence before the court either that he is a reputed thief or that he is a person of known bad character, and was known to be such previous to the day upon which he is charged with being a suspected person. In our opinion this contention is not a sound one. The Act of 1871 has no such limiting effect upon the Act of 1824. The whole object of the later statute is to enlarge the powers of courts of summary jurisdiction, and to enable them to infer from the known character of the individual who is brought before them that he was in a particular place with the intention of committing a felony, although there is no direct evidence adduced of any particular act or acts done by him which can be directly pointed to as proving the alleged intent.

In the present case no reliance was placed by the prosecution on this later statute. It was never suggested that the respondent was a person from whose known character an inference might be drawn that he was in a certain place with the intention of committing a felony. Reliance was placed, however, upon the evidence of the particular acts done by him on the day in question from which the court might be asked to infer that he was in the particular place with the intention of committing a felony. A suggestion has been put forward that the justices were led to arrive at their decision that the respondent could not be convicted of being a suspected person by a consideration of the judgment of ABBOTT, C.J., in Cowles v. Dunbar and Callow (1). That case, in our opinion, has no application whatever to the case which is now before us. The decision in Cowles v. Dunbar and Callow (1) was not given upon the Vagrancy Act, 1824, but upon a different statute, and the words of that statute are quite different from those of the Act of 1824. Moreover, the statute which was then in question applied only to the City of London and to the limits of the weekly bills of mortality. That statute provided that constables might arrest any suspected person or reputed thief if it appeared from the oath of one or more credible witnesses that such person was of evil fame and a reputed thief, and if such person should not be able to give a satisfactory account of himself or of his way of living, and if it should also appear that there was good ground for believing that he was in the street with the intention of committing a felony. Then in such a case he might be arrested and brought up as a rogue and vagabond. The present proceedings, however, were taken under the Vagrancy Act, 1824, and this statute does not require proof that the person who is charged as a suspected person is a person of ill fame and a reputed thief unless, as counsel for the respondent has contended, the mere use of the words "suspected person or reputed thief" imply that before he can be convicted of the offence there must be evidence that, prior to the day in question, he had the reputation of being a thief, or had been suspected before that day, when he could be properly described as a suspected person. By whom must he have been suspected before the day in question? Would the suspicion of one individual before the day in question be sufficient to show that he was a suspected person? We have not been enlightened upon these points? but we are clearly of opinion that in the present case there was ample evidence before the justices to show that the respondent was in fact a suspected person, and also that there was ample evidence to render it possible for the inference to be properly drawn that the respondent was frequenting Martineau Street on the day in question with the intention of committing a felony.

We are of opinion that the justices did not fully and properly consider the evidence adduced before them, and the case must be remitted to them for their consideration and for their determination whether the offence charged is made out.

Case remitted.

Animal—Horse—Negligence of owner—Unbroken colt uncontrolled on highway at night—Injury to person using highway.

On a dark night on a highway an unbroken colt belonging to the defendant was following, uncontrolled, a mare which was led by a boy. Behind the colt came a trap driven by the defendant. The plaintiff was bicycling in the opposite direction and the colt, possibly startled by the light of the bicycle, ran into the bicycle, and injured the plaintiff. No warning was given to the plaintiff of the presence of the colt on the highway.

Held: the colt acted in precisely the way in which it was to be expected that such a colt would act, and, therefore, the defendant had put on the highway an animal likely to cause damage and was guilty of negligence.

Appeal by the defendant from a judgment of His Honour Judge Tobin, K.C., sitting at Leominster.

D The facts are set out in the judgment of LUSH, J.

A. Brooke for the defendant.

Harold Brandon for the plaintiff.

Hawke, K.C., as amicus curiae.

E LUSH, J.—In this case the plaintiff brought an action for damages against the defendant for negligence, which was tried before the learned judge at Leominster County Court without a jury, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appeals.

The defendant went out for a drive one very dark night, and was driving in his trap, which was going at a walking pace or a jog-trot pace, and in front of him was a boy in charge of a mare belonging to a neighbour. The boy was leading the mare by a halter, the boy being on the mare's near side. Behind the mare—at least, this is how the party apparently started from the defendant's house—was a colt, eighteen months old, not broken in, under no control of any sort or kind. The plaintiff was riding her bicycle; her lamp was lit, and, as she approached the trap, she saw its lights in the distance; she came up to the boy leading the mare, and, according to her evidence, which the learned judge accepted, she had no warning from the boy, or from anybody, of the presence of the colt in the road; but when she came up more or less alongside the trap, the colt—whether it had been in front of the trap or behind the trap just before the occurrence one does not know—possibly startled by the light, and probably not being able to run away because of the trap's position in the road, darted back, ran into the bicycle, and caused damage to the plaintiff. It has been said here that the animal kicked the plaintiff; I see no evidence of it. One does not know exactly what it was that the colt did, beyond the fact that it ran into the bicycle. Evidence was called at the trial on behalf of the plaintiff to prove that a colt of that age, unbroken, will be a source of danger to passers-by on the highway because of its tendency to dart backwards and forwards on a highway. The defendant called the rebutting evidence of a veterinary surgeon, who said that it was common usage to turn out animals like this colt, but he would not do it himself. It had been objected that that evidence is not admissible, but certainly with the aid of that evidence—and I should think without it the learned judge would have come to the same conclusion—he held that, having regard to the necessary or natural propensity of an animal like this colt, the defendant was guilty of a want of care in sending it out on the highway not under proper control and he held also that there was negligence on the part of the defendant and his servant, the boy, in not giving proper warning to the plaintiff.

Although cases like this have raised difficult questions, and although I do not think myself it is very easy to reconcile them all, especially the judgment in Heath's Garages, Ltd. v. Hodges (1), with the earlier judgment in the Court of Appeal in Ellis v. Banyard (2), I do not think that this case presents any real difficulties. There is no doubt that a person is entitled to use the highway reasonably. A man is entitled to drive a flock of sheep at night without carrying a light. There is no doubt also that, if a man possesses or owns ordinary domestic animals, the mere fact that such an animal or bird strays from his premises and causes some damage does not necessarily make the owner liable because some mischief has been done by it on a highway. But we are here dealing with an animal of a particular class and propensities. It was not an animal which witnesses said was not likely to do harm to passers-by, but which nobody who owned it could fail to know was likely to do harm to passers-by. It has been said that that evidence ought not to have been admitted; I do not agree. I do agree that the court has to take notice itself of the ordinary propensities of the domestic animals, but I see no objections to giving evidence to show that, under special and peculiar circumstances, a particular domestic animal exhibits habits which are dangerous to mankind. As I say, I should have thought that without this evidence the learned judge would have taken notice of the fact that a colt like this, especially in the dark, would be likely to do what this colt did. Assuming that to be the natural propensity of this animal under these circumstances, was there any negligence on the part of the defendant? To answer that question one must ask oneself: Is there any duty on the part of the defendant to take reasonable care when he turns an animal like this colt on to the highway without control? Negligence being a breach of duty, one must get at the solution of the problem by asking oneself: Is there a duty? In my opinion, there clearly is. There is that duty on the part of a person who owns a domestic animal, which under certain circumstances is likely to do harm if he turns it on to the highway, to take reasonable precautions to prevent the animal doing harm. LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., said so by implication in his judgment in Heath's Garage, Ltd. v. Hodges (1) ([1910] 2 K.B. at p. 376). That was a case not of a man turning an animal on to the highway, but of a farmer negligently allowing gaps in his fence through which his sheep strayed on to the highway and caused damage to a motor car. The Master of the Rolls says this:

"I am prepared to hold that in ordinary circumstances, in an ordinary highway, it is no breach of duty not to prevent harmless animals like sheep from straying on to the highway, and that it makes no difference whether the action is sought to be based on negligence or on a nuisance to the highway. An animal like a sheep, by nature harmless, cannot fairly be regarded as likely to collide with a motor car, and the owner of the sheep cannot be held liable on that footing."

The Master of the Rolls implies, therefore, that, if the animal, having regard to its propensities under such circumstances as these, is likely to come into collision with a person on a bicycle, or with a motor car, what he said does not apply; and in that case, if there is an absence or omission of duty to take reasonable care, a cause of action lies. I do not think it is necessary for us to say more than this. This colt was likely, on a dark night like this, at all events if not under control, to do exactly what it did; therefore, the defendant, without taking, as the judge found, reasonable care, turned out on the highway an animal likely to cause damage; the animal caused damage, not by doing something mischievous, of which tendency the owner was ignorant, but by doing exactly that which a colt under these circumstances was likely to do. If so, there is the negligence, and there is no want of connection between the negligent act and the damage; the damage flowed immediately from the negligence. I think that the learned judge was perfectly right in his judgment, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

A BAILHACHE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that, in this case, this colt did exactly the damage which the owner of the colt must have anticipated that it would do if the circumstances arose which did in fact arise. Here is a colt, not led by a halter, not secured in any way, driven along a highway at night. In order to induce it to go quietly in the direction in which it was desired, an old mare, with which the colt had been brought up and was familiar, was led in front, and the natural tendency of the colt was to follow the mare, and that was relied on. The defendant came behind in a cart; no doubt the reason, or one of the reasons, of that was that, if the colt was startled, it was sure to dart back, and the defendant, the night being dark, did not want it to run away too far and give trouble to find again. It was being driven along a highway where it was to be anticipated that people would come with lights. The plaintiff came along riding a bicycle, with her lamp alight. It is common knowledge, and was proved, if it was necessary to be proved, that one thing more than another that will frighten an unbroken animal on a highway at night is an unexpected light, such as the bicycle light. The light did frighten the colt. It rushed back, was headed back by the cart, and, rushing about in the road, ran into and knocked down and injured the plaintiff. It seems to me, apart from authority, impossible to hold in those circumstances that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant in driving this colt in that way along this road in the dark. I attach a good deal of importance to the fact that it was dark, because it is perfectly right and proper to use the highway for driving cattle, whatever sort of cattle they are, or colts, along it, but the precautions that ought to be taken in the dark are quite different from those which need to be taken in the light. In the light people can see what there is, and can take some care of themselves. In the dark it is quite impossible to see, unless there is warning, and the learned judge finds that the plaintiff had not any warning.

It seems to me that the test to be applied in all these cases is the test which was laid down by ERLE, C.J., in Cor v. Burbridge (3). The Chief Justice says (13 C.B.N.S. at p. 436):

"I take the well-known distinction to apply here, that the owner of an animal is answerable for any damage done by it, provided it be of such nature as is likely to arise from such an animal, and the owner knows it."

Applying that test, it seems to me that this colt acted in precisely the same way in which a colt ought to be expected to act under the circumstances of this case, and did precisely the damage which such a colt, under such circumstances, ought to be expected to do. In Hudwell v. Righton (4) BRAY, J., said this ([1907] 2 K.B. at p. 349):

"In the absence of anticipated danger, there is no room for the suggestion of negligence."

If that be a proper test to apply, I ask myself this question: Ought there to have been an anticipation of danger? To my mind, that can only be answered in one way. Certainly there ought to have been an anticipation of danger, given the circumstances which arose in this case; and the circumstances of this case were circumstances which were quite likely to arise. There are other ways of getting a colt along a highway at night, and witnesses of experience say that a proper way is to lead it by a halter.

It seems to me that it is impossible to say that the learned judge was wrong in law in saying that there was negligence in this case, and, once one arrives at the conclusion that it is impossible to say that he was erroneous in law, then the question becomes a question of fact, and from that question of fact there is, of course, no appeal to this court. On that ground alone, the learned judge's judgment must be upheld, but my own view is that the learned county court judge was absolutely and entirely right in the decision at which he arrived.

LUSH, J. I should like to add that there has been handed up to me a report of the case, which was mentioned during the argument, of a man employing a drover to drive a cow and a calf: (Pinn v. Rew (5)). The judgment of the Divisional Court seems precisely in accord with the judgments which have just been delivered.

Appeal dismissed.

KING v. DAVID ALLEN & SONS, BILLPOSTING, LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Buckmaster, L.C., Earl Loreburn and Lord Atkinson), February 14, 1916]

[Reported [1916] 2 A.C. 54; 85 L.J.P.C. 229; 114 L.T. 762]

Licence—Breach of agreement—Performance impossible through licensor's own act—Licence to place advertisements on wall of premises to be built—Lease to company of premises by licensor—No term obliging lessees to give effect to licence—Refusal by lessees—Liability of licensor.

By an agreement, not under seal, dated July 1, 1913, entered into between the appellant (described as the licensor) and the respondents (described as the licensees), the appellant gave to the respondents permission to affix advertisements to the flank wall of a picture house, proposed to be erected by a company about to be formed, for a term of four years from November, 1913, or the first day the picture house should be opened for business, whichever should happen first, at a rent of £12 per annum. The picture house was built, but the lease from the appellant to the company contained no reference to the agreement of July 1. The company having refused to allow the respondents to use the wall, they brought an action for damages for breach of the agreement of July 1 against the appellant.

Held: the agreement did not create an interest in land, but it created merely a personal obligation on the part of the appellant to allow the respondents to use the wall for advertising purposes; he had put it out of his power to fulfil his obligation; and, therefore, he was liable in damages for breach of contract.

Decision of the Court of Appeal in Ireland ([1915] 2 I.R. 448), affirmed.

D Appeal by the defendant from an order of the Court of Appeal in Ireland (O'BRIEN, L.C., and RONAN and MOLONY, L.JJ.), affirming a judgment of the Divisional Court (DODD and MADDEN, JJ., KENNY, J., dissenting), which affirmed a judgment of GIBSON, J., awarding the respondents £80 damages for breach of contract.

E The facts are set out in the opinion of LORD BUCKMASTER, L.C.

The Solicitor-General for Ireland (James O'Connor) and St. L. Devitt (Lardner with them) (all of the Irish Bar) for the appellants.

Denis Henry, K.C., and J. Martin Whitaker (both of the Irish Bar) for the respondents.

F LORD BUCKMASTER, L.C.—It is impossible to approach the consideration of this case without feeling and expressing great regret for the unfortunate position in which the appellant, Mr. King, has found himself. He seems to me to have acted throughout the whole of these transactions with perfect straightforwardness and with a sincere and anxious desire to discharge the obligation which he undertook towards the respondents; but, by circumstances which have passed beyond his control, there has, in my view, been a breach of his obligation to the respondents, and for that breach he must be made responsible.

G It appears that Margaret King, the mother of the appellant, had in 1889 entered into an agreement with a man named Dillon for the use by him of a certain space for billposting. The terms of that agreement have been referred to, and counsel for the appellant directed your Lordships' attention to the fact that those terms are of such a nature that they are in themselves applicable to the constitution of the relationship of landlord and tenant. It is not, however, necessary to determine what was the true legal effect of that contract, and for these reasons. While that contract was on foot the appellant, in whom the property had vested, was approached, apparently by a Mr. Farrell, who was anxious to establish a picture palace company in the district. For this purpose, he desired to obtain possession of the site on which the respondents had, in succession to Mr. Dillon, the billposting rights under the previous agreement. It was desirable, therefore, that this agreement should be ended and that a new agreement should be set on foot to give the respondents the rights that they desired in respect of premises that were then about to be built. I think it is plain that the respondents were well acquainted with the circumstances that then existed with regard to the use of this site, and that they knew quite well that it was intended that the company should be formed for the purpose of building on it, thus creating a new structure to which their bills might be affixed. With this knowledge, they entered into an agreement with the appellant of July 1, 1913, on which the whole of the present dispute depends. It is an agreement which was made between the appellant of the one part and the respondents of the other, and, as part of the arrangement leading up to its execution, the previous agreement which had been made between the predecessor in title of the appellant and the predecessor in title of the respondents was cancelled and the new agreement took its place. In the new agreement, the appellant is referred to as licensor and the respondents as licensees. I only mention that fact for the purpose of making quite plain that I attach no importance whatever to these descriptions; they are nothing but a method of reference, and the names might just as well have been lessor and lessee as licensor and licensee. It is not on the use of those phrases that my view of this contract in any way depends.

The agreement itself is quite short, and begins with a clause which says that the appellant will grant to the respondents "permission to affix bills, posters, and advertisements to the flank wall" of the picture palace which is to be erected at the Royal Canal Bank "for a term of four years from Nov. 1, 1913, or the first day the said picture house shall be opened for business," and after that period of four years the document is to be capable of termination by either party on six months' written notice. The next clause provides that the respondents will pay a rent at the rate £12 per annum "so long as this licence remains in force." I attach some considerable importance to this phrase; it is the description in the body of the document of what the parties intended that the document should be, and it is stated in plain language that the description of the document is that of a licence. It is not a letting or a tenancy or anything of the kind, but a licence. And the same phrase is used in a similar connection later on in the agreement, in cl. 5. I have looked anxiously and carefully through this document to see whether it was possible to derive from its construction anything except the creation of a personal obligation between the appellant and the respondents with regard to the use of this wall, and I am unable to find it. There are two circumstances to which attention has been quite properly called by the appellant's counsel, which are, no doubt, important in considering what the agreement effected. The first is the fact of the rent reserved, and the next that there is a term of years granted and that arrangements are introduced into the agreement to prevent other people having competing rights with the respondents on this wall. Those considerations do not, in my opinion, necessarily conflict with the view that this is nothing but a licence—a licence for a fixed term of years, but a licence which creates no estate or interest in the land on which the palace is going to be built, nor an easement to which the land would be thereafter subject.

The subsequent history of the matter is this. A company was duly incorporated on Sept. 2, 1913, and, shortly afterwards, a meeting took place at which the appellant and other directors were present, and there was a discussion and consideration as to what should be done for the purpose of carrying out the arrangement on which the whole future of the company depended, the main part of which was that a lease should be granted to the company of the site on which the building was to stand. At that meeting, a resolution was passed which adopted a prior agreement dated Aug. 29, 1913, made by the appellant with a trustee for the company, that agreement being one by which the company were to take a lease of the premises and to take an assignment of the billposting agreement of July 1. It appears that the lease was executed; it was in proper form, but it contained no reference whatever to the rights of the respondents under the billposting agreement, and no reservation indicating on the face of the document that any rights whatever were reserved out of the demise. In the view that I take of the document of July 1, 1913, I do not think any such reservation was necessary, for the simple reason that no such estate or interest had been created in favour of the respondents; and, indeed, it is plain when the documents are considered that the whole arrangement was intended to be made complete, not by any reservation in the lease, but by an assignment to the company of the benefit of the billposting agreement together

A with its obligation, and, for reasons which are not material, that assignment has never been completed. Had that been done, all the trouble caused by this litigation would have been at an end. It undoubtedly would have bound the company not to interfere with the respondents' rights to put up their bills, and would also have rendered the company directly responsible to the appellant for any breach of their obligations not to interfere. I desire to say no more about that matter for this reason, that it may well be that there are yet rights between the appellant and the company which will enable him to obtain against them either the execution of such further document or a declaration that they are liable to indemnify him for the wrongful act which has taken place. For what has occurred is this. The company, having entered into possession of the premises under the lease and having built the picture palace, forthwith refused to permit the respondents to post their bills, although the company had known throughout that the lease which they had taken of the premises was a lease which had been granted by the appellant, who had contracted with the respondents that they should possess the right of posting their bills against this wall. It is obviously a very undesirable thing to say any words by way of criticism of persons who are not represented before your Lordships' House, and I will, therefore, pass by the temptation to comment on this action of the company, an action which appears to have been insufficiently and, indeed, inaccurately explained in some of their letters.

The matter, then, is left in this way. There is a contract between the appellant and the respondents which creates nothing but a personal obligation. It is licence given for good and valuable consideration and to endure for a certain time. But I fail to see—although I have done my best to follow the many authorities which counsel for the appellant has thought it right to place before our consideration—that there is any authority for saying that any such document creates rights other than those I have described. Wilson v. Tavenor (1) was, indeed, referred to, but it really affords no assistance, for there the right conferred was to erect a hoarding on the defendant's ground, while in the present case the sole right is to fix bills against a flank wall, and it is unreasonable to attempt to construct the relationship of landlord and tenant or grantor and grantee of an easement out of such a transaction, and I find it difficult to see how it can be reasonably urged that anything beyond personal rights was ever contemplated by the parties. Those rights have undoubtedly been taken away by the action on the part of the company, who have been enabled to prevent the respondents from exercising their rights owing to the lease granted by the appellant, and he is, accordingly, liable in damages, although it was certainly not with his will, and, indeed, against his own express desire, that the company has declined to honour his agreement. For these reasons, I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

EARL LOREBURN.—I agree in the opinion expressed by the Lord Chancellor, and with him I greatly regret the position in which the appellant has been placed, which seems to me to be hard on him. He has behaved perfectly honestly in the whole business, and one cannot help regretting the expense to which he has been put.

I have very little to add to what has been said, but I look at the case in this way. The respondents say that the appellant promised them for four years the use of a certain wall for advertising purposes by the agreement of July 1, 1913, and they say that, after that, the appellant demised that land, and that the appellant's lessees refused to make good the promise in regard to advertisement. If the agreement of July 1, which purports to be on the face of it a licence, was equivalent to creating an incorporeal hereditament or a sufficient interest in land, the appellant did not break his contract in making the lease, and would not be responsible for any trespasses that were committed by his licensees. But we must look at the document itself, and it seems to me that it does not create any interest in land at all; it merely amounts to a promise on the part of the appellant that he would allow the other party to the contract to use the wall for advertising purposes, and there was an implied undertaking that he would not disable himself from carrying out his contract. Now the appellant has altered his legal position in respect of his control of this land. Those to whom he granted the lease have disregarded his wishes and refused to allow his bargain to be carried out, and they have been practically enabled to do so by reason of the demise that he executed. In those circumstances, it seems to me that there has been a breach in law of the contract of July 1, and that the appellant has disabled himself from giving effect to it as intended by parting with his right to present possession. That is enough to establish a case for damages against the appellant. There may be a remedy over against the lessees. I say nothing of that, because they are not here, and I do not wish either to encourage or discourage any further proceedings; but this, I think, is clear: That the existence of such a remedy, if remedy there be, does not release the appellant from his liability to answer for breaking the contract which he made.

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur and I have nothing to add.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL (ON THE RELATION OF PICKFORDS, LTD.) v. GREAT NORTHERN RAIL. CO.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Buckmaster, L.C., Earl Loreburn, Viscount Haldane, Lord Shaw and Lord Sumner), May 9, 11, 12, June 6, July 21, 1916]

Bridge—Bridge over railway—Maintenance by railway company—Need to provide for increase of traffic—"Maintain"—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict., c. 20), s. 46.

By s. 46 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845: "If the line of the railway cross any . . . highway, then . . . either such road shall be carried over the railway, or the railway shall be carried over such road, by means of a bridge, of the height and width and with the ascent or descent by this or the special Act in that behalf provided; and such bridge, with the immediate approaches, and all other necessary works connected therewith, shall be executed and at all times thereafter maintained at the expense of the company . . ."

The duty imposed on the railway company by this section is to maintain the bridge in the condition in which it was constructed, and not to enlarge and strengthen it from time to time to meet the needs of modern traffic of increased amount and weight which was unforeseen when the bridge was built.

So held by LORD BUCKMASTER, L.C., EARL LOREBURN, LORD SHAW, and LORD SUMNER, VISCOUNT HALDANE dissenting.

Per LORD SUMNER: "Execute" cannot be construed as "re-execute," and "maintain" does not mean "maintain and alter." Maintenance is, in itself, a word which is not indicative of, but negatives, change.

Appeal by the Attorney-General as relator from a decision of the Court of Appeal reversing one of WARRINGTON, J.

The facts appear in their Lordships' opinions.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., Ernest Charles, K.C., and Jowitt for the Attorney-General. A

Sir John Simon, K.C., Tomlin, K.C., Vernon, and Andrewes-Uthwatt for the railway company.

The House took time for consideration.

July 21, 1916. The following opinions were read. B

LORD BUCKMASTER, L.C.—The question raised in this case is of unusual importance. On the one side it involves an undoubted limitation of the rights of user of public roads carried by a bridge over the lines of a railway company, and on the other it may throw upon railway companies the obligations of reconstructing such bridges from time to time to meet the growing demands of heavy modern traffic. The circumstances under which this case has arisen must exist in many instances, and they are likely to increase. C

The respondent company, by their statute passed in 1867, acquired the undertaking of another railway company known as the Edgware, Highgate, and London Railway Co., and thereby became subject to all the obligations imposed by the special Acts and the public statutes incorporated therewith which had formerly been borne by the original undertakers. The Edgware company had been incorporated by a private Act passed in 1862, by s. 1 of which it was provided that the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, should be incorporated with and form part of the special Act, while by s. 19 the company was authorised to make and maintain the railway in accordance with the deposit plans and sections. The plans which were deposited showed a bridge, which is the bridge in question in these proceedings, by means of which a public highway, known as Crouch End Hill, in the county of Middlesex, through which the railway was to run, was to be carried over the railway. The railway was completed before its acquisition by the respondent company, and the bridge was built for the purpose of carrying the road. There is no dispute that at this time, and for many years afterwards, the bridge was in all respects adequate for the purpose of carrying the proper and ordinary traffic that passed over the road. At some later date, however, though the date is nowhere expressly specified, two waterpipes of 12 in. diameter, which were carried across the bridge when it was constructed, were removed, a waterpipe of 20 in. diameter substituted, and three additional waterpipes, two of 15 in. and one of 12 in. were added. The railway company admitted liability to strengthen the structure of the bridge, so as to provide the same margin of strength over that required to bear the new waterpipes as the margin that existed formerly over that needed for the old, and it would not have been necessary to refer to this matter at all were it not for the fact that the proceedings out of which this appeal has arisen appear, in the first instance, to have been based upon the allegation that the bridge had been so weakened by the added strain of the heavier pipes as to deprive the road that was carried over it of the support which it formerly enjoyed, but even if this were the original ground of complaint, the true dispute that has arisen, and upon which decision is required, is entirely independent of the question of these pipes, and arises in this way. D

Pickfords, Ltd., have placed upon the road heavy motor engines which the bridge is unfitted to bear. They allege, and for the purpose of this case it may be assumed, that the passage of such vehicles would not be regarded as extraordinary traffic upon other portions of the road, and they say that the obligation cast upon the railway company is from time to time to strengthen and, if necessary, to rebuild the bridge, so as to carry all the traffic, whatever it may be, which can lawfully pass over the rest of the road. This is the real question involved in the appeal. E

There was no specification as to the strength and character of the bridge contained in the special Act under which the railway was constructed. The obligation under which the railway company rests is that imposed by s. 46 of the Railways F

A Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which, as I have stated, was incorporated in the special Act authorising the construction of the railway. This section is in these terms :

B "If the line of the railway cross any turnpike road or public highway, then (except where otherwise provided by the special Act) either such road shall be carried over the railway, or the railway shall be carried over such road, by means of a bridge, of the height and width and with the ascent or descent by this or the special Act in that behalf provided; and such bridge, with the immediate approaches, and all other necessary works connected therewith, shall be executed and at all times thereafter maintained at the expense of the company: Provided always, that, with the consent of two or more justices of petty sessions, as after mentioned, it shall be lawful for the company to carry C the railway across any highway, other than a public carriage road, on the level."

The statute contains no definition whatever, nor indeed would it be required, of the height of a bridge that carries the road. It is only the height of a bridge that crosses a road, to which reference is made in the subsequent section of the Act. So far as a bridge carrying a road is concerned, the only material provisions are D those contained in ss. 50 and 51, and these specified only the width, the fences, and the ascent to the bridge. In this case it is admitted that the bridge was originally adequate, and I think the provisions that secure its adequacy are more effective than the appellant in argument was prepared to admit. It is urged by the appellant that these provisions create no standard of strength, and that this E can only be formed by making the bridge satisfy the essential condition that it must carry the road and the traffic that the road from time to time must bear.

By s. 4 of the Railway Regulation Act, 1842, provision is made that no railway shall be opened until after notice to the Lords of the Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council, appointed for trade and foreign plantations, which is now the Board of Trade, and by s. 6, if on inspection there is reason to think that by any incompleteness of the works the opening of the railway would be attended with danger, F the opening of the railway may be postponed until it appears that such opening can safely take place. The works undoubtedly include the bridges which carry the roads, and regulations made under this statute require the deposit of the plans showing the structure of those bridges in order that their strength may be ascertained. These considerations only show the means by which the adequacy of the bridge is first established. They do not touch the question whether the liability G under s. 46 is to maintain the bridge which has been so passed or to maintain any bridge that may hereafter be required.

This question, which is one of undoubted difficulty, would have been attended with far greater uncertainty had it not been for the decision of this House in Sharpness New Docks and Gloucester and Birmingham Navigation Co. v. A.-G. (1). H In that case a canal company were proposing to take their canal through a highway, and the Act which authorised the construction of the works provided that this highway should be carried by a bridge of such dimensions and in such manner as the commissioners should approve, and obligations were cast upon the canal company to maintain such bridge. The case decided two important and relevant matters. First, that where a private Act casts upon a corporation the burden of I maintaining a particular bridge which carries a highway across their works, the question of what would be the common law liability of the person who had intercepted a highway under similar circumstances was irrelevant for the purpose of construing the statute. If the statute imposed the duty of maintaining a defined structure, that liability was the true limit of the obligations of the company. Secondly, that an obligation expressed in general terms "from time to time to maintain and support" such a bridge did not involve the rebuilding of the structure and was only consistent with maintaining the structure that had once been erected. If, therefore, s. 46 in this case imposes upon the railway company the obligation only of repairing a particular bridge—namely, the bridge which was properly erected to carry the road when the railway was made—then all outside considerations as to what the obligations might have been apart from the statute become irrelevant, and no greater duty than that of maintaining such a bridge is cast on them by the statute.

In my opinion, this is all that the statute does. The road is to be carried by the bridge, and it is such a bridge, with the immediate approaches and all other necessary works, which has to be executed and thereafter maintained at the company's expense. I cannot think that these words mean that such bridge is to be a changing and varying structure, altered from time to time to meet the growth of traffic wholly unforeseen and unexpected when the railway was made. There are no words in the section that imply that the structure, when once properly made to bear the road, has ever to be rebuilt in a new and strengthened form, and the only way in which the appellant urges that this meaning can be introduced into the language of the Act is by saying that the road itself is a varying and inconstant quality, and that the bridge must carry the road whatever the road may be. This, I think, puts upon the word "road" a meaning that, in this connection, it is not authorised to bear. The bridge is only bound to carry the road through which the railway passes, and that is the road determined at the moment when the railway is built, for it does not follow at all that the road within the meaning of the section is the same thing as the use of the road, which may change from time to time. I think, further, confirmation of this view is to be found in the section which relates to the widening of a bridge in case the original construction is of inadequate width. It is a remarkable thing that the Act expressly provides the way in which the road is to be altered so as to be made wider if the increased demands of traffic require it, while no corresponding provision whatever is to be found as to its being made stronger in case the traffic becomes more burdensome. In this view of the case it is not necessary to consider whether SWINFEN EADY, L.J., was correct in thinking that under s. 66 there was power to refer any doubt as to the strength of the original structure to the Board of Trade. It is urged by the appellant that such reference could only be made where there was an attempted deviation from the compliance of the terms of the statute, and the learned lord justice undoubtedly assumes that the power extends to all questions arising on construction, whether the provisions of the Act are departed from or no. I am far from saying that his view in this matter is incorrect, but this it is unnecessary to decide. It is, however, useful to notice that when the certificate is given, the certificate, if it related to a bridge, would be a certificate that the bridge was constructed in conformity with the provisions of the Act. It is the bridge constructed in conformity with the provisions of the Act which the railway company are bound to maintain, and they are, in my opinion, subject to no further or added liability.

I have avoided expressing any opinion upon the question how far traffic of an unusually heavy character placed for the first time upon a road constitutes a lawful user of the highway. It may well be that such traffic is of such a nature that its presence may constitute a nuisance, and that the use of the highway thereby may be unlawful; and, if this be so, no repeated succession of unlawful acts could ever make the user right. But apart from this, there may be unusually heavy traffic, which, originally extraordinary traffic, upon a particular road becomes ordinary owing to the changed circumstances of the district through which the road runs, and I have throughout assumed that it is this latter form of traffic which Pickfords, Ltd., desire to place on the road, and which the bridge is unfit to bear. In my opinion the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right and this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

EARL LOREBURN.—The point in this appeal is quite short and has already been stated. In my opinion, the Court of Appeal were right. What the railway

A company was required long ago to build consisted of a specific structure to be built so as to comply with given conditions. It was built in compliance with those conditions to the satisfaction of those concerned, so far as we know, and has stood ever since. That was the thing which the railway company had to maintain with the road on the top of it. If the language of the Act imposed upon this company either the duty of originally building a bridge of size, strength, and quality sufficient to meet all possible requirements of the future, or the duty of from time to time reconstructing the bridge so as to keep pace with successive advances in the carriage of heavy traffic along roads, then of course it would be binding upon me. I find no such language, but merely a direction to build a bridge and maintain it together with the road upon it. Whether or not the strength or the details are specified in the Act seems to me of no importance, provided that the thing built complies with what the Act requires. If the Act merely directs a bridge to be built, then it would be a bridge reasonably suitable according to the standard at the time for the purpose designated. The railway company is not called upon to do more. I agree with LORD SUMNER's opinion as to what the Act does require. If traffic heavier than the prescribed bridge will bear is placed upon the road the fault is not with the bridge or those who have to maintain it and the road over it, but with the people to whom Parliament has secured a way with a certain measure of strength and who think fit to place upon it weights in excess of that measure. Sharpness New Docks and Gloucester and Birmingham Navigation Co. v. A.-G. (1), as I understand the decision, is in accordance with this view. I thoroughly agree with that decision. Even if I did not agree with it, I should be obliged to follow it. But if some of the language used in the debate on that case bears the construction sought to be placed upon it in the argument at the Bar, then I should respectfully differ and should say that it was not necessary for the decision. To my mind, there is not any legal presumption in regard to the construction of an Act of Parliament such as was pressed upon us. There have been, it is true, expressions of opinion by very high authorities. But the Act speaks for itself and the law does not, I think, attach to its construction any rule beyond the ordinary canons of construction. I do not follow the view that any special presumption can be invoked for the purpose of interpreting an Act which authorises the interruption of a highway. When the Act imposes a duty of repairing the newly-made road you would naturally, though not necessarily, expect the new authority to be invested with the same obligations as its predecessor, but the burden may be made heavier or lighter. I see no presumption of law either way. In the present case, and I think in most if not all cases, the Act itself says what is to be done. Here it says, to be sure, that the road is to be maintained—the road across the bridge. I cannot read that as meaning that the railway company may be called on to pull down the bridge or alter its character in order to suit the road's new burdens, if there are such burdens. For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal fails. I express no opinion in regard to the duty of road authorities to make provision for special kinds or degrees of traffic. The question does not arise here because the duty of the railway company as to the support of the road by the bridge depends on statute. It is a difficult question and will require full argument.

VISCOUNT HALDANE.—I regret that I am unable to concur in the conclusion to which I gather that the majority of your Lordships have come in this case. The question is whether the Court of Appeal were right in holding that the obligation of the respondents was limited to the maintenance of the bridge which carries the public highway from Hornsey Road to Crouch End over their railway merely in the same condition as to strength in relation to traffic as it was at the date of its completion some forty-eight years ago, and that the obligation did not extend to maintaining the bridge, by improving and strengthening it where necessary for the purpose, in such a fashion as to enable it to bear the ordinary traffic of the district coming along that public highway, which might reasonably be expected to pass over it according to the standard of the present day. The highway with which the controversy is concerned was severed by the Edgware, Highgate, and London Railway Co., in the exercise of statutory powers conferred on it by a special Act of 1862, which incorporated the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. Pursuant to obligations imposed by s. 46 and other sections of the latter and general Act, the bridge in question was constructed. Under a later statute the respondents have succeeded to the obligations of the original company.

Questions resembling, in point of principle, that before us, have come before the courts in a series of cases, of which the following are examples: R. v. Inhabitants of Kent (2), R. v. Inhabitants of Lindsey (3), R. v. Kerison (4), R. v. Inhabitants of Isle of Ely, Old Bedford Bridge and New Bedford Bridge Cases (5), Hertfordshire County Council v. Great Eastern Rail. Co. (6), and Macclesfield Corpn. v. Great Central Rail. Co. (7). I think that a principle has been developed by the decisions of the court in these cases, and that it is one which commends itself on general grounds as well as by reason of the weight of a series of authorities. The principle is that where persons acting under statutory powers conferred on them for their own convenience, interrupt a highway, they will, unless the statute provides otherwise, be presumed to be under an obligation to construct such works as will restore to the public the use of the highway, and to maintain the works at their own expense in a condition adequate to the public need. When, under such circumstances, the public road which has been interrupted is restored by being carried on a bridge, the bridge and the road, which thus forms part of it, must be kept up to such a standard as will admit of the public enjoying the facilities for ordinary traffic over the road that they would have had if the interruption had not taken place, and if the substituted works had not been executed. This principle can, of course, be excluded if the legislature thinks fit to do so in unambiguous words. As Lord DUNEDIN observed in the recent case of Sharpness New Docks and Gloucester and Birmingham Navigation Co. v. A.-G. (1), if the statute which authorises the works goes on to define what are to be the rights and obligations following from the execution of the statutory act, it is in the language of the legislature, and there alone, that rights and remedies are to be looked for.

It is said that in the present appeal we are bound by the decision in the Sharpness Case (1). I took a leading part in advising the House as to the decision which was then given, and I am not likely to be wanting in loyalty to the view taken by this House on that occasion. But what was that view? Certainly not that we were laying down any novel principle, or making a precedent which would be decisive in the construction of a statute differing substantially from that which we were then construing. All the House did was to interpret the particular language of a private Act in order to ascertain whether the Act itself contained such an exhaustive definition of rights and duties as would, in accordance with Lord DUNEDIN'S canon, exclude the general principle to which I referred at the outset as imposing an obligation if the statute did not exclude it. With all deference to those who think otherwise, I am quite unable to read the judgment of this House in the Sharpness Case (1) as having done more than interpret a particular set of words. And in interpreting other words in another statute such a judgment can render no more assistance than that which is derived by a court which has to construe a will of personal estate from decisions on other and differently worded wills. In the Sharpness Case (1) the private Act appointed commissioners who were to determine what should be done, and provided that the company were not to "make the said canal . . . across any common highway . . . until they shall . . . have made and perfected such bridges . . . across such highway . . . and of such dimensions and in such manner as the commissioners . . . shall adjudge proper; and all such . . . bridges . . . to be made shall from time to time be supported, maintained, and kept in sufficient repair by the said company."

- A These words were interpreted as giving the commissioners a complete discretion as to strength, materials, and any other particulars, and as enabling them to look ahead and take account of future developments of traffic. The bridges which were to be made, and from time to time maintained and supported, as the commissioners should determine, were constructed in a fashion approved by them in 1812, and, as so constructed, were maintained at the standard which the
- B commissioners had in 1812 determined as that which was to regulate their construction once for all. The House of Lords held that the words used prescribed unambiguously the extent of an obligation which, by its terms, excluded a standard higher than that which the commissioners had prescribed. It was for the latter to consider and finally prescribe the standard. When they had certified what was to be made and perfected, with a view to the future, it might be, as well as to the
- C past, they had defined the extent of the duty of the company and became functi officio.

- The words of s. 46 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, are very different. To begin with, there are no commissioners introduced whose decision is to prescribe the obligation. The road is simply directed in general terms by the statute to be carried over the railway by means of a bridge. The only standards prescribed
- D as standards by which the obligation to construct the bridge is in terms regulated are standards relating exclusively to height and width and to ascent and descent. As to strength and material, which were equally within the unlimited power of prescription of the statutory commissioners in the Sharpness Case (1), not one word is said in s. 46. If obligations of the railway company as to these were intended to be excluded from the operation of the general principle which the
- E decided cases have, as I believe, established, one would expect to find an intention to that effect expressed in the section, more particularly as it has provided for the particular cases of height and width. But all that is said in s. 46 is that

- “such bridge [that is, the bridge by which the road is directed in general terms to be carried over the railway], with the immediate approaches, and all other
- F necessary works connected therewith, shall be executed and at all times thereafter maintained at the expense of the company.”

- If this be really all that is said in the statute it would seem to me plain that the duty to maintain the road which the bridge includes extends to the necessities of the ordinary traffic which the public are from time to time entitled to bring along the road. This conclusion is, in my opinion, the only one which is consistent with
- G the general principle established by the authorities to which I have previously referred, and also with another principle which was not seriously questioned in the argument for the respondents, that the body which is charged with the duty of maintaining a highway has to maintain it in a condition which will enable it to carry the ordinary traffic on that highway in whatever form that ordinary traffic may develop.

- H If this be so, the duty of the respondents is to do what is necessary to strengthen the bridge, so that it may be adequate to the requirements of the ordinary traffic of to-day on the road. It is suggested that other sections in the Railway Regulation Act, 1842, and in the Railways Clauses Act show that there is no such duty on the company. I have examined the sections referred to and I do not think they bear
- I out this contention. Turning first to s. 6 of the Railway Regulation Act, 1842, this section only enables a government Department to postpone the opening of the railway in case the government inspector shall report that such opening would be attended with danger to the public “by reason of the incompleteness of the works.” Surely that must mean incompleteness at the time of their original construction. Section 49 of the Railways Clauses Act relates only to the case of bridges which carry the railway over roads, and makes provision in that event for the regulation of the width and height of arches. Section 50 deals with bridges to be erected for carrying roads over railways, but it prescribes nothing, excepting as to fences and to width and ascent, to which s. 46 had already referred. Section 51 enacts that where the width of the road is itself less than the width prescribed for the bridge by s. 50, the width of the latter may be diminished correspondingly, but must be increased correspondingly up to the prescribed maximum if the width of the road is thereafter increased. Section 65 enables the justices, on the application of the surveyor of roads, or of any two householders of the parish or district, to compel the company to maintain or keep in repair any bridge which is found to be out of repair. Section 66 provides that in case any difference shall arise between the company and any authority empowered to enforce the construction of the roads, bridges, or works as to the construction, alteration, or restoration of the same, the Board of Trade may decide on the proper manner of such construction, alteration, or restoration, and authorise any arrangement or mode of construction which shall appear to them to be in substantial compliance with the provisions of the Railways Clauses Act or the special Act, provided that they are satisfied that existing private rights or interests will not be injuriously affected thereby. I am unable to see that any of these sections which I have just referred to affect the construction of s. 46 on the only point which is material in this appeal. As to s. 46 itself, I think that, for the reasons I have stated, it is an enactment of radically different structure from that which was interpreted by this House in the Sharpness Case (1). It appears to me that, unlike the latter enactment, its language does not exclude the operation of the general principles to which I have adverted, and that accordingly the judgment of the Court of Appeal was wrong.

LORD SHAW.—In my opinion, the obligations of the respondents are to be measured by the language of the statutes under which the railway was constructed and the bridges made.

By the Edgware, Highgate, and London Railway Act, 1862, it was provided that the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, should be incorporated with and form part thereof. The bridge which is in question in this case was constructed between the years 1862 and 1867 in accordance with the various railway statutes and the requirements thereunder of the Board of Trade. So far as the Consolidation Act of 1845 is concerned the obligation was in the terms already quoted—the road was to be “carried over” the railway “by means of a bridge of the height and width and with the ascent or descent by this or the special Act in that behalf provided,” and such bridge and the works connected therewith “shall be executed and at all times thereafter maintained at the expense of the company.” There are two views of this section, and at the present very critical development of road traffic in England the question at issue between the parties is of great importance. Road traffic has so developed, and in particular in certain districts, local requirements have so changed, in recent years, that great alterations have been necessitated in order to give the accommodation and the strength which these developments require. In the present case it is conceded that heavy road motor traffic is legitimately placed upon the roads, but would subject the existing bridge to a strain which it is unable from its structure to bear. It is accordingly demanded that the road, thus necessarily altered, strengthened, and, it may be, enlarged throughout the district, should be linked up by the bridge so as to be “carried” to the full effect of enabling the purpose of through-going traffic to be achieved. The other view is that such alterations, strengthenings, and enlargement, however expedient, do not fall within the scope of the obligation of maintenance, which, and which alone, falls upon the railway company. The Court of Appeal has decided that the respondents

“are liable to maintain the bridge in question in the same condition as to strength in relation to traffic as it was at the date of its completion, but that the defendants are not under any liability to improve and strengthen the bridge to make it sufficient to bear the ordinary traffic of the district which may be

A reasonably expected to pass over it according to the standard of the present day."

This is a strong, clear, and wide pronouncement, and it was argued that the result of it will be to render the heaviest through-going traffic impossible, and that in that way the network of road accommodation throughout the country must be broken by the bridge described, and by all others in similar case.

B In Hertfordshire County Council v. Great Eastern Rail. Co. (6) MOULTON, L.J., said ([1909] 2 K.B. at p. 412):

C "In my opinion the law, as settled by the cases of R. v. Inhabitants of Kent (2), R. v. Inhabitants of Lindsey (3), R. v. Kerrison (4) and R. v. Inhabitants of Isle of Ely, Old Bedford Bridge and New Bedford Bridge Cases (5), practically amounts to this: that where persons, acting under statutory authority, for their own purposes interrupt a highway by some work which renders it impossible for the public to use it, an obligation is prima facie imposed upon them to construct such works as may be necessary to restore to the public the use of the highway so interrupted, and that the obligation so imposed is of a continuing nature, involving not only the construction of such works, but also their maintenance."

D Were this important matter, my Lords, left to be settled upon a general principle, it appears to me to be not improbable that the one thus enunciated by MOULTON, L.J., might be found a safe guide in the solution of the practical difficulty which has emerged. But, in view of the judgment of this House in the Sharnness Case (1), I do not feel myself able to hold that the proposition so expressed can now be maintained to be law. As was said in that case by the noble and learned E viscount who has preceded me, where statutory provisions are made, it is they which form the rule of liability if the statute "contains a set of provisions which appear on their face to be exhaustive . . ." Referring to s. 61 of the Act then under consideration, he observed that it "does not appear to me to admit of any resort to the assumption based on the analogy of the common law." In the judgment of LORD DUNEDIN the cases founded on by MOULTON, L.J., are examined, F and there my noble friend said ([1915] A.C. at p. 663) that he was unable to agree with the dictum, "which, in my opinion, is too broadly expressed, as it would import a common law obligation running side by side with the expressed statutory obligations." LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON said ([1915] A.C. at p. 669):

G "It is one thing to rely upon a common law principle where a statute is silent; it is quite another thing to invoke a common law principle in order to impose obligations different from or in addition to the obligations which are defined by the statute."

This is also the view of LORD PARMOOR.

H It is thus vital to see what was the extent of the statutory obligation in the present case. The appellant argued that the railway company's obligation was that "such road shall be carried over the railway," and that this involved that, as the road traffic developed and the road required additional dimensions and strength, so with the bridge, which otherwise would not be carrying the road. The consequence of such an argument might result in much public convenience: but, of course, it would involve an enormous addition to railway obligations. The reply to this I argument was that the statutory obligation was not left in the general terms of merely carrying over such road, but that the means were prescribed by which this obligation was to be performed—namely, "by means of a bridge of the height and width and with the ascent or descent provided" by statute, and that it was such bridge and no other which was to be executed and maintained for the future. It is, accordingly, necessary to pause to consider exactly what was required by the various statutory enactments with which the railway company constructing the line had to comply. Under the Railway Regulation Act, 1842, certain documents had to be deposited with the Board of Trade before the railway was opened, and it is admitted that the respondents' statement is correct that "among the documents so required to be deposited were drawings in detail of all bridges or viaducts either over or under the railway, accompanied by sufficient information to enable the strength of each bridge to be ascertained by calculation." These requirements were complied with; and, in terms of the statute, the detailed drawings were deposited with the Board of Trade. Nor is it denied that from these and from the dimensions contained therein the carrying power of the bridge could be estimated. The railway was inspected, was approved by the Board of Trade's officer, and was opened, the bridge in question being also approved. So far, according as the working out of the Acts are concerned, the resultant situation was the same, in my humble opinion, as if this particular bridge, with its specific dimensions and its consequential strength, had been the subject of express statutory stipulation for erection and maintenance.

In regard to maintenance, it should be further observed that there is nowhere in the statute any obligation, so far as can be discovered, with regard to the increase of the strength of the bridge according to future traffic requirements. I feel bound to assume that when the Board of Trade inspection took place the officials of the Department would to some extent see that a margin was allowed for the reasonable anticipations of development of the road traffic—that, in short, the proximate future would be provided for; and I respectfully agree with the opinion of LORD PARMEOR in the Sharpness Case (1) on this point. In the Consolidation Act of 1845 there is, however, one section in which a reference is in fact made to operations upon bridges "after the construction of the railway." I refer to s. 51. It provides that "if at any time after the construction of the railway the average available width of any such road shall be increased beyond the width of such bridge on either side thereof, the company shall be bound, at their own expense, to increase the width of the bridge to such extent as may be required . . ." This, it will be observed, is as to width only. But even there a limit is put to the obligations of the railway company by these words "not exceeding the width of such road as so widened, or the maximum width herein or in the special Act prescribed." This in one view is indicative of the desire of Parliament to make it clear that even with regard to the future on the point of width the limits of railway obligation should be clearly defined. To take the instance which I put in the course of the argument if a narrow carriage road (crossing a railway by a bridge) was increased to 40 ft. in width, it seems reasonably clear from the other clauses of the Act of Parliament that the maximum width to which the railway company would be obliged to go in accommodating the bridge to the road would be a width of only 25 ft. The idea, in short, of the exact equation of accommodation between road and bridge or of any obligation of the railway company upon such a footing is thus negatived. With regard to the strength of the bridge there is no provision whatsoever, limited or unlimited, for future increase or alteration thereof. I cannot, in these circumstances, hold that such a provision should be read into the statute, which, as already explained, I hold to be the measure of the respondent's obligations. I am, accordingly, of opinion that the judgment of the learned Lords of the Court of Appeal is correct.

LORD SUMNER.—The construction of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 46, is the real question in this appeal. Though the case has been twice elaborately argued, I think the meaning of the section remains tolerably clear. As applied to this railway the section required that in 1867 the undertakers should carry the public highway in question, known as Crouch End Hill, over their railway "by means of a bridge of the height and width and with the ascent or descent by this or the special Act in that behalf provided," and that "such bridge, with the immediate approaches and all other necessary works connected therewith," should be "executed" by the undertakers. All this they did. Furthermore, by the Railway Regulation Act, 1842, s. 6, the public Department concerned was empowered and

A bound to inspect the bridge and works connected with it along with the rest of the undertaking. If the officers appointed should report that, in their opinion, the opening of the railway would be attended with danger to the public using the same by reason of the incompleteness of the works or permanent way, then the Department had the power and duty of preventing the railway from being opened for traffic until it should appear "that such opening may take place without danger to the public." In my opinion, incompleteness here covers not merely the case of a bridge designed to be strong enough, but not yet fully executed or completed, but also a bridge which, though fully executed according to the design, is incomplete because neither the design nor the execution has provided strength sufficient to bear the load: see per JESSEL, M.R., in A.-G. v. Great Western Rail. Co. (8), 4 Ch.D. at p. 739. Further, the "public" in question was clearly not confined to the members of the public who were to use the railway undertaking by passing under the bridge in trains, but included those who were to use it by passing above the trains by means of the bridge, and the danger was not confined to their persons, but extended to their goods, their vehicles, their draught animals, and so forth. On the face of this section the statutory duty which it imposes could not be performed unless the officials engaged had a full and proper opportunity of knowing the mode of construction of the bridge and of judging thereby its safety for the statutory object. Counsel for the respondents very pertinently showed, by reference to existing Board of Trade regulations employed in practice by the Department, that, as might be expected, requirements can be, and are, formulated, which enable its officials to judge, among other things, the strength and durability of such a structure, and the drawings supplied by the parties to your Lordships with the record show that the plans actually deposited during the construction gave ample materials for criticising the strength of the bridge.

When the bridge was executed in or shortly before 1867, all these requirements were complied with: its height and width and ascent or descent were in accordance with the relevant sections of the Act, and the public officials concerned declared themselves satisfied. Accordingly, I am unable to see how it can be said that the bridge was not "executed" in accordance with the section. No question has arisen until recently as to the strength or sufficiency of the bridge. It carried the public highway across the railway, and did so efficiently, not only when the railway was opened, but, as is admitted on all hands, for many years thereafter. Changes have now taken place of a sort with which we are all familiar. The judgment of WARRINGTON, J., describes the traffic, which the relators assert that the bridge ought to be able to carry, as "heavy motor traffic," by which I understand not that the traffic of motor cars is heavy because many motor cars pass along the road, but that the traffic crossing the bridge includes heavy motors, self-propelling vehicles of a weight and energy that cause a particular strain on the bridge. The appellant's case is that, even if the bridge was duly "executed" in 1867, the respondents are now bound and compellable by law to maintain the bridge in such a fashion that it will safely carry such traffic; nay, more, that they are bound, in case of need, to reconstruct the bridge for the purpose, and so on, whenever hereafter further mechanical discoveries bring into use heavier and heavier vehicles, or such as in any other way load and strain the bridge beyond its capacity for the time being. Such a contention cannot, in my opinion, be rested on the word "execute." There are no words which expand this into "re-execute to a higher standard in the future." Nor can I think that it comes under the obligation as to maintenance. The section requires the respondents (they are the successors to the original undertakers) to maintain such bridge as is required to be executed in the first instance—"such bridge . . . shall be executed . . . and at all times thereafter maintained at the expense of the company." "Maintain" does not naturally mean maintain and alter, nor does "maintain such bridge"—namely, the bridge previously executed—naturally mean maintain it, not as it was executed, but as something indefinitely different, stronger, more durable, and possibly of wholly dissimilar structure, material, or design. It is said that this meaning, which I venture to call unnatural, is imposed on the words used, both as to execution and maintenance, because "such bridge" is to be the means of carrying such road over the railway. So it is; but, so far, there is nothing to show that such road is anything more than the physical road known about 1866, apparently, as "Crouch End Hill."

The argument proceeds that, in relation to that road, the common law conferred on the public certain rights and imposed corresponding duties on the road authority, extending to a progressive improvement of the road as and when the growth of heavy motor traffic might require; that nothing in this section shows any intention on the part of the legislature to lessen those rights or those duties; and that, as the bridge is but a new link in the line of the old highway, the contrary intention must be presumed. Hence the duties of the highway authorities must, in respect of the part of the highway which the bridge carries, be deemed to have been transferred to the respondents as owners of the bridge. To this contention I think the short answer must be that the section is concerned with a physical thing to be executed in presenti and to be maintained in futuro, and it is engaged in telling the undertakers what they are to do then and there. Having done so, it clearly adds, "that which is hereby directed to be made shall at all times thereafter be maintained." Maintenance is, in itself, a word which is not indicative of, but negatives, change. What is maintained is a status quo. It does not point to a higher standard of attainment. Except that by implication it assures to the public the same measure of dedication as a free highway or accessibility as a turnpike road as had previously attached to the road formerly carried on solid earth and now carried by means of a bridge. I do not think the section has any concern with the duties of road authorities as such, or of public bridge authorities as such. The section is an adoptive section. It assumes a special Act of Parliament, authorising a line of railway to be carried across the line of a highway, with which it is incorporated. The section is in terms applicable equally to turnpike roads and to public highways. It takes no account of subsequent events, such as the disturnpiking of the road. It applies to them as they are. Possibly it may be that in the result the public now loses some advantages in respect of Crouch End Hill which it would have enjoyed if the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, had never passed, or the railway in question had never been made. This cannot be helped. The statute will have it so. If the legislature in 1845 did not see ahead beyond the end of the century, it, at any rate, exercised a degree of foresight that has not always been equalled in public affairs.

I think that the contention on behalf of the relators fails. I have arrived at this conclusion on the bare language of the section itself, but I conceive that it is also involved in your Lordships' recent decision in the Sharpness Case (1). There, as here, the undertaking was laid out along a line intersecting sundry public highways. There, as here, the legislature prescribed for the undertakers expressly what they were to do, and, by implication, what they need not do. This is what is called a code. There, as here, they were to carry the roads over the canal by means of bridges. There certain commissioners were to say affirmatively what those bridges were to be in dimension, strength, and design; here the legislature fixes some of these particulars, and empowers a public Department to fix the rest negatively by bringing the undertaking to a stand, unless it is satisfied. This merely varies the mechanism. It does not affect the principle. In each case the legislature prescribes a bridge for present erection and future maintenance. It says: "Do this and your duty is done." By what precise steps or from what sources the particulars of the works to be executed are prescribed cannot be material, as soon as they are ascertained. In the course of the argument, a good deal was contended for as to the duties of road authorities in regard to new traffic over a bridge forming part of a highway, to which I should not be disposed to assent without further consideration, nor do I, for my own part, wish to be taken as A expressing any opinion, except on the construction of s. 46 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. I agree that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

COOK v. DEEKS AND OTHERS

Company—Director—Profit from contract—Liability to account to company.

Directors of a construction company negotiated with a railway company a contract on their own behalf, but in exactly the same manner as that in which they had previously acted when negotiating contracts for the construction company, and with the advantage of the successful completion by the construction company of contracts for the railway company in the past. When all the necessary preliminaries of the contract had been concluded the directors formed a new company to carry it out, and at a meeting of the construction company, owing to their voting power, they secured the passing of a resolution declaring that the construction company had no interest in the contract and authorising them as directors to defend an action brought by the plaintiff, a minority shareholder, against them and the new company for a declaration that they and the new company were trustees of the benefit of the contract for the construction company.

Held: the directors were guilty of a breach of duty in the course they took to secure the contract: they could not retain the benefit of that contract for themselves, but must be regarded as holding it on behalf of the construction company; the resolution the passing of which they had secured was ineffective to regularise the position: and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to the declaration which he claimed.

Appeal from an order of the Supreme Court of Ontario, Appellate Division, affirming an order of MIDDLETON, J., at the trial dismissing the action with costs.

The action was brought by the appellant on behalf of himself and all other shareholders in the Toronto Construction Co., Ltd., against the respondents, G. S. Deeks, G. M. Deeks, T. R. Hinds, and the Dominion Construction Co., Ltd., for a declaration that the respondents were trustees for the Toronto Construction Co., Ltd. (which had been joined as a defendant), of the benefit of a contract, dated April 1, 1912, and made between the individual respondents and the Canadian Pacific Railway Co.

Nisbett, K.C., and A. M. Stewart for the appellant.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., and R. McKay, K.C., for the respondents.

Feb. 23, 1916. LORD BUCKMASTER, L.C.—The appellant is the plaintiff in a suit brought against the respondents, under circumstances to which full reference is necessary. His rights depend entirely upon the fact that he is, and has, throughout the whole history of those proceedings, been, a shareholder in the Toronto Construction Co., Ltd., one of the defendants in the suit. Between himself and the defendants G. S. Deeks, G. M. Deeks, and T. R. Hinds, there have been at sundry times various business arrangements and relationships outside their association in the Toronto Construction Co.; but, except for the purpose of explaining what may have caused the conduct to which these proceedings are due, it is unnecessary to refer at length to these relationships.

The Toronto Construction Co., was formed in 1905. It appears that at the date of its incorporation all the parties were in business in various parts of the Dominion of Canada and the United States of America as contractors. The two defendants—G. S. Deeks and G. M. Deeks—were in partnership, and had just completed for the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. a subway under the track of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Winnipeg. In 1905 the Canadian Pacific Railway were asking for tenders for the construction of a line from Bolton to Parry Sound, known as the Toronto-Sudbury Line, and the tenders of G. S. Deeks made, as it would appear, on behalf of the firm of Deeks and Deeks, were accepted by the company. Before tendering, arrangements had been made by Messrs. Deeks with a firm of Winters, Parsons, and Boomer that they should take an interest in the contract to the extent of one-half if G. S. Deeks were successful in obtaining it. Mr. Winters, however, had assumed certain obligations which rendered him unwilling to accept his full share of responsibility, and the plaintiff and the defendant, Hinds, were accordingly introduced by him to Mr. Deeks, in order to implement his obligation, with the result that all the parties agreed to share in the contract in the following proportions: G. S. Deeks and G. M. Deeks to take three-eighths; the plaintiff and the defendant Hinds to take three-eighths; and Winters, Parsons and Boomer one-quarter. In order to place these relationships upon a fixed foundation, and the better to define their interests, the Toronto Construction Co. was formed, and its share capital distributed in the proportions mentioned, the company taking over and carrying out the work under the contract. In 1906 Messrs. Winter and Boomer withdrew from the company, and the stock that they held was divided equally among the remaining parties, so that G. S. Deeks and G. M. Deeks, the plaintiff, and Hinds, each held a quarter of the capital of the company, with the exception of four shares held by Mrs. Deeks (the wife of George S. Deeks), whose introduction as a shareholder was necessary in order to provide the total number of five. These interests have remained unchanged down to the present time. The board of directors was comprised of Messrs. Deeks, Hinds, and the plaintiff, and, in addition, George S. Deeks was appointed president of the company, the plaintiff was general manager, and Hinds was secretary and treasurer, though their Lordships do not think that the description of these officers affords an accurate description of the duties assumed and discharged by the various parties. The company appears to have carried out the work at laying the Toronto-Sudbury line to the entire satisfaction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they continued to tender, and were fortunate in obtaining a considerable

A number of other contracts of great value from the Canadian Pacific Railway. Apart, however, from this work, they undertook no other contracts. As has been already stated, during part of the time of the operations of the company the plaintiff and the three defendants were associated together in various other enterprises of a similar nature in Montana and in the west, but no contracts were taken in the east except by the Toronto Construction Co.

B In 1907 disagreement appears to have arisen between the parties, and the different firms which had been constructed between them, and were all partnerships at will, were dissolved, and the parties refused to enter into any further voluntary arrangements between themselves. In 1909 the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. invited tenders for an important contract, known as Seaboard Number 2, a contract which involved the continuation of a line which had been already laid by the Toronto Construction Co. This contract was tendered for by the company, in competition with others, in the usual way. Their tenders did not appear to be the lowest. In consideration, however, of the company having previously constructed the line known as Seaboard Number 1, the company was given the contract at the lowest price. The date of that contract was May 14, 1910. Seaboard Number 3 was again taken up on behalf of the Toronto Construction Co., and apparently the negotiations for it were entirely conducted by Mr. Hinds, or at any rate by Mr. Hinds and Mr. Deeks, while finally a contract known as the Guelph Junction and Hamilton Branch was also taken on April 29, 1911, Mr. Leonard acting for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and either G. S. or G. M. Deeks acting on behalf of the company. As this contract was nearing completion, the defendant Hinds gave the manager of the Toronto Construction Co.—H. F. McLean—

E instructions to get the work through as quickly as possible, as other work was coming up. The statement upon this matter is important, and it had better be given in the actual words, taken from the evidence of Mr. McLean:

“Q. Was the work on the Seaboard line No. 2 and No. 3 handled in any respect in any exceptional way? Was there anything out of the ordinary in the way that work was handled?—A. I do not know that it was. Q. Was it proceeded with at the ordinary rate of expedition?—A. No, I think we made better progress on that line than I had on the other line. Q. What was the reason for that progress?—We hurried the work through. Q. Why did you do that?—A. I always rush our work as fast as we possibly can. Q. Did you get any instructions as regards the Seaboard line, any special instructions?—

F A. Yes, I had special instructions regarding the line. Q. Who did you receive these from?—A. I think it was from Mr. Hinds. I am quite sure it was Mr. Hinds and I do not remember any conversation with Mr. Deeks over it. Q. Tell me what Mr. Hinds said about rushing the Seaboard?—A. He said there was other work coming up. The company was going to do it, if we rushed this through and got it through that fall, our opportunity would be better to get this other work. Q. Did he say what other work?—A. Yes, he referred to a contract the C.P.R. was proposing to run on the South Shore—I do not know what the name of the contract was. It is a line they were proposing to run on the south shore——. Q. The south shore of what?—A. I think they called it the South Shore line. It was down near Lake Ontario somewhere. Q. We have referred in these proceedings continually to a South Shore line—I think the line is sometimes referred to as the Campbellford, Lake Erie, and Western—is that the one?—A. That is the one I have referred to. Q. It was on these instructions of Mr. Hinds you acted in reference to the work?—A. I acted on these instructions. Q. And did you keep the work up later in the fall?—A. Yes, we tried our best to finish it, so we worked away until December. Q. Was that unusual? A. Not for the class of work we were doing there—it would be unusual for the class of work—ballasting and track-laying in December.”

The South Shore contract is the one which has given rise to the present dispute, and it is of the utmost importance to follow closely the circumstances under which it was obtained. The representative of the Canadian Pacific Railway was a Mr. Leonard, and it was he who arranged some, though it is impossible to say how many, of the contracts effected with the Toronto Construction Co. on behalf of the railway company. His negotiations were always carried out either with Mr. Deeks or with Mr. Hinds. He never discussed any details with any other person, and he never saw the plaintiff in the office, though he sometimes saw him on the line. The management of Messrs. Deeks and Hinds of the affairs of the construction company was eminently satisfactory; but so far as railway construction was concerned, the whole of their reputation for the efficient conduct of their business had been gained by them while acting as directors of the Toronto Construction Co. In 1911, and probably at an earlier date, the three individual defendants had settled that they would no longer continue business relationships with the plaintiff. It is unnecessary to seek the cause of the quarrel, or to determine whether they had good reason for the opinion that they had formed. There was nothing to compel them to work with or for the plaintiff, and it is impossible to see that they were bound to continue their relationship with him by any legal or moral consideration. They were, however, involved with him in different reciprocal duties, by reason of their relationship in connection with the Toronto Construction Co., and, if they desired freedom to act without regard to the restrictions that those relationships imposed, it was necessary that they should terminate their positions as directors and shareholders in the company, and place it in dissolution. This they could easily have accomplished owing to the fact that they held three-fourths of the share capital. It is suggested that they might also have resolved at a general meeting of the company that the company should no longer continue the work. This would have been all but equivalent to a resolution of voluntary liquidation; but even this step was not taken. While still retaining their position as directors, while still actually acting as managers of the company, and with their duties to the company of which the plaintiff was a shareholder entirely unchanged, they proceeded to negotiate with Mr. Leonard for the new Shore Line contract, in reality on their own behalf, but in exactly the same manner as that in which they had always acted for the company, and doubtless with their claims enforced by the expeditious manner in which they, while acting for the company, had caused the last contract to be carried through. The negotiations for this contract were opened by a telephone message sent through to Mr. Hinds at the Toronto Construction Co.'s office. Upon receipt of that message certain units of price were prepared in the company's office; and, the prices being ultimately fixed, the defendant Hinds was informed by Mr. Leonard that, although the prices had been agreed to, the contract would not be then immediately let, as it was necessary that there should be an appropriation of the necessary cash made to authorise the contract by the Canadian Pacific Railway Co.

During the whole of this discussion, up till the time when these prices were fixed, it does not appear that at any moment the representatives of the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. were told that this contract was in any way different from the others that had been negotiated in the same manner on behalf of the Toronto Construction Co., although it was plain that Mr. Leonard had been told by Mr. Deeks, when he was engaged on the Georgian Bay and Seaboard line, that when it was finished Messrs. Deeks and Hinds intended to go on their own account and leave Mr. Cook. But, after all the necessary preliminaries of the contract had been concluded, Mr. Hinds made to Mr. Leonard this statement: "Remember, if we get this contract it is to be Deeks and I, and not the Toronto Construction Co." On Mar. 12, 1912, the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. made the necessary appropriation for the contract, and this was communicated to Mr. Deeks by Mr. Ramsey, who said they might proceed with the contract at once. As from this moment, all English

A the formal contract was not signed until April 1, the defendants became certain of their position, and knew that they had obtained the contract for themselves. They then for the first time informed the plaintiff of what had happened. He protested without result, and the defendant, the Dominion Construction Co., was formed by the three defendants, G. S. Deeks, K. M. Deeks, and T. R. Hinds, to carry out the work. The contract was accordingly taken over by this company, by
B whom the work was carried out and the profits made. On Mar. 20, 1912, there was a meeting of directors of the Toronto Construction Co. at which the three defendants were present, and they resolved that a fresh meeting of the shareholders be held to consider the question of the voluntary liquidation of the company. After sundry meetings which are not material, on April 26, 1913, resolutions were passed owing to the voting power of the defendants, G. S. Deeks, G. M. Deeks, and T. R.
C Hinds, approving the sale of part of the plant of the company to the Dominion Construction Co., a declaration was made that the Toronto company had no interest in the Shore Line contract, and that the directors were authorised to defend this action, which had in the meantime been instituted.

Two questions of law arise out of this long history of fact. The first is whether, apart altogether from the subsequent resolutions, the company would have been at
D liberty to claim from the three individual defendants the benefit of the contract which they had obtained from the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. The second, which only arises if the first be answered in the affirmative, whether in such event the majority of the shareholders of the company constituted by the three defendants could ratify and approve of what was done, and thereby release all claim against the directors. It is the latter question to which the Appellate Division of the E Supreme Court of Ontario have given most consideration, but the former needs to be carefully examined in order to ascertain the circumstances upon which the latter question depends.

It cannot be properly answered by considering the abstract relationship of directors and companies; the real matter for determination is what, in the special circumstances of this case, was the relationship that existed between Messrs. Deeks
F and Hinds and the company that they controlled. It appears plain that the entire management of the company, so far as obtaining and executing contracts in the east was concerned, was in their hands, and, indeed, it was in part this fact which was one of the causes of their disagreement with the plaintiff. The way they used this position is perfectly plain. They accelerated the work on the expiring contract
G of the company in order to stand well with the Canadian Pacific Railway when the next contract should be offered, and, although Mr. McLean was told that the acceleration was to enable the company to get the new contract, yet they never allowed the company to have any chances whatever of acquiring the benefit, and avoided letting their co-director have any knowledge of the matter. Their Lordships think that the statement of the trial judge upon this point is well founded when he said that "it is hard to resist the inference that Mr. Hinds was careful to avoid H anything which would waken Mr. Cook from his fancied security," and again, that "the sole and only object on the part of the defendants was to get rid of a business associate whom they deemed, and I think rightly deemed, unsatisfactory from a business standpoint." In other words, they intentionally concealed all circumstances relating to their negotiations until a point had been reached when the whole arrangement had been concluded in their own favour, and there was no longer any
I real chance that there could be any interference with their plans. This means that, while entrusted with the conduct of the affairs of the company, they deliberately designed to exclude, and used their influence and position to exclude, the company whose interest it was their first duty to protect.

It is impossible to enter into the speculations which form part of the examination of Mr. Leonard and Mr. Ramsey on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway. What might have happened if the railway company from the first considered Mr. Cook as a possible competitor, or considered the position of the Toronto Construction Co., apart from Messrs. Deeks and Hinds, is a matter too conjectural to be brought into consideration. Their Lordships think that the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario may have been misled in the attempts that they made to see whether this particular duty of the defendants had been the subject of previous judicial decision. Their Lordships see no reason to differ from the opinion which the Appellate Division extracted from careful consideration of the authorities, except so far as they were led by these conclusions to regard the transaction as a question of policy and a matter that lay entirely within the directors' individual discretion. But this reservation is important, for throughout the whole of the judgments, both of the learned judge who tried this case and of the Appellate Division, there is underlying rather the question whether the transaction was not one which, by virtue of their preponderating influence in the company, the defendants would be able ultimately to put right, than the real question whether it was one into which, consistently with their duty, they were at liberty to enter. It is quite right to point out the importance of avoiding the establishment of rules as to directors' duties which would impose upon them burdens so heavy and responsibilities so great that men of good position would hesitate to accept the office. But, on the other hand, men who assume the complete control of a company's business must remember that they are not at liberty to sacrifice the interests which they are bound to protect, and, while ostensible acting for the company, divert in their own favour business which should properly belong to the company they represent. Their Lordships think that, in the circumstances, the defendants, T. R. Hinds and G. S. and G. M. Deeks, were guilty of a distinct breach of duty in the course they took to secure the contract, and that they cannot retain the benefit of such contract for themselves, but must be regarded as holding it on behalf of the company.

There remains the more difficult consideration of whether this position can be made regular by resolutions of the company controlled by the votes of these three defendants. The Supreme Court have given this matter the most careful consideration, but their Lordships are unable to agree with the conclusion which they reached. In their Lordships' opinion the Supreme Court has insufficiently recognised the distinction between two classes of case, and has applied the principles applicable to the case of a director selling to his company property which was in equity as well as at law his own, and which he could dispose of as he thought fit, to the case of a director dealing with property which, though his own at law, in equity belonged to his company. North-West Transportation Co. v. Beatty (1) and Burland v. Earle (2), both belonged to the former class. In each, directors had sold to the company property in which the company had no interest at law or in equity. If the company claimed any interest by reason of the transaction, it could only be by affirming the sale, in which case such sale, though initially voidable, would be validated by subsequent ratification. If the company refused to affirm the sale the transaction would be set aside, and the parties restored to their former position, the directors getting the property and the company receiving back the purchase price. There would be no middle course. The company could not insist on retaining the property while paying less than the price agreed. This would be for the court to make a new contract between the parties. It would be quite another thing if the director had originally acquired the property which he sold to his company under circumstances which made it in equity the property of the company. The distinction to which their Lordships have drawn attention is expressly recognised by LORD DAVEY in Burland v. Earle (2), and is the foundation of the judgment in North-West Transportation Co. v. Beatty (1), and is clearly explained in the unreported case of Jacobus Marler Estates, Ltd. v. Marler (3).

If, as their Lordships find on the facts, the contract in question was entered into under such circumstances that the directors could not retain the benefit of it for themselves, then it belonged in equity to the company, and ought to have been dealt with as an asset of the company. Even supposing it be not ultra vires

A of a company to make a present to its directors, it appears quite certain that directors holding a majority of votes would not be permitted to make a present to themselves. This would be to allow a majority to oppress the minority. To such circumstances North-West Transportation Co. v. Beatty (1) and Burland v. Earle (2) have no application. In the same way, if directors have acquired for themselves property or rights which they must be regarded as holding on behalf of the company, a resolution that the rights of the company should be disregarded in the matter would amount to forfeiting the interest and property of the minority of shareholders in favour of the majority, and that by the votes of those who are interested in securing the property for themselves. Such use of voting power has never been sanctioned by the courts, and, indeed, was expressly disapproved in Menier v. Hooper's Telegraph Works (4).

C If their Lordships took the view that, in the circumstances of this case, the directors had exercised a discretion or decided on a matter of policy (the view which appears to have been entertained by the Supreme Court) different results would ensue, but this is not a conclusion which their Lordships are able to accept. It follows that the defendants must account to the Toronto company for the profits which they have made out of the transaction. Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that the judgments of MIDDLETON, J., and of the Appellate Division be set aside, and that the case be referred back to the High Court Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario for the purpose of taking such account. There must not be included in such account any claim in respect of the plant purchased from the Toronto company; their Lordships are satisfied by the evidence that this was bought at the fair market price. Their Lordships have throughout referred to the claim as one against the defendants, G. S. Deeks, G. M. Deeks, and T. R. Hinds. But it was not, and it could not be, disputed that the Dominion Construction Co. acquired the rights of these defendants with full knowledge of all the facts, and the account must be directed in form as an account in favour of the Toronto company against all the other defendants. The respondents must pay the costs of the appellant here and in the courts below, and the costs of taking the account will be dealt with in the Supreme Court. Although the account is in favour of the Toronto company, the plaintiff must have the conduct of the proceedings.

LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—It is no doubt well settled that in equity an agent cannot, without the consent of his principal, given with full knowledge of the material facts and under circumstances which rebut any presumption of undue influence, retain any profit acquired by him in transactions within the scope of the agency. The principal can always in such a case treat the profit as acquired on his own behalf, and insist on its being accounted for to him. For the same reason an agent whose duty it is to acquire property on behalf of his principal, cannot, without the like consent, acquire it on his own behalf and subsequently re-sell it to his principal at an enhanced price. In such a case the principal can treat the property as originally acquired for him and the re-sale as nugatory, and may, therefore, recover from the agent the money paid on such re-sale less the original price and the expenses incurred by the agent in acquiring the property. This, however, only applies where the relationship of principal and agent existed at the time when the agent acquired the property. If it did not then exist the property acquired was, at the outset, the agent's own property for all purposes, and the subsequent constitution of the relationship of principal and agent cannot deprive him of property already his own (Re Cape Breton Co., Ladywell Mining Co. v. Brookes, and Burland v. Earle). There is another principle of equity which ought to be distinguished from, but is sometimes confused with, that to which I have already referred. Equity treats all transactions between an agent and his principal in matters in which it is the agent's duty to advise his principal, as voidable unless and until the principal, with full knowledge of the material facts and under circumstances which rebut any presumption of undue influence, ratify and confirm the same. In such cases the interest of the agent is in conflict with his duty, and there can be no real bargain at all. It must be remembered, however, that if the transaction be one of sale by the agent to the principal, the latter must, in order to avoid it, be able to restore the agent to his original position. If he has re-sold the property, or cannot restore it to the agent in its original condition, the right to avoid the transaction will, as a general rule, have been lost. But, even so, it does not follow that the principal is without remedy. He may be able to recover damages from the agent for negligence in the performance of his duties. Thus, if the agent's duty is to advise the principal as to the purchases of stocks or shares having a market value, and he sells to his principal stocks or shares of his own at prices in excess of their market value, he may be liable in damages for the excess of the prices received over the market value. It is a different matter if the property sold by the agent to the principal is a specific property having no market value, for the court will not fix a new price between the parties. In such a case the measure of damages will be the principal's loss in the whole transaction. If he has suffered no such loss there can be no damages. The equities above referred to as governing the relationship between principal and agent apply also to other fiduciary relationships, and in particular to that which exists between a company promoter and the company which results from the promotion, and its shareholders.

Indemnity—Assignment—Enforcement by assignee—Recovery of full amount of liability of person indemnified.

A contract of indemnity is not a personal contract for the personal protection of the person indemnified which cannot be assigned to or enforced by any person other than the person indemnified. It is assignable, and the assignee can recover from the indemnifier the full amount of the liability of the person indemnified and not merely such sum as that person has actually paid.

Appeal by the defendant from a decision of ASTBURY, J.
 The facts are set forth in the judgment of PICKFORD, L.J.
Maugham, K.C., and Dighton Pollock for the defendant.
Frank Russell, K.C., and J. H. Stamp for the plaintiffs.

July 17, 1916. The following judgments were read.

Cur. adv. vult.

PICKFORD, L.J.—This action is concerned with the affairs of the plaintiff company, which is in liquidation, and is a claim by the liquidator as assignee of

A an agreement of indemnity given by the defendant to Mrs. Bond, who was at one time a shareholder in the company.

B In the year 1910 there were difficulties among the shareholders of the company, and many of the malcontents were represented by Mr. Wheelock, a stockbroker in Birmingham. In consequence the directors decided that the shareholders represented by Mr. Wheelock, of whom Mrs. Bond was one, should be bought out, and if the shares could not be otherwise placed, they intended to buy them themselves. In pursuance of this scheme a transfer of Mrs. Bond's shares was made out to the defendant. He, however, objected to this and required the transfer to be made out to a Mr. Bill, a clerk in his office and an infant. There was a dispute as to his motives in requiring the transfer to be to Mr. Bill, and I do not think it necessary to decide which contention was right. Mr. Wheelock, acting for Mrs. Bond, required some assurance that the transferee was a responsible person, and on Dec. 13, 1910, the defendant sent him this letter :

D "Dear Mr. Wheelock,—Thanks for yours of the 12th. I have no objection at all under the circumstances in guaranteeing Mrs. Bond and Mr. Cockson against any liability. We will discuss the question of sending out the prospectus when you call here. I dare say I may be able to arrange something for you."

E It was said that a more formal indemnity was sent, but it was not produced, and the defendant said he never sent it. I do not think it necessary to discuss the learned judge's finding on this point in favour of the plaintiffs as the defendant's counsel admitted that under the letter above quoted he was bound to indemnify Mrs. Bond against calls. A Mr. Davison, the secretary of the company, acted for the defendant and the other directors in the purchase of the shares of Mr. Wheelock's friends, and the transfers were made out at the price of 1s. 6d. per share. The real purchase price, however, was 1s., and Mr. Wheelock received a cheque from Mr. Davison at 1s. 6d. a share and returned to him a cheque at 6d. a share. In June, 1912, the company went into liquidation, and in time the liquidator discovered that Mr. Bill, whose name had been put on the list of contributories, was an infant, and Mrs. Bond's name was placed on the list in his place. She consulted Messrs. Beale & Co., solicitors, and proceedings were taken to remove her name. Similar proceedings were taken in respect of Mr. Cockson, who was also represented by Messrs. Beale & Co., and the following letters passed between them and the solicitors for the liquidator and the defendant.

G On Nov. 26, 1913, Messrs. Beale & Co. wrote to Messrs. Foss, Billbrough & Co., the solicitors for the liquidator :

H "We are confirmed by counsel in our original opinion that we shall succeed on these summonses on the technical grounds mentioned in Mr. Cockson's affidavit. This would not, however, prevent the liquidator from instituting fresh proceedings to amend the register by the substitution of our client's name for that of Bill, and, assuming that he can prove the infancy and that this was not known to the company, we think that such proceedings would succeed. Under the circumstances it seems useless to incur further expense, and we are prepared to advise our clients to withdraw their summonses if the liquidator will pay our charges in connection therewith up to date. Mr. Cockson would then have to accept responsibility for the £120 calls due on the 160 shares in his name. Mrs. Bond is a married woman and has no separate estate, so that there is nothing to be got out of her, but it might be worth while for her relatives to find a small sum to release her from the liability—say the amount of the expenses incurred by the liquidator for our and his own costs on this summons."

I On Feb. 12, 1914, Messrs. Foss, Billbrough & Co. wrote to Messrs. Beale. The letter first of all deals with the Cockson claim, which I need not read, and then it says :

"With regard to Mrs. Bond the position is different. You state in your letter that Mrs. Bond is a married woman and has no separate estate. This information is insufficient to enable the liquidator to come to the conclusion that, if he goes on, he will receive nothing. The liquidator is therefore advised to ask for an affidavit by your client stating that she has not now and had not when the transfer was executed nor when the calls were respectively made any free separate estate."

Then they refer also to some possible proceedings against the defendant. On Feb. 14 Messrs. Beale & Co. write acknowledging that letter and say:

"Our client, however, wishes the matter disposed of, and is prepared to pay £110 in settlement, each party to pay his own costs. [That refers to Mr. Cockson. Then: Ex parte Bond.] We are awaiting our client's instructions and will write you again next week."

On Mar. 10, Messrs. Beale & Co. write again. They deal, first of all, with Mr. Cockson, and then they say with regard to Mrs. Bond:

"We have abandoned the summons for rectification of the register and have informed the liquidator that Mrs. Bond is a married woman without any separate estate whatever, so that any further proceedings on his part would be waste of time and expense. Our charges to date amount to £15 15s., which amount we shall be glad to receive from Mr. Rawson in pursuance of his indemnity."

On Mar. 16, Messrs. Nordon and Drury, who are the defendant's solicitors, write:

"We are in receipt of your letter of the 25th inst. inclosing cheque in our instructs us to settle these claims by payment of £120 and thirty guineas for your costs, provided you will accept thirty guineas down and Mr. Rawson's acceptance at three months for the £120. Mr. Rawson offers as a reference as to his ability to meet the acceptance in three months the London and South-Western Bank, Charing Cross. On hearing from you we will obtain our client's cheque for £31 10s. and his acceptance for £120 with interest at 5 per cent. for the three months."

On Mar. 27, Messrs. Beale & Co. write:

"We are in receipt of your letter of the 25th inst. inclosing cheque in our favour for £31 10s. and Mr. Rawson's acceptance at three months in favour of Mr. Charles Cockson for £121 10s. in settlement of our client's claims as arranged."

Mrs. Bond's name, therefore, remained on the list of contributories, and in July, 1914, a judgment was obtained against her for an amount for calls in what is called the amended form that was settled in Scott v. Morley (2)—that is, a judgment against her present or future separate estate. On Feb. 8, 1915, the liquidator took an assignment from Mrs. Bond of the defendant's contract to indemnify her which, so far as material, was in the following terms. It recites the various transactions, and then it recites:

"And whereas in an action in the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice in which the company was plaintiff and the said Jane Bond defendant it was, by a judgment dated July 6, 1914, adjudged that the company recover against the said Jane Bond the sum of £683 9s. 3d. and £5 6s. for costs, such sum of £683 9s. 3d. being the amount of calls and interest thereon due in respect of the said shares. And whereas the company has agreed, on having an assignment of the rights of the said Jane Bond against the said F. L. Rawson under the said letter or otherwise, to make no further claim upon the said Jane Bond in relation to the said shares whether under the said judgment or otherwise. Now this indenture witnesseth that, in consideration of the

A covenant on the company's part hereinafter contained the said Jane Bond doth hereby assign unto the company all that the benefit of the said letter dated the 13th day of December, 1910, . . . and of the agreement by the said F. L. Rawson therein contained and all moneys that may now be or hereafter become payable by the said F. L. Rawson pursuant to the said letter and agreement and the benefit of all other rights of indemnity (if any) that the said Jane Bond may have against the said F. L. Rawson in relation to the said shares or to the said agreement to hold the same unto the company absolutely. And the company hereby covenants with the said Jane Bond that the company will not at any time hereafter take any step to enforce the said judgment or make any claim against the said Jane Bond, her heirs, executors, or administrators in respect of the said judgment debt or in respect of the said shares or any of them except to the extent of the moneys recoverable from the said F. L. Rawson by virtue of the agreement of indemnity and other rights hereinbefore expressed to be hereby assigned to the company."

The plaintiffs now sue on this indemnity, and the defendant raises several defences : (i) that the contract of indemnity is not assignable; (ii) that it is only a contract to indemnify Mrs. Bond against actual loss, and, therefore, as the judgment is only against her separate estate, and she has none, and has paid and can pay nothing, there is no liability; (iii) that any claim upon the indemnity was settled by the transactions of February and March, 1914; and, (iv), by amendment during the trial, that the whole agreement was induced by the fraud of Wheelock, the vendor's agent, in returning to Davison, the purchaser's agent, as a bribe, the difference between 1s. 6d. a share and the real price, 1s.

The first two points are of general importance, and the last two apply to this case only, and I shall deal with them in the reverse order to that in which I have mentioned them. [His Lordship, on the evidence, decided against the defendant on points (iii) or (iv), and also decided point (ii) in favour of the plaintiffs on grounds which do not call for report in view of the provision of s. 1 (a) of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, that a married woman should be capable of acquiring, holding and disposing of, property in all respects as if she were a feme sole, and he continued:] The only question remaining is whether this contract was assignable. It is a question really of practical importance only as to the principal creditor, for an assignment to anyone else is so improbable as to be almost negligible. But still in principle the question is as to a power to assign generally. I think this is really covered by the decision in Re Perkins, Poyser v. Beyfus (1). The ground on which the contract of indemnity is said not to be assignable is that it is a personal contract which cannot be assigned to or enforced by anyone but the indemnified. But in Re Perkins, Poyser v. Beyfus (1) such a contract was held to be part of the property of the bankrupt and to vest in the trustee and to be assignable by him. Personal contracts of the bankrupt are not, as a rule, property of the bankrupt which vest in the trustee, and I agree with the argument of the junior counsel for the plaintiffs that the power to assign given to the trustee by the bankruptcy does not extend to make assignable in his hands contracts which in their nature were not assignable by the bankrupt, though it may remove such objections as might arise from the doctrines of champerty and maintenance. I think, therefore, a decision that the contract of indemnity is assignable by the trustee involves a decision that it is in its nature assignable by the bankrupt. The result of these cases goes very far because they seem to me to establish that in effect in the case of an insolvent debtor a contract to indemnify him has the same result as a guarantee to the principal creditor of payment of the debt, but I think this is their effect. In my opinion, the appeal must be dismissed.

WARRINGTON, L.J.—The defendant's argument on his main contention is that a contract of indemnity is for the personal protection of the party to be indemnified, and is, therefore, like other personal contracts, not capable of assignment either in equity before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, or under that Act. I think this argument is disposed of by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Perkins, Poyser v. Beyfus (1). In that case the plaintiff Poyser was the original lessee under a lease dated Oct. 5, 1891. In 1893 he assigned the lease to one Plaistowe, and in 1895 Plaistowe assigned to Perkins. Each assignment contained a covenant by the assignee to pay the rent reserved by and observe the covenants contained in the lease and to indemnify the assignor against all claims and liabilities in respect thereof. Plaistowe became bankrupt. Perkins was dead, the lessor called upon the plaintiff to pay, and he did pay certain accrued rent and insurance premiums. The plaintiff proved in the bankruptcy of Plaistowe for the amount so paid and the estimated amount of his future liability. This proof was compromised and as a term of such compromise the trustee assigned to the plaintiff Plaistowe's right to be indemnified by Perkins. The plaintiff then sued the executors of Perkins and was held entitled to recover the amount paid by him to the lessor and to have liberty to apply in respect of any future liability. It was said by NORTH, J., and by the Court of Appeal that the right to be indemnified was property of the bankrupt vesting in his trustee and capable of being assigned by him like any other item of the bankrupt's property. But if the contract of indemnity be a merely personal contract it would, in my opinion, be impossible to hold that it formed part of the property of the bankrupt. It seems to me, therefore, that this decision, though founded to some extent on the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, amounts to a decision that a contract of indemnity is not to be treated as a merely personal covenant not capable of assignment.

There remains, however, the question: What can the assignee recover? Can he recover only the amount (if any) which has been actually paid by his assignor, or can he compel the indemnifier to pay and discharge the liability of the assignor? In the present case and, in Re Perkins, Poyser v. Beyfus (1), the assignee is the original creditor, and, if he is as assignee entitled to call upon the indemnifier to discharge the liability of the indemnified, it results indirectly in his obtaining payment of his debt by the indemnifier. Again I think Re Perkins, Poyser v. Beyfus (1) answers the question. Plaistowe was liable to pay the plaintiffs a certain sum of money—namely, the sum which the plaintiff had paid to the lessor. Perkins had agreed to indemnify Plaistowe against that liability. Plaistowe assigns the indemnity to the plaintiff, and it is held that Perkins must pay to the plaintiff the sum for which Plaistowe was liable, though the latter had himself paid nothing in respect of that liability. Moreover, I think this decision follows logically on the manner in which courts of equity had given effect to contracts of indemnity. In many cases they had ordered the indemnifier to pay the debt against which the indemnity had been given though nothing had been paid by the person indemnified. Cruse v. Paine (3) is an example. Money has even been ordered to be paid by the indemnifier to the indemnified himself in respect of moneys for which he was liable, but which he had not paid. Evans v. Wood (4) is an example, and shows that SIR GEORGE JESSEL, M.R., was not mistaken in saying, as he did in Lacey v. Hill, Crowley's Claim (5) (L.R. 18 Eq. at p. 191), that "if the creditor is not a party it has been decided that the party seeking indemnity may be entitled to have the money paid over to him."

The more recent cases of Re Richardson, Ex parte Governors of St. Thomas's Hospital (6), and Re Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society, Ltd., Liverpool Mortgage Insurance Co.'s Case (7) are in accordance with this view. It seems to me, therefore, that Mrs. Bond—leaving out of consideration the point raised as to her status as a married woman—was entitled to have the amount of the calls paid by the defendant to the plaintiff company or to herself, and that this right

A was capable of assignment, and that the plaintiffs as assignees were entitled to have it enforced by an order directing payment to themselves. The appeal fails and ought to be dismissed.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—I agree. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

NASH v. ROCHFORD RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Warrington and Scrutton, L.JJ.), November 28, 29, December 7, 1916]

[Reported [1917] 1 K.B. 384; 86 L.J.K.B. 370; 116 L.T. 129;
81 J.P. 57; 15 L.G.R. 103]

Highway—Negligence of authority—Liability of district council for negligence of predecessor—Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), s. 67—Highway Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict., c. 61), ss. 11, 25, 39—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict., c. 41), ss. 75, 100—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict., c. 73), ss. 25 (1), 67, 75.

The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendant highway authority for injury suffered by him when the surface of the highway, along which he was driving, broke owing to negligent construction of a drain beneath it. The drain had been placed there, not by the defendants, but by their predecessors, the parish surveyors or the highway board under the Highways Acts, 1835 and 1862, and this was the first occasion on which damage had been caused by its defective condition.

Held: where a highway authority did a negligent act which caused no damage during the existence of that authority, but damage resulted during the existence of an authority which succeeded the negligent authority, the succeeding authority was not liable for its predecessor's negligence, and, therefore, the plaintiff's action failed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 7, 1916. The following judgments were read.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R. The plaintiff was driving his pony along a public highway under the care and management of the defendants, the Rochford Rural District Council. His pony's leg broke through the crust of the road at a place where a pipe drain was laid under the road for the purpose of conveying water. According to the finding of the jury the drain was negligently constructed, and the accident was due to such negligent construction. Water had escaped at the place in question, and the soil under the crust had been washed or sucked away. The action was launched on the footing that the drain had been constructed by the defendants. There was no evidence to support this allegation, and the jury have expressly negatived it. By an arrangement made in the course of the trial, without any amendment of the pleadings, the jury were asked whether the defendants' "predecessors in title" caused the drain to be constructed, and the answer of the jury was "Yes." Judgment was entered for damages £100.

It is admitted that mere negligence in omitting to repair will not support an action against a highway authority: Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board (1). There is no evidence, and certainly no finding, as to when the drain was laid, or by what authority. The successive road authorities were as follows: (a) 1835 to 1863, parish surveyors under the Highway Act, 1835; (b) 1863 to 1881, the highway board under the Highway Act, 1862; (c) 1881 to 1895, parish surveyors, the highway board having been dissolved; (d) 1895 to present time, the defendant under the Local Government Act, 1894. It seems to me that the plaintiff is in great difficulty by reason of his inability to ascertain which of the authorities laid down the drain. It is not the defendants. But it may have been laid down during (a), (b), or (c), and possibly by some authority prior to 1835. Counsel for the plaintiff boldly argued that the parish is the body which is represented by all the authorities, and that the defendants are liable for all the consequences of any misfeasance, however many years ago, by any one of the successive highway authorities. I am unable to assent to this argument. Assume that the drain was laid down some time between 1835 and 1895. The construction of the drain, however negligent, gave no cause of action until the accident to the plaintiff. Damage is a necessary part of the cause of action. There was no legal liability until damage occurred. It is like the right of support, where a man by excavating on his own land lets down his neighbour's house. There is no legal wrong in the mere excavation not followed by damage to the house. So a false and fraudulent representation, not followed by damage, gives no cause of action. The plaintiff relies upon s. 25 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1894, by which there was transferred to the defendants "all the powers, duties, and liabilities" of "any highway authority" in the district, and makes them "successors of" the public authority, i.e., of the surveyors of the parish. And the plaintiff relies upon the definitions of "highway authority" and "liabilities" in s. 100 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which definitions are made applicable to the Act of 1894 by s. 75.

In my opinion, there is nothing in s. 100 of the Act of 1888 which so enlarges the meaning of "liabilities" as to include a case like the present. This is not a "liability to any proceeding for enforcing any duty or for punishing the breach of any duty," and the subsequent words relate only to pecuniary obligations. It

A follows, therefore, that the defendants are not liable for damages for a negligent act before 1895 which did not result in damage until after 1895. In my opinion, the judgment cannot be supported, and the appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants.

B WARRINGTON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The point raised on this appeal is that the learned judge in the court below was wrong in treating the misfeasance of the preceding authority as equivalent to the misfeasance of the defendants themselves, so as to enable a person who suffers injury in consequence thereof to recover damages from the defendants. The highway in question has been under the control of a number of different authorities, and the jury do not find—and in fact there was no evidence enabling them to find—by which in particular of the several authorities other than the defendants the drain was constructed.

C From 1835 to 1863 the parish of Rayleigh, in which this accident took place, was a highway parish under the Highway Act, 1835, and the surveyor of highways was the highway authority. In 1863, after the passing of the Highway Act, 1862, the parish of Rayleigh and certain other parishes were formed into a highway district, and the highway board constituted under that Act became the highway authority. D In 1881 the highway district was dissolved in pursuance of the provisions of s. 39 of the Act of 1862, and the parish of Rayleigh again became a highway parish, and the highways passed again under the authority of the surveyor of highways. This continued until 1895, when the Local Government Act, 1894, came into operation as regards the Rochford district, including Rayleigh. Under this Act E the rural district council is the highway authority. The statutory provisions as to the transmission of liability are as follows. By s. 11 of the Act of 1862 it is enacted that "all such powers, rights, duties, liabilities, capacities, and incapacities (except the power of making, assessing, and levying highway rates) as are vested in or attached to or would but for this Act have become vested in or attached to any surveyor or surveyors of any parish forming part of the district shall vest in and attach to the highway board."

Section 39, which provides for the dissolution of a district, defines the consequences in the following terms:

G "Where any highway district is dissolved, or where any parish is excluded from any highway district, the highways in such district or parish shall be maintained, and the provisions of the [Highway Act, 1835] in relation to the election of surveyors and all other matters shall apply to the said highways as if such highways had never been included within the limits of a highway district."

H The Act contains no definition of the word "liabilities," nor, as will be seen from the above citation, was it thought necessary or expedient to provide for the transmission of "liabilities" from the board to the surveyor or to the parish. The state of things existing before the formation of the district was simply restored. The Local Government Act, 1894, s. 25, provides that

I "there shall be transferred to the district council of every rural district all the powers, duties, and liabilities . . . of any highway authority in the district . . . and rural district councils shall be the successors of the highway authority."

Under s. 75, expressions used in that Act are, unless the context otherwise requires, to have the same meaning as in the Local Government Act, 1888. By that Act, s. 100, the expression "highway authority"

"means as respects a highway district the highway board, and as respects a highway parish the surveyor or surveyors of highways or other officers performing similar duties," and the expression "liabilities"

"includes liability to any proceedings for enforcing any duty or for punishing the breach of any duty, and includes all debts and liabilities to which any authority are or but for this Act would be liable or subject to whether accrued, done at the date of the transfer, or subsequently accruing."

The jury have not identified the "predecessor" by whom the negligent act was committed. But we will suppose for the moment that it was the surveyor or one of the surveyors in office during the years 1881-1895. Would the provisions of the Act of 1891 render the district council liable for the consequences of the negligent act of the surveyor? To so hold would, I think, be inconsistent with the doctrine, now well established, that a highway authority is responsible for misfeasance only. And though, of course, it is competent to Parliament to abolish that doctrine altogether or to make it inapplicable where the act of misfeasance is that of a preceding authority, I do not think one ought to hold that such a result has happened unless the words are clear. In the present case I cannot find either in s. 25 of the Act of 1894 or in the definition in s. 100 of the Act of 1888 any sufficient intention to pass on the responsibility for a wrongful act not their own and by itself affording no cause of action. The preceding authority was not in fact under any liability, inasmuch as the damage essential to the existence of liability had not arisen.

If I am right on the construction of the Act of 1894, it is unnecessary to go further. For in the Act of 1862, s. 25, there was a transfer of liability from the district board to the surveyor, and the words in s. 11 transferring the liabilities of the surveyor to the board were not so strong as the corresponding expression in the Act of 1894 as interpreted by the definitions in the Act of 1888. I think it would require much clearer words than either statute contains to render the incoming body liable for the consequences of a wrong act not committed by itself. The reference to punishment affords a further argument in favour of the construction I have adopted, for it can hardly be supposed that Parliament intended to render an authority liable to punishment for something done by another. On the whole, I think the appeal ought to be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants.

SCRUTTON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: By a long line of authorities from Russell v. Men of Devon (2) to Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board (1) it is clear that the defendants were not liable in a civil action for nonfeasance, as distinguished from misfeasance, and that, therefore, even if they knew of the negligent construction and consequent hole, but did nothing, no liability would attach to them. But for some reason the jury were asked if the defendants were negligent in not ascertaining and remedying the defect, and they answered "Yes." Question and answer were immaterial and superfluous. On further consideration the learned judge in the court below held that there was evidence on which the jury could find that some road authority constructed the drain, with which I agree. He further said:

"Without going into the Acts and statutes and sections in detail, I am of opinion that the language in each case is sufficiently wide to cover the construction placed upon them by the plaintiff namely, that the authority in each case was responsible for the acts of misfeasance of the predecessors in title."

This, though satisfactory to the plaintiff, does not help the Court of Appeal much as to the grounds of the learned judge's decision. It is, therefore, necessary to examine the Acts and statutes with some care.

The defendants, the Rochford Rural District Council, came into existence in 1895 by virtue of the Local Government Act, 1894. In 1881 a previously existing Rochford Highway Board, constituted under the Highway Act, 1862, had been dissolved, and from 1881 to 1895 the surveyors of the parish of Rayleigh had been

A the road authority. Before 1864, surveyors of the parish of Rayleigh had also been the road authority—since 1835 under the Highway Act, 1835, and before that date under the Highway Act, 1773. Each surveyor held office for a year. One of these authorities, and there was no evidence which, had been negligent in the construction of the drain. But no damage had been caused by that negligence up to the year 1895, when the defendant road board came into existence. Therefore, no previous authority had been “liable,” in the ordinary legal sense of the word, to anyone for negligence. For, as was pointed out by LORD BLACKBURN in Darley Main Colliery Co. v. Mitchell (3) (11 App. Cas. at p. 142), you may be as negligent as you like, but no cause of action or liability arises till your negligence does damage.

C The plaintiff suggests, however, that by the statutes an authority which has done nothing is indeed not liable for doing nothing (which is nonfeasance), but is liable for something done by a predecessor if that act causes damage during the reign of the latter authority; and, further, that the latter authority may be liable, by transmission of liability, though an intermediate authority, who itself did nothing, and in whose reign no damage occurred, but who is yet supposed to have a liability derived from its predecessor’s negligence to pass on. I turn to examine D the statutes which are supposed to have worked this result. It is sufficient in the first instance to see what statutes transferred liability from the surveyors of the parish of Rayleigh in 1894 to the Rochford Rural District Council in 1895. Section 25 of the Local Government Act, 1894, transfers to the rural district council all the powers, duties, and liabilities of any highway authority in the district. By s. 67 :

E “Where any powers and duties are transferred by this Act from one authority to another authority—(1) All property held by the first authority for the purpose or by virtue of such powers and duties shall pass to and vest in the other authority, subject to all debts and liabilities affecting the same . . . (3) All debts and liabilities of the first authority incurred by virtue of such powers F and duties shall become debts and liabilities of the latter authority . . .”

G Section 100 of the Local Government Act, 1888 defines “liabilities” to include “liability to any proceeding for enforcing any duty, or for punishing the breach of any duty, and includes all debts and liabilities to which any authority are or would but for this Act be liable or subject to, whether accrued due at the date of the transfer or subsequently accruing. . . .”

Section 75 of the Local Government Act, 1894, provides that the expressions used in that Act shall, unless the context otherwise require, have the same meaning as in the Local Government Act, 1888, thus incorporating in the sections quoted the definition of liability already set out.

H The question is whether a previous authority who has done a negligent act causing no damage has any “liability,” as above defined, to pass on to a subsequent authority, so that on damage accruing due to that negligence the subsequent authority, which itself has done nothing and is not liable for nonfeasance, becomes liable to an action for negligence. The question could not be confined to an action for negligence. Where an excavation on land ultimately causes damage in adjoining land, there is no cause of action till damage ensues, and the statutes of I limitation run from the occurrence of damage: Backhouse v. Bonomi (1). Other examples can easily be suggested. I cannot think that negligence not causing damage involves a “liability” in the ordinary legal sense, or in the sense of the interpretation clause, either “a liability to any proceeding for enforcing a duty,” or “a liability to which any authority would but for this Act be liable or subject to, whether accrued due at the date of the transfer or subsequently accruing.” The latter words point to bills of exchange and similar obligations where a liability arises from acceptance, accruing due at a future date. Indeed, as the definition of

"liability" includes liability and punishment, it should obviously be construed strictly. A

It was argued that it was desirable to treat the various authorities as one succession representing the parish, each authority liable as representing the one continuous parish. But I gather that Rayleigh parish is not the same as the area of Rochford District Council; and, if it were, it is not the duty of the courts, who are bound by the rule of Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board (1), to hold that highway authorities are not liable for nonfeasance, to make generous constructions of the words of statutes in order to defeat that rule. If it is to be altered, it must be altered by Parliament, which has at present allowed it to stand unaltered for many years. I may add that the decisions in the much litigated case of Papworth v. Battersea Corpn. (No. 2) (5) do not touch this point. In that case there was a question whether the liability of corporations for negligence not followed by damage was transferred through corporation 2 to corporation 3, in whose time damage was occasioned. As between corporation 2 and corporation 3 "liabilities" were transferred, but as between corporation 1 and 2 there were no express words transferring liabilities. In that position, of the three judges of the Court of Appeal one held that "liabilities" were transferred, one that they were not, and one declined to express an opinion, which, indeed, was not necessary, as all held that corporation 1 was not negligent. The question here whether negligence not followed by damage can create a liability to be transferred was not argued or decided. In any event, the judgment appealed from must be set aside and judgment entered for the defendants with costs here and below. In view of the fact that the plaintiff failed entirely on the pleadings on which he went to trial, I do not see my way to give him the costs of any matters decided in his favour. B C D E

HERBERT MORRIS, LTD. v. SAXELBY

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Atkinson, Lord Shaw, Lord Parker of Waddington and Lord Sumner), November 4, 5, 8, 22, 23, 1915, February 8, 1916]

Contract—Illegality—Public policy—Restraint of trade—Restraint on employee on leaving employment—Extent of employer's right to protection—Right of employee to benefit of experience and training—Need for restraint to be reasonable.

A covenant by the employee in a contract of service provided that he would not at any time during a period of seven years from the date of his ceasing to be employed by the employer carry on or be concerned, directly or indirectly, in the United Kingdom in the same industry as his employer.

Held: having regard to all the circumstances, the covenant was not reasonable in reference to the interests of the parties and was prejudicial to the interests of the public, and, therefore, it was void and unenforceable.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, [1915] 2 Ch. 57, affirmed.

It is in the public interest that a man should be free to exercise his skill and experience to the best advantage for the benefit of himself and all those who desire to employ him. . . . No person has an abstract right to be protected against competition per se in his trade or business. . . . A man who goes into an employment is entitled to make use in any other employment, whether on his own account or that of another employer, of the knowledge which he has acquired in the first-named employment of the general organisation and management of a business of the kind in question: per LORD ATKINSON.

Trade secrets, the names of customers, all such things, which in sound philosophical language are denominated objective knowledge may not be given away by a servant, and there is no rule of public interest which prevents a transfer of them against the master's will being restrained. On the other hand, a man's aptitudes, his skill, his dexterity, his manual or mental ability, all those things which in sound philosophical language are not objective, but subjective, may, and ought, not to be relinquished by a servant. They are not his master's property; they are his own property; they are himself. . . . There runs through this part of the law a real distinction between cases of contracts for the sale of a business, on the one hand, and, on the other, cases of contracts of service: per LORD SHAW.

All restraints on trade of themselves, if there is nothing more, are contrary to public policy, and, therefore, void. It is not that such restraints must of themselves necessarily operate to the public injury, but that it is against the policy of the common law to enforce them except in cases where there are special circumstances to justify them. To be valid a restraint must be reasonable in the interests of the contracting parties, and, secondly, it must be reasonable in the interests of the public. To be reasonable in the interests of the parties the restraint must afford adequate protection to the party in whose favour it is imposed and be to the advantage of the covenantee who otherwise might lose such advantages as obtaining the best terms on the sale of a business or the possibility of obtaining employment or training under competent employers. It is no longer thought that the court should weigh the advantages accruing to the covenantor against the disadvantages imposed on him by the restraint. Such a process has long been rejected as impracticable. . . . I cannot find a case in which a covenant against competition by a servant or apprentice has, as such, ever been upheld by the court. The only reason for upholding a restraint on an employee is that the employer has some proprietary right, whether in the nature of trade connection or trade secrets, for the protection of which such a restraint is, having regard to the duties of the employee, reasonably necessary : per LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.

D Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal affirming a judgment of SARGANT, J. The facts appear in the opinion of LORD ATKINSON.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., Walter, K.C., and Kerly, K.C., for the appellants.
Romer, K.C., and Sheldon for the respondent.

The House took time for consideration.

Feb. 8, 1916. The following opinions were read.

E LORD ATKINSON.— This is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal, dated Mar. 31, 1915, affirming the judgment of SARGANT, J., dated Oct. 30, 1914, and dismissing the action with costs. The appellants are the plaintiffs, and the respondent is the defendant. The action out of which the appeal arises was brought to restrain the respondent, a former servant of the appellants, (i) from being concerned in the sale or manufacture of pulley blocks, hand overhead runways, electric overhead runways, hand overhead travelling cranes, or any part thereof, and (ii) from divulging or using confidential information acquired by him while in the service of the appellants. This claim is based upon two covenants contained in an agreement under seal or indenture dated Mar. 17, 1911, executed by the appellants and respondent, under which the respondent was to be employed for a period of two years certain from Feb. 7, 1911, and thereafter subject to four weeks' notice on either side, at a salary of £3 17s. 6d. per week. The covenants run as follows:

H "6. The employee shall not divulge nor communicate to any person, corporation, or firm, any information which he may receive or obtain in relation to the company's affairs, and all instructions, drawings, notes, and memoranda made by the employee or which may come into his possession while engaged as aforesaid shall be the exclusive property of the company. 7. In consideration of the agreement hereinbefore contained, the employee covenants and agrees with the company, their successors and assigns, that he will not at any time during a period of seven years from the date of his ceasing to be employed by the company, either in the United Kingdom of Great Britain or Ireland, carry on, either as principal, agent, servant, or otherwise, alone or jointly, or in connection with any other person, company, or firm, or be concerned or assist, directly or indirectly, whether for reward or otherwise, in the sale or manufacture of hand overhead travelling cranes, pulley blocks, or hand overhead runways, or any part thereof, or be concerned as aforesaid in any business connected with such sale or manufacture."

I It will be observed that there is no clause in covenant No. 6 prohibiting the "using" of information, as distinct from the divulging or communicating of it, and Joyce, J., points out that nothing but an express provision against "using" the information would justify such an injunction as is claimed. The matter, though to a great extent immaterial, since the appellants admit they cannot establish that any breach of this covenant was committed by the respondent, or even threatened, is not without some significance, inasmuch as it tends to show that what the appellants desired from the first was that the respondent should be restrained from using in the service of some other employer that skill and knowledge which he had acquired by the exercise of his own mental faculties on what he had seen, heard, and had experience of in the employment of the appellants themselves. The appellants, feeling obviously the difficulty of defending the clause at the end of the seventh covenant running in these words, "or in any part thereof, or be concerned as aforesaid in any business connected with such sale or manufacture," have consented to treat the covenant for the purposes of their action as if these words had been deleted, and are willing to take an injunction confined to what is prohibited by the remainder of the covenant.

The defence of the respondent is, in effect, that the restrictions imposed on him by this indenture go far beyond anything reasonably necessary for the protection of the plaintiffs in their trade or business, are oppressive to him, and that, being in restraint of trade, either the entire agreement, or at all events covenant No. 7, is not binding upon him. By the word "oppressive," I take it that it is not meant that the respondent was induced to enter into this agreement by fraud, misrepresentation, or deceit, or forced to enter into it by such duress as would entitle him in a court of equity to have it set aside whether it referred to his trade or not, but "oppressive" in the sense that it would, if enforced, deprive him for a lengthened period of the power of employing in any part of the United Kingdom that mechanical and technical skill and knowledge which, as I have said, his own industry, observation, and intelligence have enabled him to acquire in the very specialised manufacturing business of the appellants, thus forcing him to begin life afresh, as it were, and depriving him of the means of supporting himself and his family. If that is what is meant, then such oppression, if it existed, does not concern him alone. The general public suffer with him, for it is in the public interest that a man should be free to exercise his skill and experience to the best advantage for the benefit of himself and all those who desire to employ him. And, in cases like the present, the public interest in respect of such restrictions in the interest of the covenantor if they are not conterminous certainly overlap. It is quite true, as the Master of the Rolls points out, that as things now are, two principles or views of public policy come into conflict in such cases as this—namely, freedom of trade and freedom of contract. While the community is vitally interested in trade being free it is also vitally interested in people being free to contract and being held to their contracts. The facts are all before the House, so one need not be troubled with the question upon whose shoulders, those of the covenantor or those of the covenantee, the burden of proof on issues such as that raised in this case rests.

I think it has been generally assumed that the law upon this subject of the validity or invalidity of contracts in restraint of trade has been authoritatively determined by the decision of this House in Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co. (1), and that it is laid down in the clearest and most happily selected language in the oft-quoted passage of the judgment of Lord MACNAGHTEN, so that it is, I think, no longer necessary to refer to the earlier authorities. The passage runs thus ([1894] A.C. at p. 565):

"The true view at the present time is, I think, this: The public have an interest in every person's carrying on his trade freely; so has the individual. All interference with individual liberty of action in trading and all restraint of trade themselves, if there is nothing more, are contrary to public policy, and therefore void. That is the general rule. But there are exceptions: restraints

A of trade and interference with individual liberty of action may be justified by the special circumstances of a particular case. It is a sufficient justification, and, indeed, it is the only justification if the restriction is reasonable—
 B reasonable that is in reference to the interests of the parties concerned, and reasonable in reference to the interests of the public, so framed and so guarded as to afford adequate protection to the party in whose favour it is imposed, while at the same time it is in no way injurious to the public. That, I think, is the fair result of all the authorities."

C It will be observed that LORD MACNAGHTEN uses the plural, "parties concerned," in the earlier portion of this passage, meaning, apparently, to include both the covenantor and covenantee, while in the latter portion of the passage he merely speaks of "protection" being given to the covenantee, which does not injure the public. But in the opening lines of the passage he had already said that the individual (here the covenantor), as well as the public, have an interest in freedom of trading.

D If it be assumed, as I think it must be, that no person has an abstract right to be protected against competition per se in his trade or business, then the meaning of the entire passage would appear to me to be this: If the restraint affords to the person in whose favour it is imposed nothing more than reasonable protection against something which he is entitled to be protected against, then as between the parties concerned the restraint is to be held to be reasonable in reference to their respective interests, but, notwithstanding this, the restraint may still be held to be injurious to the public and therefore void, the onus of establishing to the satisfaction of the judge who tries the case facts and circumstances which show that the restraint is of the reasonable character mentioned resting upon the person alleging that it is of that character, and the onus of showing that, notwithstanding that it is of that character, it is nevertheless injurious to the public, and, therefore, void resting in the like manner on the party alleging the latter. In Leather Cloth Co. v. Lonsont (2), a case, no doubt, of the sale of the goodwill of a business, I find JAMES, V.-C., also used the phrase "not unreasonable for the protection of the parties," meaning both covenantor and covenantee. Dealing with the contention that a general restraint of trade throughout the United Kingdom is bad on the face of it, he says (L.R. 9 Eq. at pp. 353, 354):

G "I do not read the cases as having laid down that un rebuttable presumption. . . . All the cases, when they come to be examined, seem to establish this principle, that all restraints upon trade are bad as being in violation of public policy, unless they are natural and not unreasonable in dealing legally with some subject-matter of contract. The principle is this: Public policy requires that every man shall be at liberty to work for himself, and shall not be at liberty to deprive himself or the State of his labour, skill, or talent by any contract that he enters into. On the other hand, public policy requires that when a man has, by skill or by any other means, obtained something which he wants to sell, he should be at liberty to sell it in the most advantageous way in the market: and in order to enable him to sell it advantageously in the market it is necessary that he should be able to preclude himself from entering into competition with the purchaser. In such a case the same public policy that enables him to do that does not restrain him from alienating that which he wants to alienate, and, therefore, enables him to enter into any stipulation, however restrictive it is, provided that restriction is not unreasonable having regard to the subject-matter of the contract."

I These considerations in themselves differentiate, in my opinion, the case of the sale of goodwill from the case of master and servant or employer and employee. The vendor in the former case, in the absence of some restrictive covenant, would be entitled to set up in the same line of business as that which he sold in competition with the purchaser, though he could not solicit his own old customers.

The possibility of such competition would necessarily depreciate the value of the goodwill. The covenant excluding it necessarily enhances that value, and presumably the price demanded and paid, and, therefore, all those restrictions on trading are permissible which are necessary at once to secure that the vendor shall get the highest price for what he has to sell, and that the purchaser shall get all he has paid for. Restrictions on freedom of trading are in both classes of case imposed, no doubt, with the common object of protecting property. But there is the resemblance between them, I think, ends. A B

In all cases such as the present one has to ask oneself what are the interests of the employer that are to be protected, and against what is he entitled to have them protected? He is undoubtedly entitled to have his interest in his trade secrets protected, such as secret processes of manufacture which may be of vast value. And that protection may be secured by restraining the employee from divulging these secrets or putting them to his own use. He is also entitled not to have his old customers by solicitation or such other means enticed away from him. But freedom from all competition per se apart from both these things, however lucrative it might be to him, he is not entitled to be protected against. He must be prepared to encounter that even at the hands of a former employee. C

I now turn to the facts to endeavour to ascertain what it is in reality that the appellants seek to be protected against. They are very successful manufacturers of the class of machinery already mentioned. They have specialised in it—standardising many parts common to different types of machines. Though they make some other machinery, this kind constitutes three-fourths of their output. In this manufacture they appear to be the premier firm in England. Their business is very extended. Their head offices are at Loughborough. They have branch offices at London, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Sheffield, Newcastle, Cardiff, and Glasgow. They have a traveller in Ireland, but no office. Their regular and apparently principal customers, as appears from the evidence of their managing director, Mr. H. Morris, are the Admiralty, the War Office, the Government Ordnance Factory, numerous foreign and colonial governments, railway companies both at home and abroad, and, more recently, the Aircraft Department and the torpedo factories. No other customers are named. There is nothing to show that the respondent ever came into personal relations with any of the officers of these Departments or undertakings, or that through his acquaintance or personal influence with any of them he might be able to divert their custom from the plaintiffs to any other firm. There is, I think, no danger whatsoever of anything of that kind. The enticing away of customers is, therefore, really out of the question and may, I think, be put aside. In addition, the appellants have thoroughly organised their business, both on the manufacturing and commercial side of it. They have got up and arranged in an elaborate, careful, and systematic manner a large number of charts, called E charts. These give details of manufacture, charts of strength of materials, and facts ascertained by experience in the carrying on of their various works. They have also drawings, called L sheets, comprising tables and plotted curves, indicating the composition and dimensions suitable for particular jobs. They have drawings of special machines, and elaborate indices of the cost of every piece of machinery turned out by them, as well as minute tabulated details of every job obtained or tendered for. They have kept records of the instructions sent out from time to time as to the method of doing various kinds of work. In addition, they have on the commercial side collected and tabulated information as to the requirements of existing customers and probable requirements of prospective ones, so as to keep a record of the work done for the first class and to determine what kind of advertisement they should send to the second. D E F G H I

All the documents are highly confidential. They are handed out from time to time to the employees; but it is always seen to that they are traced and returned. The information they contain is so detailed and minute that it would be impossible

A for any employee to carry it away in his head. He might retain the recollection of the general character and principle of the elaborate scheme of organisation, but no more. SARGANT, J., has found all these facts. But this tabulated information is not in the nature of a trade secret, such as a secret process of manufacture. The sheets, cards, and formula, and other documents of the kind described are private and confidential documents, the property of the appellants. Clause 6 B rightly and fully protects them against a disclosure of them. A breach of that covenant has not been proved or even threatened. It is claimed, however, by the appellants that this organisation and general method of business are trade secrets which the defendant is not entitled either to divulge to another or use his knowledge of them in the service of any persons other than themselves. The respondent cannot, however, get rid of the impressions left upon his mind by his C experience on the plaintiffs' works; they are part of himself; and, in my view, he violates no obligation express or implied arising from the relation in which he stood to the appellants by using in the service of some persons other than them the general knowledge he has acquired of their scheme of organisation and methods of business.

It is, moreover, in my view, perfectly clear upon the evidence of their managing D director that the danger against which the plaintiffs desired to be protected is neither the enticing away of customers nor the divulgence or use and employment of any trade secret. It is that the respondent would carry away and might put to use in the establishment of their trade rivals the superior skill and knowledge he, the respondent, has by his talent acquired in their works, raise the character of the output of their rivals, improve their methods, and thereby make them more E formidable competitors in trade of the appellants.

That, I think, is plain, and every word of the able and convincing judgment of FARWELL, L.J., in Sir W. C. Leng & Co., Ltd. v. Andrews (3) applies to it. After quoting the passage from the judgment of LORD MACNAGHTEN, which I have already quoted, the lord justice said ([1909] 1 Ch. at pp. 773, 774):

F "The argument which has been addressed to us on behalf of the respondents does not bring the case within that doctrine. That doctrine does not mean that an employer can prevent his employee from using the skill and knowledge in his trade or profession which he has learnt in the course of his employment by means of directions or instructions from the employer. That information and that additional skill he is entitled to use for the benefit of himself and the G benefit of the public, who gain the advantage of his having had such admirable instruction. The case in which the court interferes for the purpose of protection is where use is made, not of the skill which the man may have acquired, but of the secrets of the trade or profession which he had no right to reveal to anyone else—matters which depend to some extent on good faith. A good deal has been said about organisation. The evidence is singularly scanty in regard to details upon the exact meaning of that word in the present case; H but I apprehend that a man who goes into an office is entitled to make use in any other office, whether his own or that of another employer, of the knowledge which he has acquired in the former of details of office organisation, such as the establishment of one department with a chief or head and grades of subordinates under him, the desirability of establishing local centres of information in various towns and villages round about Sheffield, and the like. To acquire I the knowledge of the reasonable mode of general organisation and management of a business of this kind, and to make use of such knowledge, cannot be regarded as a breach of confidence in revealing anything acquired by reason of a person having been in any particular service, although the person may have learnt it in the course of being taught his trade; but it would be a breach of confidence to reveal trade secrets, such as prices, etc., or any secret process or things of a nature which the man was not entitled to reveal."

I think that passage is thoroughly sound.

It was contended that it was open to the respondent even if restrained by the injunction asked for to earn his living as a general engineer. To answer that it is only necessary to consider what was his training. He was twenty-nine years of age last July. In February, 1901, he at the age of fifteen or sixteen years entered the appellant's employment as a junior draftsman. Before he reached twenty-one years of age he had become leading draftsman in a department dealing with pulley blocks, hand overhead runways, and hand overhead travelling cranes, but not up to then with electric overhead runways. His salary was 50s. per week. His work had been confined to this special branch of manufacture. He had no experience of any other. Yet immediately on coming of age he was required to sign an agreement dated July 16, 1906, containing a prohibitive clause similar to that now sued upon save that electric overhead runways are not mentioned in it. Thus before ever he had acquired that varied knowledge and experience of the different branches of the appellants' business, the possession of which by him is now urged as the justification for the covenants relied on, he was similarly bound. This fact strongly suggests that what really prompted to the making of this agreement of July, 1906, was the fear that the respondent's skill as a draftsman might be put at the service of a rival in trade. From March, 1908, to February, 1909, he was at the appellants' establishment in Cardiff as resident engineer, so that up to this his knowledge and experience was confined to the engineering side of this specialised business. In February, 1909, he was transferred to London to manage the selling branch of the business. In 1910 he was sent to Loughborough to take charge of the selling department in connection with the sale of pulley block and Admiralty contracts. He continued there till he left the appellants' employment in April, 1913. Thus his whole engineering training was connected with the manufacture of these four special machines and their component parts. He says he has tried to get employment as a general engineer and has failed, and he was, therefore, obliged, being unable to live in France, to take service with one of the appellants' rivals. I doubt very much if with his want of experience of any kind of engineering other than the one he will ever, or at least for a length of time, be able to obtain employment as a general engineer. This would at all events appear certain that he can only employ his skill and training to the most advantage both to the community and himself by engaging in that class of business in which he has passed his whole working life. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that this agreement binding for a period of seven years, and applying to the whole of the three kingdoms, is not, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, reasonable in reference to the respective interests of the parties concerned, and is prejudicial to the interests of the public. I, accordingly, think that the order appealed from was right and should be affirmed, and this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD SHAW (read by Lord ATKINSON). I am humbly of opinion that the judgments of SARGANT, J., and—in the Court of Appeal—of Lord COZEN HAYES, M.R., and JYCKE, J., are well founded both upon authority and in principle. So satisfied, indeed, is my mind with these judgments that I should feel well content with a simple concurrence therein. But the dissent of PHILLIMORE, L.J., and the heavy assault delivered upon certain opinions recently delivered—notably in Mason v. Provident Clothing and Supply Co., Ltd. (4)—and upon certain principles laid down, or rather re-affirmed, in that and the Additive Starching Case (5)—which principles I thought and still think to be familiar and sound—these things induce me to make the following statement.

I humbly think that this case is covered by the authority of Mason's Case (1). The circumstances were not remotely analogous, and the principles in issue were the same. It finds this House, and I see no cause whatsoever for doubting upon it as not satisfactory to the reason. All that was argued upon it was to the effect that certain observations made in the course of the judgments were merely dicta.

A and were erroneous. These observations were two in number, and they went to the root of the judgment. Nor were they erroneous. The first was, that there does run through this part of the law a real distinction between cases of contracts for the sale of a business, on the one hand, and, on the other, cases of contracts of service. I do not repeat what I ventured to say to this House on that subject in Mason's Case (4). When a business is sold, the vendor, who, it may be, has inherited it or built it up, seeks to realise this piece of property, and obtains a purchaser upon a condition without which the whole transaction would be valueless. He sells, himself agreeing not to compete, and the law upholds such a bargain, and declines to permit a vendor to derogate from his own grant. Public interest cannot be invoked to render such a bargain nugatory: to do so would be to use public interest for the destruction of property. Nothing could be a more sure deterrent to commercial energy and activity than a principle that its accumulated results could not be transferred save under conditions which would make its buyer insecure. In the case of restraints upon the opportunity to a workman to earn his livelihood, a different set of considerations comes into play. No actual thing is sold or handed over by a present to a future possessor. The contract is an embargo upon the energy and activities and labour of a citizen; and the public interest coincides with his own in preventing him, on the one hand from being deprived of the opportunity of earning his living, and it, the public, on the other, from being deprived of the work and service of a useful member of society. In this latter case there is not a something already realised, made over to and for the use of another, but there is a something to be created, developed, and rendered to the individual advantage of the worker and to the use of the community at large. It is much too late in the day to attempt an attack upon a principle of distinction so plain.

The other observation in Mason's Case (4) which was challenged was that applicable to agreements in restraint of the action of employees who left one service for another, or set up in business for themselves. Trade secrets, the names of customers, all such things which in sound philosophical language are denominated objective knowledge—these may not be given away by a servant; they are his master's property, and there is no rule of public interest which prevents a transfer of them against the master's will being restrained. On the other hand, a man's aptitudes, his skill, his dexterity, his manual or mental ability—all those things which in sound philosophical language are not objective, but subjective—they may, and they ought, not to be relinquished by a servant; they are not his master's property; they are his own property; they are himself. There is no public interest which compels the rendering of those things dormant or sterile or unavailing; on the contrary, the right to use and to expand his powers is advantageous to every citizen, and may be highly so for the country at large. This distinction, which was also questioned in argument, is just as plain as the other. An excellent concrete example of the latter point may be found in the present case. The second head of the injunction claimed is "from divulging or communicating . . . information as to the customers or affairs of the plaintiff company and from otherwise divulging or using such information." This is purely objective, and it was with exact correctness made the subject of a separate claim. As it turns out there is no ground for it in fact; it was entirely given up at your Lordships' Bar. But the subjective side appears in this way. The first injunction claimed is an injunction restraining W. Saxelby for a period of seven years from entering the services of Messrs. Vaughan & Sons, and from carrying on in the United Kingdom "either as principal, agent, servant, or otherwise, alone or jointly or in connection with any other person, firm, or company, or being concerned or assisting directly or indirectly, whether for reward or otherwise, in the sale or manufacture of" four or five pieces of machinery named. This echoes correctly the agreement of parties, and the basis of the restraint claimed is that the servant has become, during the seven years passed in the master's service, a clever, well-instructed, and capable man. A

The question is: Can such a voluntary restraint be enforced by law? Observe its scope. In time, it is for seven years of a man's working life. In space, it is over the entire United Kingdom. In subject-matter, it is directly or indirectly and it is wholly, for that time and in that space, subversive of the way of life to which the servant's past special training has led up. This question is legitimate, B and it is legitimately so put. For, in my view, when such an agreed restraint is made the basis of a claim for injunction (i) it is not enough to table the agreement; (ii) facts and circumstances must be set forth which would warrant the law being invoked, and the statement of these facts and circumstances must set out the specialties affecting the relations of parties, or the particular necessities of the case, so as to overcome the presumption which the law makes in favour of the free C disposal of one's own labour; (iii) if such facts and circumstances be relevantly set forth, the onus of proof is upon the party averring them to satisfy the court of their sufficiency to overcome the presumption; while (iv) as the time of restriction lengthens, or the space of its operation extends, the weight of that onus grows. Subject to these conditions and within these limits, a case may be made out for D restraining the general freedom of trade to which the public interest leans, in favour of the particular freedom of contract which it may be established it was not inconsistent with the general interest to maintain. Furthermore, I may be allowed to allude to what I think is a misapprehension upon this topic of public interest, and the interest of the contracting parties. It is too apt to be supposed that these things are in collision or antagonism; and ground is thought to be E obtained for this opinion in the well-known sentences of LORD MACNAGHTEN in the Nordenfelt Case (1). It is because the law is the protector of freedom both of contract and of trade that it has to adjust the bounds of each. It is well settled that the law will not sustain a covenant of the kind here in question when its provisions go beyond those necessary for the protection of the interest of the covenantee. The interest of the covenantor has also to be considered, and LORD F MACNAGHTEN's words specifically referred to the interest of both parties. But the interest of the covenantor entirely equates, in kind, although not in degree, with the interest of the public; and he can only be successful in pleading his own interest if he is able to establish that the restraint upon him is of a kind and type which, if general, would be injurious to society at large. It is thus that the apparent conflict is reconciled, and an adjustment of all the interests concerned is G secured.

The delicacy of the operation of law in settling the bounds of either freedom has been long familiar. In these cases, as I have pointed out, there are two freedoms to be considered, one the freedom of trade and the other the freedom of contract: and to that I will now again venture to add that it is a mistake to think that public H interest is only concerned with one. It is concerned with both. It may be, and probably is, that jurisprudence has reflected the evolution of economic thought by accentuating at one period freedom of trade, and at another freedom of contract; but the stage of balance and reconciliation which has now been definitely reached is, it may be observed, in truth a reversion to, and a re-statement of, the perennial problem set forth in the penetrating judgment of LORD MACCLESFIELD in Mitchel v. Reynolds (6), in which, speaking more than two centuries ago, he says (1 I P. Wms. at p. 182):

"The resolutions of the books upon these contracts seeming to disagree, I will endeavour to state the law upon this head and to reconcile the jarring opinions."

In my opinion, Mitchel v. Reynolds (6) still remains among all the decisions one of the most outstanding and helpful authorities. LORD MACCLESFIELD states the principle in a form which seems to fit and rule many very modern conditions, and many developments of commerce and of contract (ibid. at p. 190):

A "The true reasons of the distinctions upon which the judgments in these cases of voluntary restraints are founded are, first, the mischief which may arise from them, first to the party by the loss of his livelihood, and the subsistence of his family; secondly, to the public by depriving it of a useful member. Another reason is the great abuses these voluntary restraints are liable to; as, for instance, from corporations, who are perpetually labouring for exclusive advantages in trade, and to reduce it into as few hands as possible; as likewise from masters, who are apt to give their apprentices much vexation, on this account, and to use many indirect practices to procure such bonds from them, lest they should prejudice them in their custom when they come to set up for themselves."

C These principles are far-reaching and enlightened. In my opinion, they may have been now and again in the course of these two centuries obscured: they have never been lost. When they are applied in the present instance, the case is simplicity itself. It is admitted that on the objective side nothing has been done amiss. I do not see that there were any trade secrets; if there were any, they have not been given away. It is not suggested that they will be, and this is the case also with information about customers, &c.; in fact, the whole of that claim for injunction has been abandoned. As to what remains, namely, the claim against Mr. Saxelby setting up or assisting in a business which does the special engineering work in which he was trained, this is rested upon the likelihood that his own abilities, skill, and knowledge would be of advantage to himself or others as competitors in manufacture and trade. So rested, it is an audacious claim, whether regarded from the point of view of the parties or of the public. From E the point of view of the appellants it is plainly put, a claim against competition per se, a claim to cripple all rivals in trade by the denial to them of a supply of all skilled labour which has had the advantage of being performed under the appellants, and accordingly pro tanto to compel them to seek for labour in a foreign market. From the point of view of the respondent it is, justly interpreted, F a claim to put him in such a bondage in regard to his own labour that, if he seek to find employment or advancement elsewhere, he must, for seven years of his life, become an exile. From the point of view of the public one would have thought that it was at least not inconsistent with the public interest to "let knowledge grow from more to more." And under modern conditions, both of society and of trade, it would appear to be in accord with the public interest to open and not to shut G the markets of these islands to the skilled labour and the commercial and industrial abilities of its inhabitants, to further and not to obstruct for these les carrières ouvertes. All such considerations are shut down under an appeal to enforce this restraint, and I am humbly of opinion that its enforcement cannot be compelled by law. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

H LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON (read by LORD SUMNER).—In Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co. (1), LORD MACNAGHTEN considered most if not all of the prior cases relating to contracts in restraint of trade, and came to certain conclusions. I had to consider them in A.-G. of the Commonwealth of Australia v. Adelaide Steamship Co. (5), and I adhere to everything I then said. As I read LORD MACNAGHTEN's judgment, he was of opinion that all restraints I on trade of themselves, if there is nothing more, are contrary to public policy, and, therefore, void. It is not that such restraints must of themselves necessarily operate to the public injury, but that it is against the policy of the common law to enforce them except in cases where there are special circumstances to justify them. The onus of proving such special circumstances must, of course, rest on the party alleging them. When once they are proved, it is a question of law for the decision of the judge whether they do or do not justify the restraint. There is no question of onus one way or another. It will be observed that in LORD

MACNAGHTEN'S opinion two conditions must be fulfilled if the restraint is to be held valid. First, it must be reasonable in the interests of the contracting parties, and, secondly, it must be reasonable in the interests of the public. In the case of each condition he lays down a test of reasonableness. To be reasonable in the interests of the parties the restraint must afford adequate protection to the party in whose favour it is imposed; to be reasonable in the interests of the public it must be in no way injurious to the public.

With regard to the former test, I think it clear that what is meant is that for a restraint to be reasonable in the interests of the parties it must afford no more than adequate protection to the party in whose favour it is imposed. So conceived, the test appears to me to be valid both as regards the covenantor and covenantee, for though in one sense, no doubt, it is contrary to the interests of the covenantor to subject himself to any restraint, still it may be for his advantage to be able so to subject himself in cases where, if he could not do so, he would lose other advantages, such as the possibility of obtaining the best terms on the sale of an existing business or the possibility of obtaining employment or training under competent employers. As long as the restraint to which he subjects himself is no wider than is required for the adequate protection of the person in whose favour it is created, it is in his interest to be able to bind himself for the sake of the indirect advantages he may obtain by so doing. It was at one time thought that in order to ascertain whether a restraint were reasonable in the interests of the covenantor, the court ought to weigh the advantages accruing to the covenantor under the contract against the disadvantages imposed upon him by the restraint, but any such process has long since been rejected as impracticable. The court no longer considers the adequacy of the consideration in any particular case. If it be reasonable that a covenantee should, for his own protection, ask for a restraint, it is, in my opinion, equally reasonable that the covenantor should be able to subject himself to this restraint. The test of reasonableness is the same in both cases.

It was suggested in argument that the interests of the public ought to be considered and weighed in determining whether a restraint is reasonable in the interests of the parties. I dissent from this view. It would, indeed, entirely destroy the value of Lord Macnaghten's tests of reasonableness. The first question in every case is whether the restraint is reasonable in the interests of the parties. If it is not, the restraint is bad. If it is, it may still be shown that it is injurious to the public, though, as I pointed out in the case referred to, the onus of so showing would lie on the party alleging it.

It appears to me that Lord Macnaghten's statement of the law requires amplification in another respect. If the restraint is to secure no more than "adequate protection" to the party in whose favour it is imposed, it becomes necessary to consider in each particular case what it is for which and what it is against which protection is required. Otherwise it would be impossible to pass any opinion on the adequacy of the protection. In the Nordenfelt Case (1) that which it was required to protect was the goodwill of a business transferred by the covenantor to the covenantee, and that against which protection was sought was competition by the covenantor throughout the area in which such business was carried on. Under the particular circumstances of the case a world-wide covenant against competition was held no more than adequate for the purchaser's protection. It was argued before your Lordships that no distinction can be drawn between the position of the purchaser of the goodwill of a business taking such a covenant from his vendor and the case of the owner of a business taking such a covenant from his servant or apprentice. In both cases it was said that the property to be protected was the same, and the dangers to be guarded against the same. I am of opinion that this argument cannot be accepted. The distinction between the two cases is, I think, quite clear, and is recognised both by Lord Macnaghten and Lord

A HERSCHELL in the Nordenfjelt Case (1). The goodwill of a business is immune from the danger of the owner exercising his personal knowledge and skill to its detriment, and if the purchaser is to take over such goodwill with all its advantages it must, in his hands, remain similarly immune. Without, therefore, a covenant on the part of the vendor against competition, a purchaser would not get what he is contracting to buy, nor could the vendor give what he is intending to sell.

B The covenant against competition is, therefore, reasonable if confined to the area within which it would in all probability enure to the injury of the purchaser.

It is quite different in the case of an employer taking such a covenant from his employee or apprentice. The goodwill of his business is, under the conditions in which we live, necessarily subject to the competition of all persons (including the servant or apprentice) who choose to engage in a similar trade. The employer

C in such a case is not endeavouring to protect what he has, but to gain a special advantage which he could not otherwise secure. I cannot find any case in which a covenant against competition by a servant or apprentice has, as such, ever been upheld by the court. Wherever such covenants have been upheld it has been on the ground, not that the servant or apprentice would, by reason of his employment or training, obtain the skill and knowledge necessary to equip him as a possible

D competitor in the trade, but that he might obtain such personal knowledge of the influence over the customers of his employer, or such an acquaintance with his employer's trade secrets as would enable him, if competition were allowed, to take advantage of his employer's trade connection or utilise information confidentially obtained. As might be expected, where the cases are so numerous, it is not impossible to find dicta pointing to a contrary conclusion. I refer in especial

E to what was said by PARKE, B., in Mallan v. May (7), but even here it is to be observed that counsel in argument supported the validity of the covenant on the ground that it was no more than was necessary to prevent the defendant from availing himself of the knowledge he had acquired in the plaintiff's service to interfere with the plaintiff's customers. If a covenant restraining competition by an employee were in itself reasonable, it is difficult to see why the court has

F considered in almost every case whether such covenant could be justified as no more than sufficient to protect trade connection and trade secrets.

The point did not arise for actual decision until Sir W. C. Leng & Co., Ltd. v. Andrews (3). In that case the covenantor was a newspaper reporter. He did not in the course of his employment come across the covenantee's customers, nor was he intrusted by his employers with any confidential information whatever. The

G effect of the covenant, therefore, was merely to prevent him using his personal skill and knowledge within the limited area mentioned in the covenant; in other words, it was merely to preclude competition. In these circumstances it was unanimously held that the covenant was bad. In Mison v. Provident Clothing and Supply Co., Ltd. (4) it was argued, apparently for the first time in this class of case, that an

H employer might reasonably say: "I will not have the skill and knowledge acquired in my employment imparted to my trade rivals," and that the validity of the restraint did not depend upon personal contact with the employer's customers, but upon the fact that the employee gained that general knowledge which put him into a position to compete with his master and made him a source of danger, against which the master was entitled to protect himself. This argument was

I rejected by your Lordships' House, and the restraint in question was held bad, as being wider than was necessary to protect the employer from injury by misuse of the employee's acquaintance with customers or knowledge of trade secrets. In fact the reason, and the only reason, for upholding such a restraint on an employee is that the employer has some proprietary right, whether in the nature of trade connection or in the nature of trade secrets, for the protection of which such a restraint is—having regard to the duties of the employee—reasonably necessary. Such a restraint has, so far as I know, never been upheld, if directed only to the prevention of competition or against the use of the personal skill and knowledge acquired by the employee in the employer's business. A

It remains to apply what I have said to the particular circumstances of the present case. Mr. Herbert Morris, the managing director of the plaintiff company, very candidly admitted that the real object of the plaintiff company in imposing the restraint was to preclude competition on the part of the defendant after he had left the company's employment. The company objected, he said, to skill and knowledge acquired in its service being put at the disposition of any trade rival, and the skill and knowledge he referred to was the general skill and knowledge which an employee of any ability must necessarily obtain as opposed to knowledge of any matter and skill in any process in which the company could be said to have any property at all. To use Lord SHAW's metaphor in Mason v. Provident Clothing and Supply Co., Ltd. (4), it was "subjective" as opposed to "objective" skill and knowledge; or, to use the expression of JOYCE, J., in this case, it was skill and knowledge "which were his own," and in no sense the plaintiffs' property. As directed against competition or against the use of this skill and knowledge, I am clearly of opinion that the restraint was in no way required for the plaintiffs' protection, and, therefore, unreasonable and bad in law. An attempt was, however, made in argument to justify the restraint on the ground that it was no more than adequate for the protection of the plaintiffs' trade connection and trade secrets. I am of opinion that this attempt completely failed. With regard to the plaintiffs' connection, there is little or no evidence that the defendant ever came into personal contact with the plaintiffs' customers. For a period, it is true, he was manager of the London branch of the plaintiffs' business, and for another period sales manager at Loughborough. With the exception of these periods he was employed entirely in the engineering department. Had the restraint been confined to London and Loughborough and a reasonable area round each of these centres, it might possibly have been supported as reasonably necessary to protect the plaintiffs' connection, but a restraint extending over the United Kingdom was obviously too wide in this respect. I am not satisfied that the defendant was intrusted with any trade secret in the proper sense of the word at all. Counsel for the appellants boldly argued that the expression "trade secrets" ought to be extended so as to include everything which Mr. Morris claimed to be peculiar to the plaintiffs method of carrying on their business. I will assume that the matters referred to by counsel are in fact peculiar to the plaintiffs' business, though I can hardly regard Mr. Morris's uncorroborated evidence as very satisfactory proof that the practices in question were unknown to other firms. Still, the manner in which SARGANT, J., dealt with this part of the case appears to me to be unanswerable. Though the defendant had access to the E charts, the L sheets, the drawings of special machines, the costs index, and other documents, all of which may be considered confidential, these documents were far too detailed for the defendant to carry away their contents in his head. All that he could carry away was the general method and character of the scheme of organisation practised by the plaintiff company. Such scheme and method can hardly be regarded as a trade secret. The same applies to the plaintiff company's system of standardising mechanical apparatus capable of being used in more than one class of machine. The nearest approach that I can find in the evidence to anything in the nature of a trade secret is the mention of certain formulae, said to be based on the plaintiff's experience, and to be more trustworthy than Mohsworth's formulae for similar purposes. During the course of the argument your Lordships asked for, but failed to obtain these formulae, and, therefore, I am unable to judge whether they are such that the defendant could carry them in his memory. I, therefore, cannot attach any great importance to them. It would be a point of some difficulty whether the possession by an employee of a single trade secret would justify a restraint as wide as that in the present case, but under the circumstances I do not consider that this point really arises. In my opinion, the law

A falls within your Lordships' decision in Mason v. Provident Clothing and Supply Co., Ltd. (4). The appeal therefore fails.

LORD SUMNER.—I have had the advantage of reading and considering the judgment of my noble and learned friend LORD PARKER, and I entirely agree with it.

Bankruptcy—Proof—Secured creditor—Voting in respect of “whole debt”—
No valuation of security—Voting in respect of debt proved—Other debts due covered by security—Surrender of security—Omission to value security arising from inadvertence—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59), Sched. 1, para. 10.

The creditor of a bankrupt proved for a debt, but deliberately refrained from mentioning a security which covered not only the debt proved but also any other debts which might become due. At a creditors' meeting the creditor voted in respect of the whole debt proved, but at the time he was owed further sums by the bankrupt all of which were covered by security. On a motion by the trustee in bankruptcy that by voting in respect of his “whole debt” within para. 10 of Sched. 1 to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, he had surrendered his security,

Held: the creditor, having voted in respect of the debt proved, had voted in respect of his “whole debt” within para. 10, and, as the court was not satisfied, as a question of fact, that the omission to value the security had arisen by inadvertence, the creditor must be deemed to have surrendered his security.

Motion on behalf of a trustee in bankruptcy for a declaration that a secured creditor had surrendered a security, consisting of an indenture of indemnity and mortgage, by voting at a meeting of creditors in respect of the whole debt comprised in the proof; that he was not entitled to rank as a secured creditor on the property comprised in the security in priority to the trustee; and for an order that the deed might be cancelled in so far as it consisted of a security on the property of the bankrupt. There was also a cross motion of the secured creditor for an order that he might amend his proof by inserting therein the particulars and value of the security, or, in the alternative, that he might withdraw the proof and rely on the security. In the further alternative he asked for a declaration that the mortgage was not affected except in so far as it relates to the debt in respect of which the proof was lodged—namely, £1,113.

In December, 1906, the debtor executed an indenture of indemnity in favour of Captain Bewicke, a secured creditor, which was not dated, because it was to include a policy of insurance on the debtor's life for £7,500, which, although arranged for, had not then been issued. The mortgage was prepared by one Weatherley, the secured creditor's then solicitor, as security for all moneys which might be paid by the secured creditor on certain bills which he had indorsed. In addition to the policy, the mortgage was to include the debtor's interest under his marriage settlement. On Nov. 16, 1906, the draft was settled by counsel. The deed was executed in the presence of Weatherley on Dec. 28, 1906. He subsequently gave it to his clerk to be stamped, and kept it for some time.

A letter dated Dec. 28, 1906, referring to the deed and signed by the debtor, was read to the court. In February, 1907, the debtor desired to borrow from one Leslie on the security of his interest under the mortgage. The secured creditor agreed to postpone his security to enable this to be done. The original of the deed could not now be found, but a copy was produced on the solicitors undertaking to have it stamped. On Sept. 11, 1907, a receiving order was made against the debtor. The secured creditor made no mention of the security in his proof for £1,113, Weatherby being ill at the time; but he attended a creditors' meeting next day and voted in respect of his proof. It comprised three items—namely £100, money lent on April 12, 1907; £509, money paid to the sheriff on June 8, 1907; and £504, paid to Wilton & Co. on Aug. 10, 1907. On the date when Captain Bewicke voted the debtor owed him two further sums—namely, £42 for the preparation of the deed above referred to and £149, a year's premium on the policy. He was also under a contingent liability. All of these matters were covered by the mortgage. Affidavits of the secured creditor, Weatherley, a member of the firm of Kenneth Brown, Baker, Baker & Co., and of the trustee were read to the court.

The motion was resisted on the ground that the omission to value the security was due to inadvertence within the meaning of para. 10 of Sched. 1 to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, which provides that:

"For the purpose of voting, a secured creditor shall, unless he surrenders his security, state in his proof the particulars of his security, the date when it was given, and the value at which he assesses it, and shall be entitled to vote only in respect of the balance (if any) due to him, after deducting the value of his security. If he votes in respect of his whole debt he shall be deemed to have surrendered his security unless the court on application is satisfied that the omission to value the security has arisen from inadvertence."

Cur. adv. vult.

May 14, 1917. HORRIDGE, J., read the following judgment: In this case there were two motions, one asking in effect for a declaration that a security

A dated Dec. 28, 1906, on the property of the bankrupt had been surrendered by the respondent within the provisions of para. 10 of Sched. 1 to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, he having voted in respect of his whole debt, and the other, being a cross-motion by Captain Bewicke to amend his proof of debt for £1,113, sworn by him on Nov. 5, 1907, by inserting therein particulars and value of such security. I am satisfied upon the evidence before me that the security in question was, in fact, executed on or about the date which it now bears. The letter dated Dec. 28, 1906, signed by the bankrupt, and addressed to Messrs. Weatherley & Co., referring to the deed of indemnity and charge given to Captain Bewicke, was, I think, clearly written in 1906, even though possibly the date may have been afterwards altered. Further, it was not disputed the policy referred to in the deed was in fact obtained from the Caledonian Insurance Co. about that time.

C The question of fact which I have to decide is whether or not I am satisfied that the omission to insert the particulars and value of the security in the proof of Nov. 5, 1907, arose from inadvertence. The trustee says the omission to mention the security was intentional, and was due to an arrangement previously entered into between the bankrupt and Captain Bewicke, and Captain Bewicke agreed, though taking the security, to keep the fact of its existence secret. The provisions of the deed itself throw some light upon the matter. By cl. 6 it was provided that Captain Bewicke should not give notice to the trustees or trustee for the time being of the realty settlement or of the personalty settlement (the subject-matters of which settlements are included in the security) unless and until he should have demanded payment, and default should have been made by the bankrupt for fourteen days, but this provision was not to preclude notice of the security being given to the assurance society or to any prior mortgagee, or preclude registration of the security as the grant of an annuity or otherwise. The deed was not dated and no notice of its existence was in fact given to the trustees, to the assurance company, to any prior mortgagee, nor was it stamped or registered. The bankrupt stated that on the evening of the day on which the security was given he had an understanding with Captain Bewicke stating he held the mortgage and would not put it into force, and that he would rely on the bankrupt's getting sufficient money on some future date, and that he would give the bankrupt plenty of time to do that. Captain Bewicke stated in evidence that he did agree to keep the bankrupt's affairs as dark as he could. A further advance was subsequently obtained on the property, the subject matter of the security, from the Economic Assurance Society, and on Jan. 18, 1907, Messrs. Beachcroft, Thomson & Co. informed Messrs. Weatherley & Co., who had acted as solicitors for both parties at the time of the giving of the security in question, that such loan of £6,000 from the Economic Society had been completed and the bankrupt had signed a further equitable charge for £2,000 in their favour. At this time Messrs. Weatherley & Co. held the mortgage deed of Dec. 28, 1906, and they in no way communicated with Captain Bewicke. The mortgage deed, in fact, had been left in the custody of Messrs. Weatherley & Co., and, according to the evidence of Mr. Weatherley, had never been placed in his strong room, where such a security would ordinarily be put. When the proof came to be made on the bankruptcy of Pawson, Mr. Weatherley was ill, and Captain Bewicke employed another solicitor, Mr. Cobbold, who, as appears from the evidence of the witness Cooper, did obtain certain particulars from him necessary for the preparation of the proof. The proof was put in for three sums—£100 money lent on I.O.U., £509 paid to Messrs. Wilton & Co., and £504 paid to Messrs. Wilton & Co. At the time of this proof Captain Bewicke had also paid £42 for costs of the preparation of the deed, £149 for the year's premium on the policy of assurance, and he was also liable as surety for the bankrupt on bills for a considerable amount on which he had placed his name. The proof remained on the file, and nothing was heard of the security on Dec. 28, 1906, until, as appears by the affidavit of Mr. Weatherley, he discovered it at the beginning of 1916 in a bundle of papers relating to Captain Bewicke's affairs which had remained in his possession. Shortly after this discovery, namely, on Mar. 16, 1916, a notice was served on the trustee of the estate of the bankrupt setting out particulars of the deed and the amounts which had become payable under it. By an indenture dated Dec. 31, 1906, the bankrupt, with the consent of the Economic Assurance Society, had appointed receivers of the premises included in the security of Dec. 25, 1906, and they have continued down to the present time and up to the receipt of the notice of Mar. 16, 1916, and have accounted for any surplus of the rents and profits to the trustee in this bankruptcy without notice of the mortgage of Dec. 28, 1906. A B

The question I have to consider is whether or not I am satisfied the omission to value the security arose from inadvertence. In Re Burr, Ex parte Clarke (1) VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., took the view inadvertence would not be constituted in a case in which the creditor, balancing the advantage and disadvantage of stating and valuing his security, deliberately elects to prove for his whole debt; but as was pointed out by that learned judge when sitting in the Court of Appeal in Re Safety Explosives, Ltd. (2), this was mentioned amongst things which could not constitute inadvertence, and I do not consider in the earlier case the learned judge intended to lay down an exclusive definition. STIRLING, L.J., in Re Safety Explosives, Ltd. (2) reverts to the Bankruptcy Act in using the word "inadvertence." D It must always, I think, be a question of fact whether the judge is satisfied the omission to value has arisen from inadvertence. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., speaks in his judgment in Re Safety Explosives, Ltd. (2) of "the onus which was clearly on him of showing that the omission was caused by inadvertence."

It was argued before me that Captain Bewicke did not know the security ought to be valued, and Mr. Cobbold, the solicitor who prepared the proof, did not know of the existence of the security; but these facts are not inconsistent with Captain Bewicke having deliberately decided he would not produce his security under any circumstances, and it must be borne in mind that the production of it in November, 1907, might have led to inquiries as to why the bankrupt did not give notice of it to the trustee. The facts as deposed to in para. 5 of Captain Bewicke's affidavit as to the deed having been disclosed and then postponed to a security to one Leslie were pressed before me as showing it could not have been intended to conceal the deed, but nothing was proved before me as to the circumstances under which the advance by Leslie was made. There may have been good reasons, such as a requirement by Leslie of a declaration as to encumbrances, which the parties were not prepared to make, and it may have been that the advance by Leslie was made under such circumstances as to prevent the knowledge of the making of the security of Dec. 28, 1906, coming to the trustee. Answer No. 80 given in his private examination was much relied upon by counsel for Captain Bewicke. In that answer he says he remembers previously to a race in March, 1907, he had broken with the bankrupt, and, therefore, it was said he would not be likely to withdraw his security when he came to prove his debt, and I think his still desiring not to show inconsistent with his being on less friendly relationship with the bankrupt. I was very dissatisfied with the way in which Captain Bewicke gave his evidence. He was not sure that his proof had been prepared by Mr. Cobbold, though he said to the best of his belief it had. He could not remember definitely going to Mr. Cobbold about the proof. He said to the best of his belief he did not tell Mr. Cobbold about the mortgage; he did not understand anything about it, although he knew he had security of sorts. His memory was to my mind quite unreliable, and he certainly did not satisfy me the concealment of the mortgage was unintentionally done. Upon the whole of the facts I am of opinion the security was intentionally concealed by Captain Bewicke, and I certainly am not satisfied that the omission to mention or value it arose from inadvertence. E F G H I

I, therefore, cannot see my way to give him any relief under para. 10 of Sched. 1 to the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. A difficult question remains. At the time when the proof was tendered the bankrupt was further indebted to Captain Bewicke in the

- A sums of £12 and £149, and Captain Bewicke was entitled to prove also for his contingent liability as a surety who had put his name on the bankrupt's bills: Re Paine (3). All these matters were duly covered by the security, and the proof should have been made for the full amount of the actual and contingent liability setting out the particulars of the mortgage of Dec. 28, 1905, which secured all these matters. Does the omission here to value such security cause the security
- B to be entirely surrendered to the trustee, or is it still a security for the matters which were not included in the proof? The words of para. 10 of Sched. 1, are: "... If he votes in respect of his whole debt he shall be deemed to have surrendered his security . . ." I think the words "whole debt" are used in contradistinction to the previous words in the paragraph "balance (if any) due to him after deducting the value of his security." I think he votes in respect of his whole debt within
- C the meaning of para. 10, if he votes in respect of the debt which he has proved, and that, therefore, he must be deemed having not chosen to put in a claim for his whole debt, to nevertheless have surrendered the security within the words of para. 10 and not merely a portion of the security. This seems to be the only workable rule, as otherwise, under these circumstances, there would be a partial surrendering of the security to which the trustee would be entitled, and the balance of the
- D same security would be held by Captain Bewicke as a security for a portion of his claim which he omitted to insert in his proof. I think he must be taken, by not valuing the security, to have surrendered it in its entirety.

The proper order seems to be to dismiss Captain Bewicke's motion with costs, and to make an order upon the earlier motion of the trustee in the terms of the notice of motion. I thought it right to have before me the prior and subsequent

E incumbrancers on the property, the subject-matter of the mortgage of Dec. 28, 1906, and they were represented by counsel appearing for them all. On the hearing it was agreed I should state in my judgment that I decide no question of priority as between the incumbrancers and the trustee. I think they were, however, necessary parties to be present at the disposal of these motions, and therefore I direct that Captain Bewicke also pay their costs. If my decision as to the whole

F of the security having been surrendered is correct, I think the trustee ought now to admit a further or amended proof in respect of the other liabilities of the bankrupt to Captain Bewicke which were not included in his first proof, but of course Captain Bewicke would not be entitled in any way to claim the value of the security if he adopts the course of sending in a further or amended proof.

Charity—Benefit to community—Education—Gift to provide annual treat or field day for school children.

By her will the testatrix directed that the proceeds of sale of certain property should be paid to the vicar and trustees of St. A.'s Church, T., to be held on trust as to one half of the income thereof to provide an annual treat or field day for the school children of T. on the anniversary of her birth, and the trustees were given a power of selection among the children to participate in such treat.

Adjourned Summons.

The testatrix Mary Priscilla Mellody, who died on Jan. 1, 1917, by her will, dated Aug. 4, 1916, appointed the plaintiffs James Henry Brandwood and Malcolm Keith, executors and trustees, and gave, devised and bequeathed to them two leasehold dwelling-houses and premises at Turton in the county of Lancaster upon trust to sell the same, and, after payment of all incidental costs and expenses and the costs and expenses in connection with the preparation of any necessary trust deed to carry out the trust thereby declared, to stand possessed of the residue of the moneys to arise from such sale in trust to pay the same to the vicar and trustees for the time being of St. Anne's Church, Turton, to be held by them upon trust to invest the residue of the moneys to arise from such sale and to hold and stand possessed of such investments, upon trust as to one equal half part of the net income to arise from such investments to provide an annual treat or tea party for the aged poor people of Turton, or as many of such as the same would provide for, such annual treat or tea party to take place on Jan. 17 in each year, unless a Sunday, and then the day before such date (such date being the anniversary of the birth of her deceased husband Joseph Mellody), and as to the other equal half part of the income to provide an annual treat or field day for the school children of Turton or as many of such children as the same would provide

A for, such annual treat or field day to take place on the nearest Saturday to May 21 in each year, that being the anniversary of her own birth, and the testatrix expressly desired and directed that such treats should be respectively called the "Joseph Mellody Treat" and the "Mrs. Joseph Mellody Treat," and that the vicar and trustees and their successors should have full power to elect what persons should be entitled to participate in such treats respectively. And the

B testatrix gave all her residuary real and personal estate upon trust for the infant defendant Winifred Haden as and when she should attain the age of twenty-one years.

In the parish of Turton there were about 600 children and three schools, St. Anne's Church of England School; the Edgworth Wesleyan School, and the Hob Lane Council School. No question arose concerning the bequest for the treat for the aged poor people of Turton, which was admittedly a good charitable gift. This

C summons was taken out by the trustees of the will to determine whether the bequest for the purpose of providing an annual treat or field day for the school children of Turton was a valid charitable trust, or was void and fell into residue and to whom the trustees ought to pay the proceeds of sale of the two dwelling-houses.

J. W. Manning for the trustees of the will.

D St. John Clerke for the vicar of St. Anne's Church, Turton.

EVE, J.—I think that this gift can be supported as a good charitable gift on two grounds, first, as tending to the advancement of education; and, secondly, as

E being for purposes beneficial to a particular section of the community. It is no doubt true that a school treat may not always be used only for educational purposes, but it does not necessarily follow that it partakes of the orgies of a juvenile bean-feast. It may well be made, and I doubt not often is made, the occasion for pointing out to the children those objects of the countryside and nature about which in their school hours they have read in their books, or which they have

F seen in the pictures displayed upon the walls of their schoolroom, but with which they can make no more intimate acquaintance in school. I think also that there was a good deal of force in the argument of counsel for the vicar of St. Anne's Church that the possibility of being included in the list of those elected to participate in this annual treat would tend to encourage regularity in attendance at school and in the work and habits of the children, and to promote industry and zeal in

G their studies. On these grounds I think that this can be supported as a gift tending to the advancement of education. Further, I think that it is a gift for purposes beneficial to a section of the community. In the circumstances of the present devastating war, children constitute a very important section of the community; this is a trust for the benefit of the school children of Turton, whether the children attending a school of any particular denomination I will not pretend

H to say, but it is a trust for a large and important section of the public resident or being educated in Turton, and on that ground also it is, in my opinion, also a good charitable gift. The fund will be transferred to the Official Trustees of Charitable Funds, and a scheme for its administration will have to be prepared.

Conflict of Laws—Power of appointment—Special power to appoint by will—Exercise by will in Italian form and valid by Italian law, but unattested by witnesses—Letters of administration with will annexed admitted to probate in England—Wills Act, 1837 (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict., c. 26), s. 9, s. 10, s. 27.

By a marriage settlement dated 1855 personal property in England was given to trustees in trust for such of the children of the marriage as, in the events which happened, W. should "by will appoint." W. died in Italy in 1914, having acquired an Italian domicile and having by her will, made in Italian form, expressed the desire that her unmarried children should have equal shares in the settled property. The will was valid according to Italian law, but had not been attested by witnesses. Letters of administration with the will annexed were granted out of the Probate Division of the High Court in England.

Held: "will" in the instrument creating such a power was not limited to a will executed in accordance with the law of England, but included any instrument recognised by the law of England as a will, and, as the Italian will had been admitted to probate in England, it operated as a valid execution of the special power of appointment in the English settlement.

Adjourned Summons to determine whether a power of appointment had been properly exercised by a certain testamentary instrument. In a marriage settlement of English property dated 1855 the gift to the trustees was "in trust for such of the children of the marriage as," in the events that had happened, L. C. Wilkinson should by will appoint. L. C. Wilkinson died in 1914 in Italy, where she had resided for about twenty-seven years, and had acquired an Italian domicile. She made a will in Italian form valid according to Italian law but with no attesting witnesses to it, and in it she desired that the unmarried children should have equal shares in the settled property, which was in fact all personalty or treated as such, adding, "and any other property which I can have the power and the right to dispose of," and an additional £100 was given to the unmarried son. Letters of administration with this will annexed were granted out of the Probate Division of the High Court of Justice in England, and it was submitted that this will was a good exercise of the power.

CD*E

The trustees of the settlement took out an originating summons raising the questions (i) whether the domicile of the testatrix was Italian; (ii) whether her will purported to exercise the power; and (iii) whether the will operated to exercise the power, although executed in such a manner as to be in direct compliance with Italian law only, and not with the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837.

Owen Thompson for the unmarried children who claimed under the will.

Devonshire (Dighton Pollock with him) for the married children.

Cur. adv. vult.

GH*I

Mar. 16, 1917. SARGANT, J., read the following judgment: In this case I have already expressed my view (i) that Mrs. Wilkinson was domiciled in Italy for many years prior to her death; (ii) that her will purported to exercise the power of appointment amongst children vested in her under her marriage settlement; and (iii) that her will operated to exercise the power, although executed in such a manner as to be in direct compliance with Italian law only and not with the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837. I thought, however, in view of the numerous authorities on the last of these points, that as to this point I had better put my reasons into writing. The question to be solved seems to me to be most clearly and definitely stated at the beginning of the admirable judgment of STIRLING, J., in Re Price, Tomlin v. Latter (1). It is whether the word "will" in such a power as occurs in the settlement here includes any instrument recognised by the law of England as a will, or is limited to a will executed in accordance with the law of England. STIRLING, J., answered this question, as LORD ROMILLY had previously answered it in D'Huart v. Harkness (2), namely, by holding that the word "will" had the wider of the two meanings, and that, secondly, the conditions requisite to the exercise of the power had been complied with when once you found probate in this country of a will and a donee of such a power purporting to exercise the power. Both D'Huart v. Harkness (2) and Re Price (1) were cases in which the power was a general power, while here the power is a special power. But, in my judgment, this does not alter the nature of the problem to be solved, and when once English law has recognised a document as a will by admitting it to probate, that document is a will within the meaning of such a power as this, and is therefore capable of exercising the power. It is true that the decision in Re Kirwan's Trusts (3) (where D'Huart v. Harkness (2) was not cited) and the case of Hummel v.

Hummel (4) were to some extent in conflict with D'Huart v. Harkness (2); but Re Price (1) seriously weakened the authority of Re Kirwan's Trusts (3) and Hummel v. Hummel (4), and must at least be taken as limiting their operation to cases where the will purporting to exercise the power could only be admitted to English probate under the provisions of Lord Kingsdown's Act [Wills Act, 1861].

It is also true that Re D'Este's Settlement Trusts (5) and Re Scholefield, Scholefield v. St. John (6) have again cast doubts on the generality of the application of the rule in D'Huart v. Harkness (2) and have at least created exceptions from the rule—namely, in a class of cases where there is no indication in the will itself of an intention to exercise the general power, and such exercise would only take place by virtue of the provisions of s. 27 of the Wills Act, 1837, but both these cases have been seriously criticised in and much shaken by the recent decision of NEVILLE, J., in Re Simpson, Coultts & Co. v. Church Missionary Society (7), with which I entirely agree, and to the reasoning in which I think the following addition may perhaps be made: s. 27 of the Wills Act, 1837, though contained in an Act relating to wills, is really an enactment dealing primarily with powers, and property subject to powers, rather than with wills. That section seems to me to recognise that the interest of the donee of a general power of appointment over property is so analogous to ownership of property that a will of that person making a general disposition of property should, prima facie, be held to extend to and include property embraced in a general power. And, if this is the true view of the section, I see no reason why the statutory extension of such a disposition should be limited to wills made in accordance with the law of England and should not apply to any will recognised by the law of England as such. For these reasons I think that the decisions in D'Huart v. Harkness (2) and Re Price (1) are of more general application than would appear to be indicated by Kirwan's Trusts (3) or Re D'Este's Settlement Trusts (5); but in any case these last two cases cannot now be taken as throwing doubt on the general rule, and must at most be regarded merely as establishing two classes of exception to it; and it is sufficient for the present purpose to say that, even if those two classes of exception exist, the present case does not fall within either of them.

The property will therefore go amongst the unmarried children after making provision for the £100 legacy to the unmarried son.

Contract—Supply of gas to local authority—Frustration—Illegality—Performance of part of contract becoming illegal—Performance of other parts legal and duly performed—Benefit to authority.

D

By a contract in writing dated June 2, 1911, the plaintiffs, a gas company, agreed to provide during a minimum period of five years column lanterns, burners, and other plant, to connect the lamps to their mains, to supply gas for public lighting in the defendant's district, and to maintain the plant and keep it in repair, the defendants paying to the plaintiffs quarterly a certain sum per lamp per annum. By an order dated Jan. 23, 1915, and issued by a competent military authority under the Defence of the Realm (Consolidated) Regulations, 1914, during the war of 1914–18, the lighting of lamps within the defendants' district was prohibited. The defendants thereupon contended that the agreement was at an end, and that they were absolved from making any further payments. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover the amount payable under the contract for the three quarters ending Sept. 30, 1915,

Held: while part of the performance of the contract had become illegal, other substantial parts of it, e.g., the maintenance of the lamps and other plant, were lawful and the plaintiffs were bound to perform them and had performed them; for 3½ years the defendants had had the benefit of the entire services contracted for, including expenditure by the plaintiffs in providing the plant; and it could not be said that the contract was frustrated by the prohibition against street lighting, and the defendants were justified in treating it at an end and refusing to make the payments provided by it.

B Appeal by defendants from an order made by Low, J., in an action tried by him without a jury.

The facts appear in the judgment of LORD READING, C.J.

J. A. Hawke, K.C., and A. H. Poyser for the defendants.

J. B. Matthews, K.C., and Rayner Goddard for the plaintiffs.

C Cur. adv. vult.

June 9, 1916. The following judgments were read :

LORD READING, C.J.—The plaintiffs sued the defendants for three quarterly payments, due Mar. 31, June 30, and Sept. 30, 1915, respectively, under a contract in writing made between the plaintiffs and the defendants and dated June 2, 1911.

D The defendants denied liability on the ground that the contract had become impossible of performance, or, alternatively, that the plaintiffs had not performed the service to be rendered in consideration of the quarterly payments. The action came for trial before Low, J., who gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed. The defendants appeal and ask that judgment should be entered for them.

E The plaintiffs are a gas company and the defendants are the local authority for the district of Leiston. By a memorandum of agreement between the parties it was agreed : (i) That the contract should be for five years, dated from Aug. 1, 1911, and to remain in force until determined by either party giving six calendar months' notice expiring on July 31, 1916, or July 31 in any subsequent year; (ii) that the plaintiffs should provide 105 column lanterns and burners, and connect them to their mains by Aug. 1, 1911, the plant to remain the property of the plaintiffs; (iii) that during the continuance of the agreement the plaintiffs should supply gas and light, extinguish, clean, repair, paint, and maintain the lamps; (iv) that the defendants should pay to the plaintiffs £1 7s. 6d. per lamp per annum for each of the 101 lamps extinguished at 11.15 p.m., and £3 7s. 6d. for each of the four lamps burning all night, the payments to be made in equal quarterly instalments. By

F an order made under the Defence of the Realm Regulations [during the 1914–18 war] by the competent military authority for the purpose of darkening the street at night owing to the exigencies of war none of the lamps except twenty-six was lighted during the first twenty-six nights of the first quarter of 1915. Thereafter during the remainder of the quarter, and the two succeeding quarters, the military

G authority decided that the streets must be in complete darkness, and issued an order forbidding the lighting of any lamps, and none was lighted.

H The defendants contend that the contract must be regarded as one made for the public lighting of the district, and that, as the military authority prohibited the lighting of the lamps for this purpose, the contract became impossible of performance (i) because its performance would be unlawful, and (ii) because the object of the venture was frustrated, or, to adopt the language sometimes used, the foundation of the contract had gone. There is no doubt that when a party contracts to perform an act, lawful at the time of the making of the contract, which thereafter becomes impossible of performance by reason of a change in the law, he is discharged from the obligation under the contract : Baily v. De Crespigny (1). Again, the law is well settled that where the performance of the contract becomes impossible by the cessation of the existence of the thing which is the subject-matter of the contract, the contract is to be construed as

"subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor":

per BLACKBURN, J., in Taylor v. Caldwell (2), 3 B. & S. at p. 833. This principle is not confined to the cessation of the existence of the subject-matter of the contract, but applies equally "to the cases where the event which renders the contract incapable of performance is the cessation or non-existence of an express condition or state of things going to the root of the contract": Nickoll and Knight v. Ashton, Edridge & Co. (3); Krell v. Henry (4). Another well-known illustration of this principle of the common law is that of a charterer of a vessel who was excused from the obligation of loading her on the ground that the delay in the arrival of the vessel had made the stipulated voyage commercially impossible, and, consequently, had frustrated the object of the venture: Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (5). The law upon this subject was considered recently in the House of Lords in Horlock v. Beal (6), and was summarised by LORD WREXBURY, who said (ante p. 102):

"Where a contract has been entered into, and by a supervening cause beyond the control of either party its performance has become impossible, I take the law to be as follows. If a party has expressly contracted to do a lawful act come what will—if, in other words, he has taken upon himself the risk of such a supervening cause—he is liable if it occurs, because by the very hypothesis he has contracted to be liable. But if he has not expressly so contracted, and from the nature of the contract it appears that the parties from the first must have known that its fulfilment would become impossible if such a supervening cause occurred, then upon such a cause occurring both parties are excused from performance. In that case a condition is implied that if performance becomes impossible the contract shall not remain binding."

It is often difficult, when applying the principle above stated, to determine on which side of the line the particular case falls. The decision in this case must depend on the true effect of the contract.

Under the memorandum of agreement the plaintiffs undertook to perform various services for the defendants in return for an agreed rate of payment to be made quarterly by the defendants for every quarter in the five years' duration of the contract. These services included the provision and erection and maintenance of the column lamps and other plant for the supply of gas as stipulated, and the defendants agreed to make these payments extending over five years as the remuneration to the plaintiffs, not only for supplying and lighting the gas for the lamps, but also for providing and erecting and maintaining the plant. In fact the plaintiffs had performed the various services under the contract for nearly 3½ years before the event under discussion happened. The column lamps remain their property under the contract, and the defendants have had the advantage of them throughout the 3½ years. They have used them even in the three quarters of 1915, not indeed to the full extent, as the lamps were not lighted except for the twenty-six days of the first quarter, but to the extent that they were connected with the main and would be lighted whenever the prohibition by the military authority was relaxed or withdrawn. Upon these facts I cannot hold that the performance of the contract had become unlawful, or that the venture was frustrated by the act of the executive in forbidding the lighting of the lamps. Part of the performance of the contract had become unlawful, but another part of the contract, which cannot be regarded as a trivial part, was lawful and could be performed. In these circumstances the defendants are not justified in treating the contract as at an end, or in refusing to make the payments as agreed by them.

The defendants further contend that the supply of gas and the lighting of the lamps is a condition precedent to the plaintiffs' right to recover the quarterly payments. The answer to this contention depends upon the intention of the

A parties to be collected from the instrument and the circumstances legally admissible in evidence, with reference to which it is to be construed: per PARKE, B., in Graves v. Legg (7), 9 Exch. at p. 716, quoted by BLACKBURN, J., in Bellini v. Gye (8), 1 Q.B.D. at p. 186. The observations I have already made upon the facts of the present case demonstrate that, in my judgment, this alternative contention of the defendants must fail. It was not intended that the supply of gas should be a condition precedent to the right to recover the quarterly payments. Under the contract there is an inclusive payment for all the services, and the consideration cannot be apportioned. The parties might have agreed the payment for each service, but they have preferred to agree to quarterly payments for the whole service extending over five years. PARKE, B., in Graves v. Legg (7) (9 Exch. at p. 716) states the well-acknowledged rule of law that

C "where a covenant of agreement goes to part of the consideration on both sides, and may be compensated in damages, it is an independent covenant or contract."

I hold that the agreement by the plaintiffs to supply the gas is to be regarded as an independent agreement, and not as a condition precedent. The defendants have received part of the consideration, and, if the plaintiffs had been in default, the defendants could have recovered compensation for the failure to supply the gas and light the lamps: Pordage v. Cole (9) (1 Wms. Saund. at p. 320 c.). The plaintiffs were not in default, and, therefore, the defendants cannot recover on a cross-claim for damages, but as the supply of gas by the plaintiffs was not a condition precedent to the right to recover, the defendants cannot justify their refusal to make the quarterly payments under the contract. Accordingly, I come to the conclusion that this appeal should be dismissed.

WARRINGTON, L.J. The plaintiffs are a gas company. They sue the defendants, an urban district council, for three quarterly payments due under a contract made in 1911 for the lighting of the council's district. The defendants contend that owing to the action of the military authority in forbidding the lighting of street lamps in their district they are discharged from their liability to pay. The learned judge has rejected the defence. The defendants appeal. The defendants' principal contention, and, as I think, the only one capable of being put forward with any prospect of success, is that, the lighting of their district having been rendered illegal, the foundation of the contract is gone and the object with which it is made is entirely frustrated, with the legal consequence that the contract is avoided and each party discharged from his obligations thereunder. If the defendants could establish in fact the destruction of the foundation of the contract or the entire frustration of its object, the legal consequence would, in my judgment, follow. The real question, I think, is: Are the necessary facts established in this case?

H [His LORDSHIP stated the facts and continued:] There are certain points to be noted about the contract. The plaintiffs undertook the whole of the matters incident to public lighting—that is to say, the provision and maintenance of the lamps, their connection with the main involving the supply of gas, and the maintenance and cleansing of the appliances, including the due supply of burners and so forth. For this they are to be paid an annual sum by equal quarterly payments. I The sum is measured by the number of lamps and is uniform for them all, with the exception of four which burn all night. It is an annual sum payable by equal quarterly payments—that is to say, not by payments varying according to the quantity of gas likely to be consumed in each particular quarter. It covers, and is the remuneration for, the entire service to be performed by them, and no particular part is attributed to any particular item of that service. It follows, I think, that failure to supply in a particular quarter any one of those items would not be a condition precedent to the recovery of the quarterly payment. But if such failure amounted to a breach of contract, the remedy must be in damages. The contract cannot be divided into a number of quarterly contracts. If the contract then remains subsisting, the defendants cannot, in my opinion, rest their defence on the failure of the plaintiffs during the periods in question to light the district in the manner contemplated by the contract.

But the contention is that the contract has been avoided altogether and both parties are discharged from their obligations as the result of what the defendants say is the destruction of the foundation of the contract, or, to put the same idea into other words, the entire frustration of its object. Whether this event has taken place is a question of fact, and must, I think, be answered in the negative. The effect of the action of the executive is to render unlawful so long as its orders remain in force, which may be for the continuance of the war or a shorter period, the lighting of the street lamps. This renders impossible of performance only one of the services provided for by the contract—namely, the actual lighting and extinguishment of the lamps. It is still lawful for the plaintiffs to perform, and they remain bound to perform, all their other obligations, including the maintenance of the connection of the lanterns with the mains, whereby the supply of gas could be at once resumed so soon as the prohibition is wholly or in part removed. Looking at it from another point of view, it may be said that the plaintiffs are able and willing to keep up the supply of gas, and in fact do so, but by the action of the authorities the defendants are prevented from making use of it when supplied. Moreover, for $3\frac{1}{2}$ years the defendants have had the benefit of the entire services contracted for, including the expenditure of money in providing plant. The parties have not thought fit to provide a separate charge for the supply of gas, but have chosen to adopt an inclusive payment. Under these circumstances I find it impossible to come to the conclusion that the foundation of the contract has been destroyed or its object frustrated. No doubt, the public lighting is for the time in abeyance, but this is not, in my opinion, enough to avoid altogether such a contract as the present with the result of relieving the defendants from making a payment a large part of which, at all events, must have been earned. I think the inability to enjoy all they pay for is a loss which must fall on the defendants. In my opinion the judgment of Low, J., was correct and ought to be affirmed.

SCRUTTON, J.—It is necessary first to appreciate exactly what the agreement sued under provides. It is a contract to last for five years from Aug. 1, 1911, and thereafter till determined by six months' notice terminating on July 31 of any year after and including 1916. The gas company are to provide 105 standards and burners with automatic lighters, which remain their property, and to connect them with their mains, and to supply gas and incandescent mantles and chimneys for and light, extinguish, clean, repair, paint, and maintain the said lamps. The lamps are to be lit every night between certain hours varying with sunset and sunrise, except on bright moonlight nights. The council is not to pay in proportion to gas supplied, but pays an annual rate for each of the lamps contracted for, reduced on a scale if the gas company reduce their charge for gas. The annual sum is payable quarterly. The quarterly payment, therefore, does not immediately depend on gas supplied; it is the same in the winter and summer quarters, and the same whether the quarter contains many or few bright moonlight nights. It includes an unapportioned sum for supply and maintenance of plant. The gas company are liable for damages or penalty (both words are used) for each lamp they fail to light on any night when it ought to be lit, unless the failure is due to circumstances beyond their control; and the parties provide that if there is delay in starting the lamps on Aug. 1, 1911, the penalty shall not apply, but the quarterly payment shall be reduced pro rata. They make no express provision for any reduction from the quarterly payment in case of failure to light from causes beyond the gas company's control, nor do they say whether the company are to suffer a

A reduction of payment as well as damages in the case of failure to light from causes within their control.

At first sight it is very tempting to say, "This is a contract to provide illumination, and the person who does not provide illumination cannot ask to be paid for it." But when the consequences come to be more closely looked into it is not so easy to follow them. The gas company supplies lighted gas for half the first quarter, and is then prevented by causes beyond its control from supplying lights till the middle of the second quarter, when the impediment is removed and the supply of light recommences. What is the consequence? Can the council refuse payment for the first quarter and for the second quarter, because a full quarter's gas is not supplied in either case; does the contract remain in existence, the company being bound to go on as soon as the impediment is removed? Or is there to be apportionment of the quarters' payments according to the time during which lighted gas is supplied, the time of darkness being written out of the contract? Does the contract come to an end when the supply of lighted gas has ceased for so long a time as to go to the root of the contract, to quote the language of BLACKBURN, J., in Bettini v. Gye (8), citing with approval PARKE, B., in Graves v. Legg (7), or to defeat the commercial purpose of the adventure, in the language of BRAMWELL, B., in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., Ltd. (5)? The attempt to answer these questions suggests that the court may really be asked to make an agreement for the parties in a matter which they have not thought of or expressly dealt with. Since the time of Paradine v. Jane (10), see also per WILLES, J., in Lord Clifford v. Watts (11), L.R. 5 C.P. at p. 586, when the question was discussed whether a loyal Englishman need pay rent to his landlord when the house he rented had been destroyed by the King's enemies, the "wild Scots," the distinction has been taken between duties or charges imposed by the law, where the party cannot perform it by events occurring without any default in him, in which case he is excused by the impossibility, and duties created by the agreement of the party, when he is "bound to make it good, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract." Since then the courts have steadily refused to make contracts for parties which they might have, and have not, made for themselves, unless the term is so obvious and necessary that it must be implied as a matter of business in such a contract: The Moorcock (12), 14 P.D. at p. 68.

It is said that the supply of lighted gas has become illegal. This is true for an uncertain time; at any moment the illegality may be removed by peace, or changed conditions of war. But the payment of the quarterly sum has not become illegal, and part of it is not for light supplied, but for plant which has been supplied and of which the council has had the benefit. To excuse themselves from breaking the contract to pay, not being an illegal contract, the council must, I think, satisfy the court of one of two things. Either they must establish that the performance of the contract to supply lighted gas is a condition precedent of the necessity to observe the contract to make a quarterly payment, so that the two contracts are "dependent" and not "independent," to use the language of Pordage v. Cole (9) and of LORD MANSFIELD in Kingston v. Preston (13), cited in 2 Doug. K.B. at p. 689, in which case the company, not having supplied lighted gas for the whole of three quarters respectively, cannot sue for payment; or the council must satisfy the court that, though a mere failure to supply lighted gas for a short time will not relieve them from payment, there is in this case such an extensive and permanent failure to supply as "goes to the root of the matter, so that the performance of the rest of the contract by the plaintiffs is rendered a different thing in substance from what the defendant has stipulated for": per BLACKBURN, J., in Bettini v. Gye (8), 1 Q.B.D. at p. 188.

First, can it be said that any failure to supply lighted gas, beyond those trifling failures to which the maxim de minimis might apply, prevents the company from recovering payment in respect of the quarter in which the failure occurs?

Counsel for the defendants, I think, argued that it was so; and, though I think they argued that a subsequent acceptance by the council of lighted gas after the failure might waive the breach, they, as I understood them, contended that a fortnight's or a month's failure not waived in this way annulled the whole contract. I cannot take the view that such a failure by itself annuls the contract, or that the contract might be treated as twenty quarterly separate contracts, one of which might be cancelled or blotted out, while the rest remained. The payment is a flat-rate payment, not a payment by meter for gas supplied, and it includes something for plant supplied and still available. For certain kinds of failure to supply light the parties have provided a remedy in damages, and in other cases a deduction from the quarterly payment. They have not expressly provided for the case of a failure to supply light owing to causes beyond the company's control, and I do not think the court ought to make such a contract for them when the consideration for the payment claimed has not wholly failed.

There remains the question whether, though a mere failure to supply will not by itself be sufficient to relieve from payment, a failure of such a lengthy and permanent character as substantially to alter the mode of performance of the contract will have this effect and terminate the contract. I think this must be so even if the contract is one for a fixed time. I put to the counsel concerned the case of an Act of Parliament being passed, after the agreement had been in operation for a quarter, prohibiting lighting the gas for four years, and asked whether the agreement would remain alive or would be in force for the last nine months only when the operation of the Act had ceased. I think the agreement would be annulled, for the reason that a supply of gas for a year in two broken periods would be a totally different thing from the five years' supply which the council bargained for, and that the obligation to supply gas for three months, and again four years later for nine months, for four quarterly payments would be a totally different contract from that which the company entered into. If this principle is granted the question is then one of fact. Is the period from the first total failure to supply on Jan. 26, 1915, to the issue of the writ on Nov. 10—that is, 9½ months—sufficient to annul a contract which is to last for at least five years, perhaps more, and of which the council has already had the benefit for 3½ years? These questions of degree are always difficult, but, treating it as a question of fact, I should hold that there had not at the issue of the writ been sufficient change of character in performance to destroy the contract. For these reasons I arrive at the same result as Low, J., and think that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

B Limitation of Action—Annuity charged upon proceeds of sale of land and personalty—Limitation of period for recovery of arrears—Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 42.

C Where a testator charges an annuity on the proceeds of sale of his real and personal estate, with power to postpone the sale of the real estate, it is charged upon land within the meaning of s. 42 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, and six years' arrears only are recoverable by virtue of that section, the remedy being barred not only against the real estate, but against the personal estate to the same extent, and that is so though the annuity is charged not only upon land, but upon the continuing rents of land.

Henry v. Smith (1) (1842), 2 Dr. & War. 381, applied.

D Notes. This case was overruled by the Court of Appeal in Re Jordison, Raine v. Jordison, [1922] 1 Ch. 440, in so far as NEVILLE, J., held that the fact that there was an express trust made no difference, having regard to s. 10 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874. The case, however, remains authority for the proposition stated in the headnote. The Real Property Limitation Acts, 1833 and 1874, have been repealed by the Limitation Act, 1939. By s. 17 of the 1939 Act a claim for arrears of rent is barred after six years, and by s. 31 (1) of that Act E "rent" is defined as including an annuity charged upon land.

Adjourned Summons.

By his will, dated Aug. 1, 1863, Thomas Turner, the testator, gave, devised, and bequeathed his real and residuary personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion and upon trust to invest the proceeds of such sale and conversion as therein declared, with a power to postpone the sale of the real estate, and out of the dividends and annual produce of the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities to pay the clear annual sum of £700 to his wife Eleanor Turner during her life for her separate use and without power of anticipation. Subject to the annuity of £700 the testator directed the trustees to stand possessed of the said trust moneys, stocks, funds and securities and the dividends, interest and annual produce thereof in trust for all his children living at his death who should attain the age of twenty-one years. E

The testator died on Sept. 9, 1863. The estate was never sufficient to pay the annuity of £700 to the testator's wife in full, but the trustees of the will paid to her all the income arising from the residuary estate which amounted to £400 a year. Eleanor Turner died on April 22, 1916. F

This summons was taken out by the plaintiffs, the present trustees of the testator's will, to determine whether the annuity of £700 bequeathed to Eleanor Turner was chargeable on the corpus of the testator's estate or was a charge continuing after her death on the income of such estate, or was payable only out of the income of such estate accruing during her life. On Nov. 23, 1916, the case was argued, and his Lordship gave a judgment that the words used in the will of the testator pointed to a charge on corpus more directly than any of the cases cited in the argument, and therefore the arrears of the annuity were payable out of the corpus of the estate. The case was then adjourned for the trustees of the testator's will to make a search among the papers relating to the estate for any acknowledgments in writing by the trustees of the will of indebtedness to Eleanor Turner, or other conclusive evidence of an admission in that behalf. No such acknowledgments or evidence were discovered, and on Jan. 15, 1917, the summons was again before the court for argument as to whether the amount of arrears of the annuity recoverable by the executors of the will of Eleanor Turner were limited, and, if so, how far limited, by the Statutes of Limitation. H

By s. 42 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 :

"No arrears of rent or of interest in respect of any sum of money charged upon or payable out of any land or rent, or in respect of any legacy, or any damages I

A in respect of such arrears of rent or interest, shall be recovered by any distress, action, or suit but within six years next after the same respectively shall have become due, or next after an acknowledgment of the same in writing shall have been given to the person entitled thereto, or his agent, signed by the person by whom the same was payable, or his agent . . .”

B By s. 1 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, the word “rent” extends to annuities.

Jan. 31, 1917. NEVILLE, J., read the following judgment: The first question which arises here is whether the annuity given by the testator to his widow is charged upon land within the meaning of s. 42 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833. It is charged upon the proceeds of sale of the real and personal estate, and there is a power to postpone the sale of the real estate. It was conceded in argument D that I am bound by authority to hold that it is charged upon land within the meaning of the section. The widow is now dead, and the question arises whether the arrears recoverable from the estate of the testator are limited to six years by virtue of the section. The point has, I think, been decided in that sense in Ireland in Dower v. Dower (2) and Re Nugent’s Trusts (3). In my opinion, however, notwithstanding E what was said in Re Hartland, Banks v. Hartland (4), English judges are not entitled to follow decisions in the Irish courts, although, no doubt, the reasoning upon which such decisions rest may be of great assistance. I am glad in the present case to have arrived at a similar conclusion to that expressed in the cases just referred F to. In Sutton v. Sutton (5) it was held with regard to a mortgage that s. 8 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, re-enacting s. 40 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, limits the personal remedy on the covenant in a mortgage deed, as well as the remedy against the land to recovery of twelve years’ arrears. Mr. Macnaghten in that case argued that the section only applied to the recover of the money by enforcing the charge on the land, and I confess that to my mind there was much to be said for that argument; but the Court of Appeal held otherwise, and Bowen, L.J., says, referring to the words of the section (22 Ch. at p. 520):

G “Does not that mean that no action shall be brought to recover any sum of money, which is secured by way of mortgage?”

The words of s. 42 of the Act of 1833 are so like the words of s. 8 of the Act of 1874, which re-enacts s. 40 of the former Act, that I think that no distinction can fairly be drawn between them. I think what Bowen, L.J., says with regard to s. 8 of the H Act of 1874 applies with equal force to the wording of s. 42 of the Act of 1833. In Henry v. Smith (1) it was held that under s. 42 the remedy was barred in six years, not only against the real estate, but against the personal estate to the same extent. That was the case of a judgment debt, and the Lord Chancellor there says (2 Dr. & War. at p. 387):

I “Then it is said that if it is held that judgments are within the forty-second section, the creditors will have a more extensive right against the personal than against the real estate of their debtors, but I am clearly of opinion the rights are in this respect equal, and, so far as the bar operates for the protection of real estate, the personal estate is equally protected.”

This case, I think, decides the present question except with regard to one point. His Lordship then considered whether the fact that there was an express trust made any difference. This part of the judgment was overruled by the Court of Appeal in Re Jordison, Raine v. Jordison, [1922] 1 Ch. 440.]

It is said that here the annuity is not only charged upon land, but on the continuing rents of land, and therefore that it is not within s. 42. If there be any difference between the two cases, as to which, see the remarks of PARKER, J., in Re Young, Brown v. Hodgson (5), the decisions above referred to show, I think, that, if once you find that the annuity is charged upon land, all remedies, whether against the real or personal estate, are subject to the same limitation. In my opinion there was no acknowledgment within s. 42 of the Act of 1833. I think the trustees acted upon the supposition that the annuity was payable only out of income of the testator's estate, for the whole of which they accounted to the widow, and that they could not therefore have intended to acknowledge any greater liability. Whether this was so or not, I am of opinion that no acknowledgment was given within six years from these proceedings. I do not think it was competent for the trustees, had they so intended, to alter the rights of the parties after the issue of the summons by an acknowledgment. I hold, therefore, that arrears for six years only prior to the death of the widow are recoverable from testator's estate. I should perhaps say I am unable to follow the decision in Hughes v. Coles (7) as reported. Why six years' arrears were not recoverable there I do not understand. I have not here, however, to consider whether s. 8 of the Act of 1874 affects the payment of an annuity which has not been recovered for twelve years.

Trespass—Growing crop—Right of purchaser to maintain action—Exclusive possession—Purchaser bound to consume part of crop on the land.

The purchaser of a growing crop has such exclusive right of possession as to enable him to maintain an action for trespass, notwithstanding that he is bound to consume part of the crop on the land.

The plaintiff purchased a crop of swedes, half of which he was by agreement bound to consume on the field. The defendant purchased a crop of grass in an adjoining field in which he put sheep to graze. The plaintiff or his servants negligently left a gate open between the fields and the sheep got into the field where the swedes were growing and ate a quantity of them. The following day the sheep broke through the fence between the fields and did more damage. In an action for damages for trespass,

Held: (i) the plaintiff had such exclusive possession as to enable him to maintain an action for trespass; and (ii) the fact that the entry of the sheep into the field was occasioned by the plaintiff's negligence on the first day did not prevent him from recovering for the damage done the following day.

Appeal from Exeter County Court.

D On Mar. 27, 1917, the plaintiff purchased at an auction a crop of growing swedes in a field, and the defendant at the same time bought a crop of grass in an adjoining field from the same vendor. The plaintiff was under agreement to remove only half the swedes from the land, the other half to be consumed on the ground. The defendant put a flock of sheep to graze in his field and on April 5, 1917, the plaintiff having left the gate open between the two fields, some of the sheep entered and ate a quantity of swedes. On two successive days the sheep broke through the hedge between the two fields and entered in large numbers and did considerable damage. There was evidence that sheep having once tasted swedes E were likely to try and do so again. In an action for damages for trespass, the county court judge gave judgment for the defendant, holding that trespass does not lie unless there has been some breach of duty by the defendant, and the defendant was guilty of no such breach. The plaintiff appealed.

F Hawke, K.C. (Jowitt with him) for the plaintiff.

Foote, K.C. (Dummett with him) for the defendant.

A. T. LAWRENCE, J., stated the facts and continued: It has been argued that the defendant was not liable in trespass inasmuch as the plaintiff was not in exclusive possession of the crop. This contention was based upon the fact that, when he purchased the crop, it was made a condition that he should only remove half the roots, leaving the rest on the land. It is admitted that trespass would have G lain had the plaintiff had the exclusive right, but I think his right to possession was none the less exclusive because as to part of the crop it had to be dealt with in a particular way. Counsel for the defendant has made an ingenious point, but I do not think there is the difference between "trespass" and "case" for which he has contended. If one reverses the position, and considers the defendant's right H in relation to his pasture field, he could clearly have maintained trespass whether he had merely a right of agistment or a right to take the hay.

One other point arises. It is said that, as to the damage done on the first day, which arose through the gate being left open, the defendant cannot be held liable. I think that is so. It was the plaintiff or his men who left the gate open, and the sheep came in, so to speak, per invitum. But I do not agree with the learned I county court judge, who has found, in effect, that the fact of the sheep having entered per invitum on one day altered or lessened the defendant's duty to keep them within bounds thereafter. His duty remained, unless the act done by the plaintiff was one which would have made a repetition of the trespass inevitable. I think the county court judge came to a wrong conclusion, and that the case must go back to him to assess the damage sustained by the plaintiff, excluding that which was caused on the first day. The plaintiff will have the costs of this appeal.

ATKIN, J. In this case the plaintiff had a clear cause of action if he had such an exclusive right of possession that trespass would lie. It appears to me that, by reason of the rights he had acquired, he had such an exclusive right to possession as would entitle him to bring trespass. The law is thus stated in COKE upon LITTLETON, 4:

"If a man hath twenty acres of land, and by deed granteth to another and his heirs vesturum terre and maketh livery of seisin secundum formam chartæ, the land itselfe shall not passe, because he hath a particular right in the land; for thereby he shall not have the houses, timber-trees, mines, and other reall things parcell of the inheritance, but he shall have the vesture of the land, (that is) the corne, grasse, underwood, swepage, and the like, and he shall have an action of trespassse quare clausum fregit."

It seems to me impossible to distinguish the exclusive right to a crop of swedes from the exclusive right to a crop of corn, and the plaintiff's exclusive right is not affected by the fact that there is a limited right of disposing of the crop when gathered. If he has the right to bring an action for trespass he may recover damages by reason of the adjoining owner's sheep trespassing, wholly apart from the duty to fence. That being so, he was entitled to recover for the damage done on the Friday and Saturday. In my opinion, the damage on those two days was not occasioned by the plaintiff's negligence in leaving the gate open on the first day. The cause was too remote. This appeal must be allowed with costs.

Appeal allowed.

By an indenture dated May 29, 1860, and made between W. Stanley of the first part, M. Morgans, A. L. Morgans his wife, and W. Rees and M. J. Rees his wife of the second part, and R. Stanley and J. Stanley, trustees, of the third part, W. Stanley, in consideration of the natural love and affection which he had to his daughters A. L. Morgans and M. J. Rees and of 10s. paid to him by the trustees, assigned to the trustees, their executors, administrators, and assigns six leasehold houses for the residue of a term of 999 years upon trust to "receive and take the rents, issues, and profits thereof" "and, after deducting the ground rent, interest, and other outgoings, to pay the balance half-yearly" in June and December in each year "into the proper hands for the sole use and benefit of the said A. L. Morgans and M. J. Rees for and during the terms of their natural lives as tenants in common and not as joint tenants separately and apart from their respective husbands the said M. Morgans and W. Rees," and so that the same or any part thereof might not be within their control or subject to their debts, contracts, or engagements. And it was thereby declared that the receipts of A. L. Morgans and M. J. Rees "for all or any of the rents, profits, and benefits of the said moneys, hereditaments, and premises or any part thereof" should, notwithstanding their coverture, "be a good and sufficient discharge" for the money which should be then due and payable and expressed to be received. "And upon further trust that from and immediately after the decease of the survivor of them, the said A. L. Morgans and M. J. Rees, whether in the lifetime of their husbands or not, then to the use of their [sic] respective child or children of the said A. L. Morgans and M. J. Rees, share and share alike, as tenants in common and not as joint tenants." A. L. Morgans died on Aug. 17, 1867, leaving three children alive, namely, Anne Maddock, William H. S. Morgans, and Agnes Taylor, and another son, who had died in 1899 leaving two children. M. J. Rees died on Feb. 14, 1914, without having had any children.

I This originating summons was taken out against the legal personal representative of the last surviving trustee of the settlement, some of the next of kin of the settlor, and one of the next of kin of M. J. Rees raising the following questions: (i) whether M. J. Rees as the survivor of two tenants for life was entitled during the remainder of her life to the whole of the net income of the settled property or to some and what part thereof, and, if not entitled to the whole net income, to whom and in what proportions what she was not entitled to belonged; and (ii) whether the whole of the settled property belonged to the plaintiffs, who were the children and representatives of deceased children, or whether a moiety or some other and what proportion thereof reverted to the settlor and passed on his death to his next of kin. A

A. L. Morris for the plaintiffs.

Alfred Adams for the legal personal representative of the deceased child.

Dighton Pollock for one of the next of kin of the settlor.

R. H. Roope Reeve for one of the next of kin of M. J. Rees. B

SARGANT, J., after stating the questions raised by the summons, continued: The settlement which I am asked to construe is a badly drawn document. The settlor thereby assigned certain leasehold property to trustees upon trust, after paying the outgoings, to pay the balance of the income thereof to his two daughters, Mrs. Morgans and Mrs. Rees, for their natural lives "as tenants in common and not as joint tenants." Then the settlement says: C

"And upon further trust that from and immediately after the decease of the survivor of them the said Annie Lexley Morgans and Mary Jane Rees (whether in the lifetime of their husbands or not), then to the use of their [sic] respective child or children of the said Annie Lexley Morgans and Mary Jane Rees share and share alike, as tenants in common and not as joint tenants." D

As regards the first question raised by the summons, counsel for the plaintiffs has contended that on Mrs. Morgans' death there was no survivorship of her interest for life to Mrs. Rees, and on the second question he says that on Mrs. Rees' death the surviving children of Mrs. Morgans, who are the plaintiffs in the proceedings, and the legal personal representatives of her deceased child became entitled to the whole of the property. Counsel for the legal personal representative of the deceased child, in arguing in the same interest, has attempted to support the general proposition that in a deed there cannot be an estate by implication of law. In FEARNE ON CONTINGENT REMAINDERS (10th Edn.) vol. 1, p. 49, there is the statement that E

"No estate for life can arise by implication, or by way of resulting use, to a person who was not the owner of the estate granted" F and NORTON ON DEEDS, referring to this passage, says (at p. 377):

"No estate or trust can arise by implication of law, and no estate or trust by way of resulting use or trust can arise in favour of a person who was not the owner of the property conveyed by the deed." G

I doubt whether an estate arising by implication from the particular language of a deed would be an estate arising by implication of law at all; but, assuming that it would, there is no authority to the wide effect of the proposition advanced by counsel for the legal personal representative of the deceased child. Tunstall v. Trappes (1) is one authority against the proposition. There, under the trusts of a settlement, the interest of a fund was to be paid to Mrs. Tunstall "for her separate use during her coverture with William Tunstall," and in case she should die in his lifetime it was to be paid to him for life, and after the death of the survivor the principal was to be held in trust for the issue then living as Mrs. Tunstall should appoint, in trust for such equally; and it was held that Mrs. Tunstall was entitled to the interest, not only during the coverture, but for her life. Allin v. Crawshaw (2) is an authority which appears to me to be dead in the teeth of the general proposition advanced by counsel. He says that the point was never argued in that case. But TURNER, V.-C., there thought that the wife took a life estate by implication under a deed, but declined to decide the point in the absence of the settlor's personal representatives. When, however, they appeared and declined to argue the question, as no doubt their counsel thought it was too clear for argument, the Vice-Chancellor held that the wife took a life estate. In Mara v. Browne (3) the decision of NORTH, J., was against counsel's contention. I

A for there NORTH, J., was unaware of the existence of any such proposition as that now advanced. He says ([1895] 2 Ch. at p. 81):

B "The instrument in question is a deed, and it must be construed according to its tenor, and I cannot find anything within the four corners of the instrument from which I can gather that the settlement was intended to give her the income during that period" [namely, the remainder of the wife's lifetime after her husband's death].

After referring to Tunstall v. Trappes (1), NORTH, J., held that there was not enough in the deed to justify his finding a life estate by implication, but he obviously looked into the deed to see whether he could do so.

C Is there enough in the deed before me from which to imply a life interest to Mrs. Rees? Mrs. Morgans had four children, and died many years ago. Mrs. Rees never had any child, and died in 1914. In my opinion it is right to hold that Mrs. Rees took a life interest in her sister's share on that sister's death, not on the ground that there was a joint tenancy, because that is expressly excluded, but following the rule of construction laid down in Armstrong v. Eldridge (4), Pearce v. Edmeades (5), and Re Richerson (6), all authorities which are to be explained on the view that a life interest is to be implied in the survivor of the tenants in common rather than on the earlier view. It is better to say that they are tenants in common for life with a life interest in remainder to the survivor. The words "the same or any part thereof" may be held to point definitely to the times when two are receiving the income, and subsequently when one only is receiving it. It is sufficient to say that there is enough in the settlement to enable me to hold that each sister took a life estate in remainder in the other sister's share on that sister's death.

E As regards the second question, is the gift in remainder of the corpus to the child or children of one sister in that sister's share only, or is it a gift in remainder of the whole corpus to all the children of both sisters as one class? The fact that the corpus is given over at one time, namely, the death of the surviving sister, strongly favours the view that the gift is to the children as one class. There is nothing to point to the intention that one moiety is to go only to the children of the tenant for life of that moiety except the word "respective," and that is not enough of itself to have the required effect. The words "as tenants in common" point to a gift to the whole class of children of either sister on the death of the surviving sister. A large number of cases was reviewed by KAY, J., in Re Hutchinson's Trusts (7), but in that case there were absolute gifts to persons which were held to be cut down only in favour of their children if they had any. In the present case I hold that the children of the one who left children are entitled to the whole property, and that there is no resulting trust in favour of the settlor.

Cinematograph—Licence—Condition—Reasonableness—Discretion of justices—Opening hours—Character of films shown—Exclusion of schoolchildren if epidemic of infectious disease—Cinematograph Act, 1909 (9 Edw. 7, c. 30), s. 2.

In pursuance of their powers under the Cinematograph Act, 1909, justices granted a licence to L. for the purpose of using certain premises for a cinematograph exhibition. The licence was granted subject to certain conditions, namely, (i) that the premises should be open only between the hours of 6 p.m. and 10.30 p.m., (ii) that the films shown should not be of a licentious or indecent character, and (iii) that no film should be shown if it was objected to by three justices. In addition the licensee was asked to give two undertakings, namely, (i) that children should not be tempted to spend time in the cinematograph exhibition by gifts of sweets, souvenirs, etc., and (ii) that on the notification by a medical officer of health that any department of a public elementary school had been closed owing to the prevalence of an infectious disease, the licensee should exclude from the cinematograph exhibition all children attending school. A rule nisi for a mandamus directing the justices to hear and determine the application for a licence according to law, and a rule nisi for prohibition against their issuing a licence with these conditions and undertakings attached, having been obtained, Held: with the exception of the condition that no film should be shown if it was objected to by three justices, the conditions were reasonable and within the discretion of the justices to impose; the undertakings were also reasonable, but the second undertaking should be confined to the exclusion of children attending the particular school in which there had been an outbreak of disease.

Rules Nisi for mandamus and prohibition directed to Burnley justices.

On Mar. 22, 1916, at a meeting of the justices for the borough of Burnley, certain alterations of the conditions to be imposed upon, and the undertakings to be given by, all licensees of cinematograph exhibitions on the renewal of their licences, under the Cinematograph Act, 1909, were adopted, subject to any arguments that might be urged by or on behalf of such licensees at the petty sessions to be held on Mar. 29, 1916. The conditions so adopted were as follows :

C

(i) The hours of opening and closing will be respectively 6 p.m. and 10.30 p.m. (ii) Nothing shall be represented or shown that is objectionable, licentious, or indecent, or likely to produce riot, tumult, or breach of the peace, and no offensive representations of living persons shall be permitted in the licensed premises. (iii)

D

No film shall be exhibited if notice has been given to the licensee that any three justices sitting in petty sessions object to such film. If the said three justices sitting in such petty sessions request the licensee to exhibit to them any such film so objected to, he shall do so at such reasonable time and place as the said three justices shall in writing direct. The undertakings to be required were as follows :

(i) That no tickets shall be distributed to children under fourteen years of age either for free or reduced admission to the licensed premises, and that no refreshments, sweets, or souvenirs, or other things by way of inducement to children under sixteen years of age shall be given away. (ii) That upon notification in writing being received from the medical officer of health of the county borough of Burnley that any department of a public elementary school has been closed owing to the prevalence of infectious disease the licensee shall forthwith exclude or cause to be excluded from the licensed premises all children who are attending school. The justices instructed their clerk to send a copy of the conditions and undertakings, set out above, to all licensees of premises for the exhibition of cinematograph films, in order that they might have an opportunity of considering any objection to the same to be urged at the annual licensing meeting in petty sessions to be held on Mar. 29, 1916. The clerk accordingly sent such letter and gave notice to the various licensees in the following terms :

"The justices will deal with this renewal on Mar. 29, 1916. The enclosed conditions have been adopted and will form part of the regulations under which cinematograph licences will be granted."

H

On Mar. 29, 1916, a petty sessions was held at the borough police court for the purpose of renewing cinematograph licences. The clerk to the justices informed the applicants for licences in open court that there was a full opportunity accorded to them to be heard as to the conditions and regulations of which they had had notice, and that the whole matter of the conditions and regulations under which licences would be granted would be considered. Arguments were then addressed to the justices, both as to their jurisdiction and as to the effect that the conditions and undertaking were unreasonable and ultra vires. The justices decided that they would renew the licences upon the conditions set out above, and also upon the first of the undertakings, but they intimated that they would give further consideration to the second undertaking.

Rules nisi were obtained on behalf of Austin Harry Longford (i) directed to the justices to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to hear and determine an application by Austin Harry Longford for the renewal of a licence under the Cinematograph Act, 1909, in respect of the Pavilion Picture

Hall, Burnley; and (ii) for a prohibition against the justices issuing a licence with certain conditions and undertakings attached. Both rules were obtained on the following grounds: (i) that the justices had failed to hear and determine the application according to law; (ii) that the conditions imposed by the justices were unreasonable and ultra vires; (iii) that the undertakings proposed to be exacted were unreasonable and void; (iv) that the justices had no power to make the grant of the licence conditional upon the giving of undertakings as to matters upon which they could not insist as conditions; and (v) that the justices had no power to insist upon conditions or undertakings except when sitting in petty sessions.

By the Cinematograph Act, 1909:

"Section 2 (1). A county council may grant licences to such persons as they think fit to use the premises specified in the licence for the purposes aforesaid (i.e., the exhibition of pictures or other optical effects by means of a cinematograph or other similar apparatus, for the purposes of which inflammable films are used) on such terms and conditions and under such restrictions as, subject to regulations of the Secretary of State, the council may by the respective licences determine."

By s. 5 of the Cinematograph Act, 1909, the county council is empowered to delegate their powers to justices sitting in petty sessions; and by s. 6 the provisions of that Act are stated to apply to a borough council as if it were a county council.

Langdon, K.C., and Guy Lushington showed cause.

Hogg in support of the rules.

DARLING, J.—In this case a rule nisi was obtained for a mandamus to be directed to the justices of Burnley to hear and determine according to law an application by Mr. Longmore for the renewal of a cinematograph licence, and, at the same time that the rule nisi for the mandamus was obtained, there was also a rule nisi for prohibition granted directed to the same justices against their attaching to the licence certain conditions or exacting certain undertakings from the licensee. It is necessary, in order to arrive at a correct determination, to examine first of all the words of the Cinematograph Act, 1909. [His LORDSHIP read s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1909 and continued:] At one time it was considered that the conditions and restrictions referred to in the section were confined to those matters which affected the safety of the building in which cinematograph exhibitions were held, and the security of people attending the same. It was decided, however, in L.C.C. v. Bermondsey Bioscope Co., Ltd. (1) that this idea is incorrect, and since that case was decided it is quite impossible to submit a proposition of this kind to the court. The Secretary of State has, however, ample power to make regulations regarding the safety of premises and the management of exhibitions.

What is the position of the justices? Are they fettered in any way, except so far as the regulations of the Secretary of State are concerned? In my view they are not. It seems to me that the justices are absolutely free as to the grant or the refusal of a licence. It is clear that they are under no obligation to grant a licence to any person at all. The section which I quoted says that the licensing authority "may grant licences to such persons as they think fit" for the purpose of cinematograph exhibitions. This leaves the justices a very free hand in the matter of imposing conditions or asking for undertakings when an application is made for a licence. If they name certain conditions or undertakings, the applicant for the licence can accept or refuse them. If he accepts them, all well and good. But if he declines to be bound by them, the justices are fully entitled to say that they do not consider him to be a person fit to hold a licence, and the legislature has said that the justices are only to grant a licence to a person if they think that he is fit to hold one. In the present case the justices have said that they will grant licences for cinematograph exhibitions subject to certain conditions. The first

A of these conditions is that the hours of opening and closing shall be respectively 6 p.m. and 10.30 p.m. No objection is taken to this condition. The second is that "nothing shall be represented or shown that is objectionable, licentious, or indecent, or likely to produce riot, tumult, or breach of the peace, and no offensive representations of living persons shall be permitted in the licensed premises."

B Again, no objection is taken to this second condition up to this point, but then comes the proviso that

C I think that this proviso is not a reasonable one. It has been pointed out in the course of the argument that this would be certain to lead to a state of confusion, and I think that the argument is well founded. If the decision as to the fitness or unfitness of a film for exhibition was to be left in the hands of any three justices sitting on a particular day, there could be no certainty about the matter at all. Three justices might allow a film to be shown on one day, and on the following day three other justices might strongly object to the continuance of the exhibition.

D A condition of this kind is not, in my view, reasonable, when it leaves the decision of the whole matter in doubt. This court has had to consider the question of the objection of justices to a particular film before. The case to which I refer is that of Ex parte Stott (2). In that case the borough of St. Helens, through the justices, attached a condition to the grant of a licence for cinematograph exhibitions, that no film should be exhibited if notice was given to the licensee that the justices objected to it. If the condition imposed in the present case had been in the form adopted by the justices of St. Helens, it would have been reasonable and certain, and if we had been asked to-day to prohibit the imposition of a condition of the same character, we should have declined to do so, as the imposition of such a condition is most certainly within the powers of the justices. But this case is different. It leaves the discretion in the hands of three justices who happen to be sitting upon a particular day. As the matter stands, therefore, I think that the prohibition should go, but without costs. There will, then, be a prohibition against imposing a condition in the form of that which is in question in the present case; but if a condition is imposed by the justices in the form adopted by the justices of St. Helens, such a condition will be within their powers.

G As to the other part of the case, namely, the undertakings, I am of opinion that it is unnecessary to decide whether they would be good as conditions. It has been argued before us that they would be bad as conditions, and reliance has been placed upon the decision in Theatre de Luxe (Hafjar), Ltd. v. Gledhill (3). Speaking for myself, I prefer the judgment of ATKIN, J., to the judgments of the other two members of the court, and if I was at liberty to follow the judgment of ATKIN, J., I should most certainly do so. But when the judgments of the majority
H are closely examined, it is clear that they only apply to conditions and not to undertakings. The view which was taken by the justices in the present case was undoubtedly a reasonable one. The justices were first of all called upon to decide as to who was a fit person to hold a licence, and they have, in my view, a perfect right to determine in what way children who go to a theatre shall be treated. They are perfectly entitled to say that if the applicant for a licence desires to bribe
I children in order to induce them to visit his exhibition, they will refuse to grant him a licence. That disposes of the first of the undertakings demanded of the proposed licensee. As to the second, namely, that on the notification by a medical officer of health that any department of a public elementary school has been closed owing to the prevalence of an infectious disease the licensee should exclude all children attending school from the cinematograph exhibition, I think that that is a proper undertaking if the word "that" is inserted before the word "school." The justices were asked by the applicant for a licence which would give him the power of attracting a number of persons into one room, and it is quite reasonable for the justices to require that if an infectious disease is prevalent, and if the licensee has received notice that in consequence of the disease the school has been closed, he should take care to see that children who are attending this particular school should not be admitted to the cinematograph exhibition. There is no hardship in such an undertaking. If the licensee breaks it, the only result is that when he makes an application for a renewal of his licence the justices can say that if he gives undertakings and breaks them and spreads infectious diseases, they will not grant him a renewal of the licence.

The result is that, in our opinion, the conditions are good, except that part of the second which leaves the exhibition subject to the approval of any three justices sitting in petty sessions on a particular day. If the form used by the justices of St. Helens, as set out in Ex parte Stoll (2), is adopted, there can be no objection to such a condition. As to the undertakings, subject to the modification I have stated, there is nothing objectionable in them. The rule for a mandamus, therefore, cannot be made absolute, as the justices have not refused to hear and determine the application for a licence, but have granted it. The rule for a prohibition, however, will be made absolute with regard to that portion to which I have called attention, namely, the proviso which leaves it to the discretion of three justices sitting in petty sessions on any particular day whether a certain film shall or shall not be exhibited.

AVORY, J.—I am of the same opinion. There are technical difficulties in the way of a mandamus which are a sufficient reason for refusing to make the rule nisi for a mandamus absolute. As to the rule nisi for prohibition, I have had considerable hesitation as to whether there is sufficient ground for prohibition in view of the fact that the justices were willing to hear any arguments with regard to the modification of these conditions, and but for the letter of Mar. 23, 1916, written to the applicants for renewals by the clerk to the justices, that fact might have been an answer to the application for a prohibition. That letter, however, gives notice to all applicants for the renewal of cinematograph licences in these terms:

There is the formal announcement sent out by the justices to the effect that licences would only be granted subject to those conditions as a whole. If any of these conditions are ultra vires, the case is a proper one for prohibiting the imposition of those which are such. It has been contended before us that these new conditions are all ultra vires, because they have been resolved upon by the justices in the absence of the applicant. I do not think that there is anything at all in this contention. It was quite open to the justices to arrive at the conclusion that the public interest demanded the imposition of fresh conditions, and they were perfectly entitled to say to any person who desired to come before them as an applicant for a licence that they would give him an opportunity of arguing as to whether the conditions should be imposed in his particular case. I think that the justices are bound by the statute to consider each licence separately, and that they are not entitled to say that no licence shall be granted unless it conforms to all the conditions and regulations already made. This is quite in accord with s. 2 of the Cinematograph Act, which says that licences may be granted on such terms and conditions and under such restrictions as the licensing authority may by the respective licences determine. From the wording of the statute I think that it was the intention of the legislature that the licensing authority should exercise their discretion in the case of each licence. Now, what has happened in the present case? The justices gave an indication that it was their intention to enforce a

A condition as to the exhibition of any film which was objected to by any three justices. I am entirely in accord with the judgment that has just been delivered that such a condition is altogether uncertain in its operation, and for that reason I think that it is quite invalid. It is unreasonable because the licensee might be permitted to exhibit his film on one day and be prohibited to exhibit it on the next. A condition of this kind could not fail to be absurd. My Lord has referred to Ex parte Stott (2), and has stated the form of the condition imposed by the justices of St. Helens in the case of cinematograph exhibitions. I think that a condition in the form adopted by the St. Helens' justices would be quite good, and if the justices of Burnley were to alter their conditions so as to bring them into accord with those of St. Helens, i.e., at least, as far as this particular point is concerned, no objection could be raised to the same, and the objection as to uncertainty would be removed.

As to the undertakings, I think that both of them would be good as conditions. And if they are good as conditions, they are also good as undertakings. It does not seem to me that they in any way violate the principle laid down in the case of Theatre de Lure (Halifax), Ltd. v. Gledhill (3). That case has been criticised, and I must say that I think that it is only an authority which should be followed when the same facts are in question as they were there. We are bound by the decision there given if the same state of facts exists, but the present case is different. The decision in L.C.C. v. Bermondsey Bioscope Co., Ltd. (1) is of much wider authority than that of Theatre de Lure (Halifax), Ltd. v. Gledhill (3), and certainly gives a larger scope to the licensing authority, and I notice also that the Bermondsey Case (1) has received the approval of the Court of Appeal in R. v. L.C.C. (4). If, then, there can be said to be any discrepancy between the Bermondsey Case (1) and the Halifax Case (3), the former is to be preferred to the latter. Now, how does this affect the present case? I do not think that the undertakings infringe any principles laid down in the decided case. The provision that no tickets shall be distributed to children under fourteen years of age for free or reduced admission, and that refreshments, sweets, etc., shall not be given as an inducement to visit cinematograph exhibitions, seems to me to be a regulation which affects the use of the premises by the licensee; and if that is so, such an undertaking is quite in accord with the principles approved by the court in the Bermondsey Case (1). The same thing may be said as to the exclusion of children who are attending a school in which an infectious disease has broken out. I think that this is also an undertaking as to the use of the premises, and as it would, in my opinion, be good as a condition, I think it is also good as an undertaking. The result, then, will be as my Lord has stated. The rule for a mandamus will be discharged, and the rule for a prohibition will also be discharged, except as to that part of it which is concerned with the condition imposed by the justices as to any objection being raised to a film by any three justices sitting in petty sessions.

LOW, J.—I agree.

Rule for mandamus discharged. Rule for prohibition made absolute in part.

IN THE ESTATE OF STANLEY

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Bargrave Deane, J.), March 20, May 15, July 3, 1916]

Will—Soldier's will—"Actual military service"—Army nurse under orders to embark on hospital ship—Letter containing testamentary dispositions—Wills Act, 1837 (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict., c. 26), s. 11.

On Oct. 8, 1915, the deceased, an Army nurse, who was under orders to embark in a hospital ship, wrote a letter to her niece containing testamentary dispositions. On Oct. 10, 1915, the deceased left England for the Near East. She returned in December, 1915, and on the voyage home she was taken ill. She died in England on Dec. 23, 1915.

Held: the deceased was a "soldier being in actual military service" within the meaning of s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837, and the niece to whom the letter was addressed was entitled to probate of the letter as the executrix according to the tenor.

Probate Motion by Ada Louise Stanley to prove, as executrix according to its tenor, the will of Ada Stanley, an army nurse.

The deceased, who, before the war, was a member of the Territorial Force Nursing Service, was mobilised for duty in January, 1915, at the Third Northern General Hospital, Sheffield. On July 18, 1915, she volunteered for service abroad, and was seconded for service under the Queen Alexandra Imperial Military Nursing Service. On that date she entered into an agreement with His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for the War Department whereby she agreed to serve for twelve months or until her services were no longer required, whichever should first happen. From July, 1915, the deceased was employed on hospital ships proceeding to and from the Near East. She arrived at Devonport on His Majesty's hospital ship Northland on Oct. 1, 1915, and proceeded to London on short leave "pending further instructions." On Oct. 5, 1915, orders were despatched to the deceased by post from the War Office to embark on a hospital ship on Oct. 9, 1915. On Oct. 8, 1915, she wrote out in London the following letter, addressed to her niece, Ada Louise Stanley, who was the present applicant:

A "My dear Ada.—I give you full liberty to deal with my affairs. Give Miss Horrocks £10 and anything of mine she cares to have for a keepsake; £250 that is invested with Mr. Clark and my post-office money for yourself, minus the £10 for Miss H., and £5 each for Dorothy and Nellie and Kathleen, and Mr. Clark whatever you care to give him as a little remembrance from me, and Mrs. Clark something of my personal belongings, also Mrs. Whittaker, my housekeeper; £50 invested in mill for Mary Iredale. You will find the address, etc., in my box. My insurance money for my sister Emma Fairbairn, to be used just for her own personal comfort, not otherwise. Policy in my trunk, Kershaw-street. Divide as you think my belongings, but please make no fuss. With love, Yours, Ada.—P.S. I have no bills to pay."

C On Oct. 10, 1915, the deceased embarked on His Majesty's hospital ship Egypt and left England for the Near East. In December, 1915, she returned to England in His Majesty's hospital ship Mauretania, and on the voyage was taken ill. On arrival in England she was moved to the Royal Victoria Hospital, Netley, where she died on Dec. 23, 1915. Her estate consisted entirely of personalty of the value of £550. The applicant, Ada Louise Stanley, now moved, as executrix according to its tenor, for probate of the letter of Oct. 8, 1915, under s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837.

W. O. Willis for the applicant.

J. H. Murphy for the next of kin.

E BARGRAVE DEANE, J.—As the deceased at the time she wrote the letter of Oct. 8, 1915, was under orders to embark, I think that brings her within the section. The Wills Act, 1837, refers to "any soldier being in actual military service" and to "any mariner or seaman being at sea." I am not sure in which category the deceased should be regarded. I do not think that it very much matters. She was under contract with the War Department, and was employed by that department to serve at sea. I shall treat her as a "soldier being in actual military service." There will be a grant of probate to the applicant of the letter of Oct. 8, 1915, as the executrix according to its tenor. The costs of all parties will be paid out of the estate.

Order accordingly.

Insurance—Life assurance—Assignment of policy—Indorsement authorising purported assignee to draw insurance "in event of my predeceasing her."

W. handed over a policy of life assurance to his housekeeper A. M. B., telling her that it was for her to put by. W. subsequently indorsed the policy as follows: "I authorise A. M. B., my housekeeper, and no other person to draw this insurance in the event of my predeceasing her, this being my sole desire and intention at the time of taking this policy out,"

Held: the indorsement was merely an authority to draw the policy moneys which determined on the assignor's death; the assignment was ineffective to operate as a testamentary gift as it was not complete; and, therefore, no valid assignment of the policy had been effected.

Appeal from a decision of ASTBURY, J., reported [1917] 1 Ch. 1, on an originating summons for a declaration as to the validity of an assignment of a policy of insurance.

On Dec. 8, 1913, the assignor, Henry James Williams took out a policy for £1,000 on his life with an insurance company and handed the policy when effected over to the defendant Ada Maud Ball, telling her it was for her to put by. Subsequently the defendant, having read the terms of the policy, told the assignor that she would not be able to receive the policy moneys when they became payable, and thereupon he indorsed the policy as follows:

"I authorise Ada Maud Ball, my housekeeper, and no other person, to draw this insurance in the event of my predeceasing her, this being my sole desire and intention at the time of taking this policy out, and this is my signature."

He then signed his name over a penny stamp. No notice of this transaction was given to the insurance company. The assignor died on Feb. 16, 1916, and by his will dated Oct. 31, 1911, he appointed the plaintiff, Arthur Watkins Williams, sole executor.

A On April 10, 1916, an originating summons was taken out by the plaintiff, asking that it might be declared whether or not the policy of insurance was validly assigned to and was the property of the defendant. The summons was adjourned into court and came on to be heard before ASTBURY, J., on June 6, 1916. ASTBURY, J., held that this was not a valid assignment as there were no present words of gift, and as the transfer was conditional, and no consideration was given or expressed to be given, it did not pass any right of action under the Policies of Assurance Act, 1867, or the Judicature Act, 1873.

B The defendant appealed.

Owen Thompson for the defendant.

C Dighton Pollock for the widow and children of the assignor, J. F. Carr (for H. A. Hind, now serving with His Majesty's forces) for Herbert Williams, brother of the assignor, and Percy F. Wheeler for the plaintiff executor, were not called upon to argue.

D LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This is rather a curious case. Mr. Williams, the assignor, had effected a policy of assurance upon his life. It was taken out in December, 1913. Soon after that date he handed the policy to his housekeeper, the defendant. He indorsed upon the policy itself this memorandum. [His LORDSHIP read the indorsement on the policy and continued:] What is the effect of that? Is it an assignment of the policy? In my opinion, on the question of construction, it is not an assignment at all. On a question of a valid gift what has always to be regarded is, not what the donee intended, but what was the form of the transaction. What is this authority to draw the insurance in the event of the assignor predeceasing the defendant? If anything, that seems to me to be a power of attorney for the defendant to obtain the policy moneys. But a power of attorney becomes inoperative upon the death of the donor; and inasmuch as it was given without consideration she cannot claim after the death of the donor. It is not, I repeat, an assignment at all. It is a mere mandate to the defendant to draw the policy moneys. Then there is this further point. It seems to me that F it is in the nature of a mere testamentary document which is intended to operate in the event of the donor predeceasing the donee. I asked counsel for the defendant if there was anything which could have been done between the date of the document and the date of the death of the assignor, and he replied that he thought not. It is impossible to say that this document, which did not confer any power or G right during the life of the assignor, was an assignment of the policy in the present case. That being so, it seems to me quite plain that the transaction cannot be supported on any one of the grounds that have been put forward. In my opinion the conclusion arrived at by ASTBURY, J., was quite right, though his reasons for it are not the same as ours. That leaves the subsequent question as to whom the policy moneys passed under the terms of the will.

H WARRINGTON, L.J.—I agree. The defendant is a volunteer, who claims to have received in the assignor's lifetime an assignment of a chose in action. Claiming as she does as a volunteer she can only succeed if she can show that the assignor in making the gift did everything that was necessary to transfer the property. Has the defendant made out that the assignor did all that was necessary? I The mere form of the gift is immaterial. If the assignor has used any words to effect a transfer that would be sufficient. He need not use the word "assign." No particular words are essential. All the assignor has done, however, is to sign a particular document. [His LORDSHIP read the indorsement on the policy, and continued:] That in terms is a mere authority to draw the policy moneys. Not only that, but it is an authority the effect of which would determine ipso facto if the assignor had died in the defendant's lifetime. There is nothing to show that it was irrevocable. One must read the authority as if it were revocable. That is the conclusion one would arrive at of the assignor's intention. On its true construction it is a mere revocable authority to the defendant, which only becomes operative after the death of the assignor. On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the decision of ASTBURY, J., is right, although, like the Master of the Rolls, I think that the reasons that ASTBURY, J., has assigned for his decision are not quite those which we have given in our judgments.

SCRUTTON, L.J.—I agree.

Criminal Law—Carnal knowledge—Girl between thirteen and sixteen years—Defence—"Reasonable cause to believe girl of or above age of sixteen"—Need of accused to prove actual belief by him—Duty of counsel for prosecution—Irregularity in address to jury—Appeal to "protect girls from men like prisoner."

Section 5 (2) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, provides that it is a defence to a charge of carnal knowledge of a girl of or above the age of thirteen years and under the age of sixteen years, if the accused can prove that he "had reasonable cause to believe that the girl was of or above the age of sixteen years." It is not sufficient for the accused to show merely that he had reasonable cause for such belief. He must also prove that he did in fact believe the girl to be of or above that age.

Duty of counsel for the prosecution commented upon.

Notes. The Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, s. 5, has been replaced by the Sexual Offences Act, 1956. The defence is now provided by s. 6 (3) of the 1956 Act, which expressly states that the accused must also believe the girl in question to be of the age of sixteen years or over.

Appeal against a conviction before BRAY, J., at Worcester Assizes for having had unlawful carnal knowledge of a girl under sixteen years of age. At the trial the

A accused did not deny the offence, but set up as a defence that he had reasonable cause to believe that the girl was of or above the age of sixteen years. He said that she had the appearance of a girl of seventeen.

Counsel for the prosecution in addressing the jury made an appeal to them "to protect young girls from men like the prisoner."

F. J. Tucker and D. Cotes-Preedy were not called on to argue.

C AVORY, J., delivered the following judgment of the court.—The defence set up to the charge on the trial of the appellant was that he had reasonable cause to believe that the girl was of or above the age of sixteen years, which is a statutory defence under the proviso to s. 5 (2) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885. In the opinion of this court the phrase "had reasonable cause to believe" means "had reasonable cause to believe and did in fact believe," which is equivalent to saying that the person charged did believe on reasonable grounds that the girl was sixteen years of age or over.

D It was urged on behalf of the appellant that at the trial counsel for the prosecution made several observations which would have the effect of prejudicing the jury. In particular counsel was stated to have appealed to the jury "to protect young girls from men like the prisoner." It cannot be said that such an observation was in good taste, but it is not sufficiently irregular to afford ground for setting aside the conviction. It has been properly said that counsel for the prosecution should not press for a conviction. In R. v. Puddick (1) Crompton, J., said that counsel should regard themselves as "ministers of justice" assisting in its administration rather than as advocates. Although the observation referred to may not have been in good taste, this court cannot say that it had the effect of misleading the jury and inducing them to find the appellant guilty. We think that they would not have returned a verdict of guilty unless they were satisfied by the evidence before them that their verdict was the right one. The appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Animal—Highway—Domesticated animals straying on highway—Sheep—Gaps in hedge—Damage to plaintiff's motor car—Liability of occupier of land adjoining highway—Negligence—Nuisance.

In ordinary circumstances in an ordinary highway it is no breach of duty on the part of the owner or occupier of land adjoining the highway not to prevent harmless domesticated animals like sheep from straying on the highway, and so he is not liable for damage caused to a user of the highway by such straying animals, and it makes no difference whether an action brought against him in respect of such straying is based on negligence or nuisance. But this in no wise affects the right of the owner of the soil of the highway to recover in respect of damage caused by harmless domesticated animals using the road not for the purpose of a highway.

Animal—Highway—Animal straying on—No civil action for damage conferred by Highways Acts.

The provisions of the Highways Act, 1835, s. 14, and the Highways Act, 1864, s. 25 [see now Highways Act, 1959, s. 135 (1)], held not to confer a civil action for damage caused by animals straying on the highway.

June 3, 1916. The following judgments were read.

I

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This appeal raises a curious and important question of law. The plaintiffs sued in the county court for damage to a motor car caused by the negligence of the defendant in the following circumstances. While the car was being driven along the highway in the daylight, at a speed which is not found to be excessive, the driver saw in front of him some sheep unattended. He put on his brakes, and almost immediately thereafter a sheep jumped from the bank, and in some way ran into the car and broke part of the steering apparatus. The car was overturned and substantially damaged. The learned county court judge found that the sheep escaped on to the highway from an adjoining field in the occupation of the defendant in which the rest of the flock still remained. They escaped through some gaps in the hedge. He held that it was the duty of the defendant to keep his sheep from being on the highway except for the purpose of passing along the highway, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £100. The defendant appealed to the Divisional Court. The Divisional Court allowed the appeal.

The first question to be considered is: What is the duty of the owner or occupier of land adjoining a highway. Is he bound to maintain a hedge or fence for the purpose of preventing sheep from straying on to the highway? I put aside the cases where either by the provisions of a local Inclosure Act or by prescription or otherwise a duty to fence is imposed, and I treat the highway on which the accident occurred as an ordinary highway. It is somewhat remarkable that there is no direct decision on this point. But there are dicta which have to be considered. In Goodwyn v. Chereley (1) BRAMWELL, B., said (4 H. & N. at p. 634): "A person is not bound to fence his land." POLLOCK, C.B., agreed. In Jones v. Lee (2) BANKES, J., said (106 L.T. at p. 126):

"First of all, what is the duty of the owner or occupier of land adjoining a highway with regard to keeping animals off the highway or fencing his land so as to prevent animals getting on to the highway? By common law there is no such duty at all; and we have not today heard any argument as to whether any duty can be created under the Highway Act. I am not going to consider that for the purpose of my judgment. Suffice it to say, by common law the owner or occupier of land adjoining a highway is under no duty to fence so as to keep his animals off the highway. The plaintiffs, therefore, in this case seem to me to fail in establishing the first point which is necessary to establish, namely, any duty as between the owner of this animal and themselves."

In Ellis v. Bangard (3) (106 L.T.R. at p. 53) BUCKLEY, L.J., expressly approved this doctrine; and KENNEDY, L.J., though not so strongly, took the same view. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., on the other hand, dissented, at least if the sheep or cattle were so numerous as to obstruct the highway. This court in Higgins v. Searle (4)—the sow case—indicated their approval of the doctrine laid down by BANKES, J.

I am prepared to hold that under ordinary circumstances in an ordinary highway it is no breach of duty not to prevent harmless animals like sheep from straying on to the highway, and that it makes no difference whether the action is sought to be based on negligence or on a nuisance to the highway. An animal like a sheep, by nature harmless, cannot fairly be regarded as likely to collide with a motor car, and the owner of the sheep cannot be held liable on that footing. The reasoning of the Court of Common Pleas in the leading case of Cor v. Burbidge (5) seems to me to cover the present case. I do not forget that under the Highways Acts of 1835 and 1864 certain penalties may be imposed upon anyone whose cattle are found straying on the road. That was a new remedy given for the protection of the public. But I do not think that a man whose cattle has strayed renders himself to an action at law. The fine imposed by the justices is the only remedy available. It was conceded by counsel that there is no trace of any duty having been established against the occupier of land adjacent to a highway towards a member of the public such as the plaintiffs assert to exist. This is a strong argument that no such duty exists. In the course of centuries the straying of sheep and other harmless domestic animals on the highway must have been common; yet there is no trace of any indictment for a nuisance by permitting cattle to stray. Nothing that I have said will affect the right of the owner of the soil of the highway to recover damages, if any, by sheep using the road not for the purpose of a highway. He would be in the same position as the owner of any land not being a highway into which the sheep entered. The appeal must be dismissed.

PICKFORD, L.J. This action was brought by the owner and hirer of a motor car which was damaged under the following circumstances. The car was being driven along a highway near Kenilworth, when the driver saw some sheep intended ahead of him in the road. He put on his brakes, but almost immediately two sheep which he had not seen jumped from the bank near him, and ran into A the car and caused an accident from which the damage claimed resulted. I agree with LUSH, J., that the judgment of the county court judge should be treated as finding that the defendant was negligent in not keeping his sheep from straying, and that the driver of the motor car was not negligent. He also found, and I think there was evidence to support the finding, that it is the natural tendency of sheep to run across or otherwise endanger vehicles passing along the highway on which they are straying, and also that, if some get separated from the flock, they have what he calls almost a mania for rejoining it regardless of obstacles. I cannot find any evidence specifically supporting this second finding, and I shall confine myself in dealing with the case to the former finding as to the tendency of sheep. I do not take it as a finding that sheep always behave in that way, but that it is their nature to do so at times. Anyone dealing with sheep would, therefore, be presumed to know it. There is no finding in evidence that there was any vicious or wild tendency to run into vehicles in these particular sheep.

C This question therefore seems to be distinctly raised: Is the owner of domesticated animals which he negligently allows to stray on a highway liable for damage occasioned by their obstructing a vehicle on the highway by reason of an action which is a natural and ordinary action of an animal of that kind? The learned county court judge held that the defendant was liable, and the Divisional Court reversed that decision and entered judgment for the defendant. The learned judges did not put their judgments quite on the same ground, AVORY, J., holding that the case was governed by Cox v. Burbidge (5), and LUSH, J., that the damage was too remote, and not the natural consequence of the negligence. Both learned judges laid some stress upon the speed of the motor car. But with respect I cannot see how that is relevant if the finding of the county court judge that there was no negligence—i.e., no want of reasonable precaution to avoid danger on the part of the driver—be accepted. The pace at which motor cars are driven on roads where cattle are or may be expected to be straying is often evidence and strong evidence of such want of precaution, but, as that is negatived in this case, the speed seems to me immaterial. If there be no obligation to restrain animals from so obstructing vehicles the introduction of fast traffic cannot create one, and, on the other hand, if there be such an obligation, the introduction of fast traffic cannot do away with it, although it makes the consequences more serious and the obligation in that way more onerous. I confess to a difficulty in seeing the distinction in principle between the two cases mentioned by LUSH, J., of a sheep obstructing a vehicle in the dark and one obstructing a vehicle in daylight, if it be once found that the driver of that vehicle was taking proper precautions to avoid accidents.

G I have great doubts whether this case is governed by Cox v. Burbidge (5). That case decided that the owner of an animal straying on a highway was not responsible for damage occasioned to a person using the highway where such damage was occasioned by a vicious act of that animal inconsistent with the usual nature of such animals. In my opinion, it left entirely untouched the question whether he would be liable if the damage was caused by an obstruction to the highway resulting from an action of the animal in accordance with the nature of such domesticated animals. The learned judges in that case said that the law of highways had nothing to do with the case, because it was no more to be expected that the animal would commit a vicious act on a highway than anywhere else: see per WILLES, J., 13 C.B.N.S. at p. 441. The suggestion that the driver might be indictable looks a little the other way, for I do not think WILLES, J., meant to say that damage resulting from an indictable nuisance could not give rise to an action, but it is only a suggestion of a possibility, and I do not think it is of importance except as showing that the case was not meant to decide this point, and that the basis of the decision was that the act was a vicious act not natural to the class of animals and not known to the owner to be likely to occur in the case of that particular animal. I think that Jones v. Lee (2), so far as this point is concerned, proceeds on the same ground, as both learned judges seemed to consider the act of the horse in that case a vicious act not natural to a horse. Bradley v. Wallaces, Ltd. (6) turns on the same points, and in Hadwell v. Righton, Ltd. (7) the damage was caused, not by the natural tendency of the hen, but by its being frightened and driven towards the bicycle by a dog. It may well be that it is not the natural consequence of letting a hen stray that there will be a dog there and a passing bicycle at the same time, and that the one will chase the hen into the other.

The cases which seem to me important are Jones v. Lee (2), so far as the dictum of BANKES, J., is concerned; Higgins v. Searle (4), and Ellis v. Banyard (3). In the last-named case BUCKLEY, L.J., laid down the same doctrine as BANKES, J., and I take that to go to this extent—that there is no obligation to fence so as to keep animals from straying upon a highway, and, therefore, no liability in respect of them if they do so, no matter how inevitable and how great the destruction they cause. This seems to me to be in direct contradiction to the opinions expressed by the majority of the Court of Appeal in Ellis v. Banyard (3). I do not think it is necessary in this case to decide which is the right view, as I think that Higgins v. Searle (4) and Ellis v. Banyard (3) are expressions of opinion in this court that the owner of an animal is not responsible under the circumstances of this case. It is true that in both those cases the court held that there was no evidence of negligence, and the plaintiffs' counsel, therefore, argued that we should disregard any expressions of opinion beyond that. I do not think that is right. The court proceeded to deal with the case on the assumption that there was negligence, and, although that part of the judgment was not necessary to support the decision, I do not think we can disregard it.

In Higgins v. Searle (4) the damage was caused by a sow, which had strayed on to a highway and was lying down, getting up suddenly when the horn of a motor car was sounded, which made a horse, also on the road, shy into the motor car and occasion damage. It might have been said that the combination of sow, horse, and motor car at the same time could not have been anticipated any more than the combination of dog, hen, and bicycle in Hadwell v. Righton (7). But the case was not decided on that ground. It was found by the jury that the shying of the horse was the probable result of the action of the sow, and that there was no peculiarity about this sow which differentiated it in its action or otherwise from other sows. To place an inanimate object upon a highway so as to cause a horse to shy was held to be actionable in Harris v. Mobbs (8), and it was argued in Higgins v. Searle (4) that to allow an animal to stray on to a highway and so cause a horse to shy was in the same measure actionable where what the animal did was only what it might be expected that such an animal might do. In Ellis v. Banyard (3) the damage was occasioned by the natural act of some cattle in obstructing the road, and again the court held that there was no evidence of negligence. But BUCKLEY and KENNEDY, L.JJ., expressed opinions that even if it had been proved, there would have been no liability. It seems to me that the result of these two cases is that, although to place an inanimate object so as to be an obstruction to a highway is actionable if damage results, to allow an animal to stray on a highway, which becomes an obstruction by an act of its own, even though one natural to such an animal, is not. This, however, is qualified by VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and KENNEDY, L.JJ., to the extent that if the animals are allowed to stray in such large numbers as inevitably to be an obstruction an action will lie. The ground of the distinction is not very specifically expressed, but perhaps it is that although the animal may probably so act as to cause an obstruction it will not necessarily do so, and whether it so acts or not depends upon its own will, and that, therefore, the owner cannot expect an obstruction to be the natural consequence of its straying, whereas in the case of large numbers the obstruction is inevitable merely by reason of the numbers. Otherwise it is difficult to see, if there is liability for an obstruction, how there is any difference between its being caused by many or by few. In the case of an inanimate object it

A is placed where it is by the owner, and there is no question whether it will become an obstruction or not. But, whatever the reasons, I think that those cases show that, according to the opinions expressed in this court in the recent cases, the defendant is not liable here.

It was also argued that the defendant had been guilty of a breach of the Highway Act, and, therefore, he was liable. That must, I think, depend upon whether, looking at the whole of the Act, it intended to confer a right of action, and I do not think it did. I think the appeal must be dismissed.

NEVILLE, J.—The question is whether the owner of the car is entitled to recover damages from the owner of the sheep. This depends upon two things: first, was the defendant under a duty to the plaintiffs as a member of the public using the road to keep his sheep from straying on to the road; and, secondly, was the accident and consequent damage the natural result of the failure to perform the duty? If the duty exists, negligence has been found, and in that case the only remaining question is: Was the damage too remote?

We are now in the year 1916, and during the preceding centuries no such duty has ever been established against the occupier of land adjacent to a highway. It was suggested in argument that that might be accounted for by the rarity of the occurrence of accident of the nature of the one in question. If this is so, it may have an important bearing on the second question in the case. It was considered that no such duty exists where a road runs across open land. But this is sought to be explained on the ground that in such cases the road must be presumed to have been dedicated subject to straying cattle being upon it. This explanation does not appear to me satisfactory, inasmuch as in the case of fenced roads many, if not most, of them must have been dedicated before they were fenced, and it seems to me impossible to hold that, by subsequently fencing, the adjoining owner made any further dedication or in any way enlarged the rights of the public using the road against him. Even in the case of fenced roads grazing rights by the wayside have always been recognised; cottagers have been ever in the habit of allowing their animals the benefit of the pasturage with no fear before their eyes greater than that of the pound. No single instance has been, or, I believe, can be, produced of anyone having been indicted for nuisance by permitting cattle to stray upon the road, no case has ever established liability in civil courts, and the strongest authority that can be produced for the proposition is a dictum of a learned judge that such an action might possibly lie, while it seems to me there is a great body of judicial opinion against it, including that of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., BUCKLEY, L.J., KENNEDY, L.J., BANKES, L.J., MOULTON, L.J., and others.

In my opinion, the experience of centuries has shown that the presence of domestic animals upon the highway is not inconsistent with the reasonable safety of the public using the road. I am unable to draw any distinction in this respect between domestic animals; I think horses, cattle, sheep, pigs, fowls, and dogs all fall into the same category for this purpose. There is no doubt that the advent of motor cars has greatly increased the danger resulting from the presence of loose animals on the road owing to the speed at which cars travel, and the difficulty shared by man and beast of avoiding them. It is only yesterday, however, that as mechanically propelled carriages the right of motor cars to use the roads was subject to conditions which rendered great speed unattainable. And I think that to-day those who use them now take the roads as they find them and put up themselves with such risks as the speed of their cars occasions not only to themselves but to others. The prima facie harmlessness of domestic animals as frequenters of the highway is, I think, established as a legal doctrine. This is what I think BLACKBURN, J., is referring to when he says in Fletcher v. Rylands (9) (L.R. 1 Exch. at p. 280): "The wisdom of our ancestors has established that bulls do not gore nor horses kick." If LORD BLACKBURN had added, "and that domestic animals of normal character do not by straying on the roads obstruct traffic" it would have been an accurate statement, and, at that date, free from the suspicion of irony which attaches to the statement which he did make, and which might attach to the suggested addition to his statement were it made to-day. It seems to me impossible to suppose that the question whether domestic animals are dangerous or harmless by the wayside where they have ever been common objects can have been one to be left to the jury, for that would have been to leave the character of domestic animals undeterminate for all time.

There can be little doubt, I think, that our ancestors showed true wisdom in the conclusion they arrived at in this respect. The instinct of the normal animal is to fear man and to endeavour to avoid danger, and in the days when roads were bad and traffic slow their capacity was sufficient to enable them to do so. As roads improved and the pace of traffic increased it was thought that certain measures of protection in the roads against straying animals were desirable, and these were afforded by the provisions of the Highways Acts of 1835 and 1864. If the character of domestic animals with regard to highways had come to be considered for the first time when roads were tarred and motor traffic abounded, it is possible that a different view might have prevailed with regard to their harmlessness on the highway, for, however strongly the instinct of self-preservation may appeal to them, their perceptions may prove inadequate to such a judgment of the speed of the prevailing traffic as will always ensure their safety and consequently the safety of the road traffic. But, in my opinion, it is not competent to the courts to reconsider the classification of former times and to include domestic animals of blameless antecedents in the class of dangerous animals even when wandering on the roadsides. It appears, I think, from Cor v. Burbidge (5) that in the case of animals not of a fierce disposition the owner is not under any duty to the public to prevent them straying on the highway: see the judgment of ERLE, C.J.

The Highways Acts, 1835 and 1864, ss. 14 and 25 respectively, do not, in my opinion, impose any civil liability in respect of animals trespassing upon the highway. So far as I know they have never been held so to do, and from their form I do not think they could have been intended so to do. They impose no positive obligation and contain no positive prohibition, but merely impose certain penalties upon the happening of certain events. I should be sorry to hold for the first time at this date that farmers were liable to a grave and unlimited liability in case of inadvertently or even wilfully permitting their cattle to trespass on the highway. Even if there was a duty owed by the defendant to the public using the road to keep his sheep safely inclosed (I have already said I think there was no such duty), I do not think that the charge of the sheep upon the motor car was the natural consequence of its presence on the highway, and that the damage is too remote to be recoverable.

Bastardy—“Single woman”—Wife of seaman serving on board his ship—Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict., c. 65), s. 3.

B

The respondent, who was married in October, 1914, lived till December, 1914, with her husband, who then joined the Royal Navy, and between that date and August, 1916, was serving on board his ship and never had access to his wife. In March, 1916, the wife was delivered of a child of which the husband could not have been the father. On becoming aware of the birth, the husband stopped payment of his allotment to the wife, and the separation allowance paid by the government also ceased. In August, 1916, the husband was at home on leave for a week and forgave his wife and lived with her. The husband went back to his ship in September, 1916, and the payment of his allotment and of the government allowance was renewed. He had since been serving on board his ship and had been unable to live with his wife, but she expected that when he got leave he would return to her. In July, 1917, the wife took out a summons against the appellant, alleging that he was the father of the child and had within twelve months after its birth paid money for its maintenance. Held: the material date to look at in deciding whether the wife was a “single woman” for the purposes of s. 3 of the Act of 1872 was the date of the application, and, as the wife could not be said to be living separate and apart from her husband when their separation was due to his being on active service, she was not such a “single woman.”

Case Stated by justices for the borough of Stockton-on-Tees.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Stockton-on-Tees on July 11, 1917, the respondent, Annie Malcolm, preferred an information against the appellant, Wilfred Marshall, charging that she had been delivered of a female bastard child on Mar. 19, 1916, of which child she alleged that the appellant was the father, and had within twelve calendar months next after its birth paid money for its maintenance. It was proved or admitted that (i) the respondent was married on Oct. 25, 1914, and she lived with her husband for two or three months, when he had to join the navy, he having been in the Royal Naval Reserve. (ii) Between December, 1914, and August, 1916, the respondent's husband was serving on his ship and never during that time lived with his wife or had access to her. (iii) On Mar. 19, 1916, the respondent was delivered of a female child of which her husband could not have been the father. (iv) Her husband, on becoming aware of the birth of the child stopped the payment of his allotment to her, and the separation allowance paid by the government also ceased, and this continued for a period of five or six months until his return to Stockton at the end of August, 1916. (v) Her husband came home on leave for seven days at the end of August, 1916, when he forgave his wife and lived with her during this period of leave, and, on returning to the navy, took steps again to make his allotment to her, and the government allowance was also renewed, and she was receiving the same, but did not receive any allowance for the child. (vi) Since Sept. 1, 1916, up to the present time, the respondent's husband had been serving on his ship and had never during that time lived or been able to live with his wife, though the respondent expected that when her husband got leave he would at once return to her.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the respondent was not, for the purposes of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, a single woman at the time when the application was made, and was, therefore, not entitled to an order, as, subsequently to the birth of the child, her husband had forgiven her and had lived with her just before he last went to sea, and she was receiving an allotment from her husband and separation allowance from the government, and had in fact all the rights of a married woman, and was, therefore, not living separate and apart from her husband, and that, to enable a married woman to be deemed to be a single woman for the purpose of the Act, it was necessary that she should be living separate and apart from her husband at the time when the application was made. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that, as it was proved and admitted that her husband for more than twelve months before the birth of the child had not lived with his wife, and, with the exception of the seven days' leave in August, 1916, had not lived with his wife since he left her to join his ship in December, 1914, and was not living with her at the time when she laid the information—viz., on July 11, 1917—the respondent was a single woman within the meaning of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, and was entitled to lay an information against the putative father of the child.

The justices made an order adjudicating that the appellant was the father of the child, holding that the respondent was a single woman within the meaning of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, and was entitled to an order.

By the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, s. 3:

"Any single woman who may be with child or who may be delivered of a bastard child after the passing of this Act may either before the birth or at any time within twelve months from the birth of such child, or at any time thereafter, upon proof that the man alleged to be the father of such child has within the twelve months next after the birth of such child paid money for its maintenance, make application to any one justice of the peace acting for the petty sessional division of the county, or for the city, borough, or place in which she may reside, for a summons to be served on the man alleged by her to be the father of the child. . . . and such justice of the peace shall thereupon issue his summons to the person alleged to be the father of such child to appear at a petty session to be holden upon a day specified in such summons for the petty sessional division, city, borough, or other place in which such justice usually acts."

G. F. Mortimer for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

- A DARLING, J., stated the facts, and continued: The material date to look at in deciding whether the respondent was to be deemed a single woman within the meaning of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, is the date of the application. The question, therefore, is whether the respondent was to be deemed a single woman on July 11, 1917. Although in fact married, she might, for the purposes of the Act, be treated as a single woman in certain circumstances. In
- B Ex parte Grimes (1) LORD CAMPBELL said (22 L.J.M.C. at p. 154):

"in contemplation of law a married woman living separate from her husband may be within the meaning of the Act, which was passed for the purpose of providing for the support of the child."

- C It is a complete misuse of language to say that this woman was living separate and apart from her husband. A wife is not living separate and apart from her husband merely because he is absent on a journey. Judges and barristers on circuit are not living separate and apart from their wives. In Jones v. Davies (2), KENNEDY, J., said ([1901] 1 K.B. at p. 121):

- D "We ought not, I think, to deviate from the plain words of an enactment further than we are obliged to do, nor ought we to create exceptions upon exceptions."

- E The magistrates have decided this case in a manner contrary to authority. They decided that a woman who was living with her husband as much as the wife of a soldier or sailor can live with him when he is on active service was living separate and apart from her husband. In that, the magistrates were wrong and the appeal must be allowed.

AVORY and SANKEY, JJ., concurred.

Appeal allowed and order set aside.

SCHWANN v. COTTON AND ANOTHER

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Pickford and Warrington, L.J.J.), June 27, 28, 29, July 13, 1916]

Easement—Water—Supply to lower tenement by underground pipe from upper tenement—Separation of tenements "and appurtenances" by devise—Conveyance by devisee of upper tenement without notice—Implied grant of supply of water—Right to supply of owner of lower tenement.

By his will, made in 1898, the testator devised M. "and its appurtenances" to the predecessor in title of the defendants, and B. (of which he was in occupation) "and the appurtenances" to the predecessor in title of the plaintiff. B. was supplied with water by an underground pipe which was laid down in 1893 from a well in N. through M. By 1914 the source from which the water came and the existence of the pipe passing through M. would seem to have been forgotten, though the supply was continuously used by the owners of B. and its source and the pipe could easily have been ascertained. The defendants purchased M. without notice of the pipe or that the plaintiff's land obtained water through M. In 1914 a new drive was made to the house at M., and the pipe was discovered and cut by the defendants, thus depriving the plaintiff of the supply of water from M. In an action by the plaintiff for an injunction and damages,

Held: the effect of the will was to devise B. with the right of passage of such water as might flow through the pipe and the devise of M. was a devise subject to that right: Phillips v. Low (1), [1892] 1 Ch. 47, applied; since the easement depended on an implied grant from which the grantor could not derogate, the plaintiff was entitled to the relief claimed, and the defendants could not rely on the equitable defence of being purchasers for value without notice.

Appeal by defendants from a decision of ASTBURY, J., reported [1916] 2 Ch. 120. The facts are set out in the judgment of LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.

- D H. M. Givcen for the defendants.
Micklem, K.C., and A. F. Topham for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 13, 1916. The following judgments were read.

- LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—There are at or near Freshwater in the Isle of Wight three properties known as (i) Nugent's, (ii) Malta, and (iii) Braxton. Nugent's is the highest and Braxton is the lowest. In 1893, a pipe was laid down from a well in Nugent's through Malta to Braxton. The plaintiff is now tenant in occupation of Braxton. The defendants are in occupation of Malta. The well is not deep. But the lie of the land is such that water flows down from the well through a one inch delivery pipe to Braxton. The pipe, so far as I can judge from a plan, was several hundred yards in length. It was laid down openly and at considerable cost. It crossed a public road, but, as is almost always the case with pipes, it was not visible after the pipe was laid down throughout its whole course. The well is fed by a spring, and from 1893 until 1914 water passed continuously and without interruption to Braxton. There are two standpipes in Braxton. For some years, it was the sole supply of water to Braxton House. After a time, water for the house was obtained from some neighbouring water company, and thenceforward the water from the well was used for the garden and for the stables. The defendants cut this pipe where it passes through Malta, and thus deprived the plaintiff of this supply of water. Hence this action.
- F
- G

- The first question is as to the relations existing between the plaintiff and the defendants. Colonel Cotton, who lived at Braxton, by his will in 1898 devised Malta "and its appurtenances" to his son, through whom the defendants claim. He also devised his freehold hereditaments, known as Braxton Cottage, "and the appurtenances" to persons through whom the plaintiff claims. The testator died in 1902. At the date of the will, the testator was in actual occupation of Braxton, which was supplied by water passing through the pipe. It seems to me that, in in these circumstances, it must be held that the effect of the will was to devise Braxton, with the right of passage of such water as might flow through the pipe, and that the devise of Malta was a devise subject to that right. The decision of CHITTY, J., in Phillips v. Low (1) is an express authority on this point. He applied to a case of a devise of two portions of property by the same will the well-established doctrine where there are two conveyances of the same date, and held that there is an implied grant where one of the two properties is so constructed as that parts of it involve a necessary dependence, in order to its enjoyment in the state in which it was when devised, on the adjoining tenement. So, here, Braxton was, at the date of the testator's will and death, in fact enjoying the passage of water through the pipe passing through Malta. In my opinion, it is not necessary to consider whether the property in the pipe itself was, so far as it passed through Malta, vested in the devisee of Braxton (see Nicholas v. Chamberlain (2)) as part of the house, according to the view expressed by JAMES, L.J., in Wheeldon v. Burrows (3) (12 Ch.D. at p. 60), or whether, without passing the property in the iron pipe, the devise of Braxton gave an easement allowing the passage of water through the pipe. In either view the defendants cannot justify the interference with the pipe.
- H

The decision of this court in Wheeldon v. Burrows (3) seems to me greatly to assist the plaintiff. THESIGER, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, says (ibid. at p. 49):

"On the grant by the owner of a tenement of part of that tenement as it is then in fact used and enjoyed, there will pass to the grantee all those continuous and apparent easements (by which, of course, I mean quasi-easements), or, in other words, all those easements which are necessary to the reasonable enjoyment of the property granted, and which have been and are at the time of the grant used by the owners of the entirety for the benefit of the part granted."

It is said, however, that the law does not recognise such a right because there is nothing to show that, as against Nugent's, there is any right to the flow of water, and that, therefore, the alleged easement or quasi-easement is precarious and such as the law does not recognise. In my opinion, the objection is not valid. The circumstances in which the pipe was inserted in the wall of the well and the pipe was laid down in 1893 have not been proved. If the plaintiff was claiming, as against Nugent's, a right to a flow of water from the well, the burden would of course be on the plaintiff. But I am disposed to think that, when the plaintiff has established an uninterrupted user and enjoyment for more than twenty years, the onus may be shifted, and the defendants, who seek to escape from the effect of such enjoyment, may have cast on them the burden of showing what did happen in 1893. I see no reason why a grant by deed in 1893 from Nugent's to Colonel Cotton should not be presumed. I do not, however, base my decision on this theory. There is no legal difficulty in an implied grant of a right of passage through the pipe of such water as may come to the pipe, without reference to the question whether the owner of the spring head might not have a right to divert it altogether. It is one thing to say that the owner of Nugent's might divert the spring, and it is another thing to say that the devisee of Malta can divert and interfere with the pipe through which water passes to Braxton.

On principle, I cannot see why the precarious origin of an artificial course should have any bearing on the rights of persons lower down as against each other. In Arkwright v. Gell (4) LORD ABINGER, C.B., after deciding that no right can be acquired as against water passing from a mine through a sough, says (5 M. & W. at p. 233):

"No right is acquired as against the owner of the property from which the course of water takes its origin: though, as between the first and any subsequent appropriator of the watercourse itself, such a right may be acquired."

It is true that this is a dictum not necessary for the decision of the case, but it seems to me to be entitled to great weight and to be in accordance with good sense.

It is then said that, although the defendant Mrs. Cotton's predecessor claims under the same will as the plaintiff's predecessor, yet that defendant is a purchaser for value without notice, and cannot be affected by the right claimed by the plaintiff. And it is urged that, for some years, the existence of the pipe and the watercourse, though visible at Braxton, was not visible at Malta, and, further, that a stone at the top of the well prevented anyone from seeing that there was a pipe in Nugent's. I am not satisfied that this is any answer to the plaintiff's case, which rests, not on an implied covenant, but on implied grant. A grantor must not

A derogate from his grant. That is a common law doctrine, and must be enforced irrespective of the equitable doctrine of notice. If, for example, an actual deed of grant could now be produced from Nugent to Colonel Cotton, the owner of Braxton and Malta, it would be no defence for the present owner of Malta to say, "I never heard of it before I purchased." If the case depends on the implied grant contained in the will, I think Tulk v. Moxhay (5) and similar cases have no application. This view is in accordance with NEVILLE, J.'s, judgment in Cable v. Bryant (6).

B It was argued, though faintly, that it was wrong to burden Malta with a right in the nature of an easement which was not necessary for the use and enjoyment of Braxton. But the word "necessary" must not be taken in a rigid sense. The better phrase is that which is used by LORD CAMPBELL in Ewart v. Cochrane (7) (4 Macq. at p. 123), "convenient and comfortable enjoyment of the property," and it cannot be doubted that a constant supply of water, available either for the house or for the garden, is within those words. It can make no difference that Braxton has a right on payment to obtain water from a water company.

C Various other points were raised in argument before the learned judge in the court below, who granted relief to the plaintiff. But I do not think it necessary D further to refer to the numerous authorities cited. In my opinion, for the reasons I have indicated, the plaintiff is entitled to the relief granted by the learned judge, and the appeal must be dismissed.

E PICKFORD, L.J.—In 1893, Colonel Cotton, whom I shall call the testator, owned a piece of land at Freshwater in the Isle of Wight on which there were two houses, one called Malta and one called Braxton. In that year, he leased a part of this land on which the house Braxton stood to Colonel Money, and agreed to give him a supply of water to that house. He retained for himself the rest of the land with the house Malta. Adjoining this land, but separated from it by a highway, there was some land belonging at that time to a Mr. Hatcher, which afterwards became the property of Mr. Nugent, and was referred to during the argument as Nugent's land. I shall refer to these three pieces of land as Malta, Braxton, and Nugent's land respectively. The supply of water was obtained by the insertion of a pipe into a well on Nugent's land which passed through that land for some distance, then under the highway separating it from Malta, through Malta and a part of Braxton, and into the cistern of that house and to standpipes in the garden belonging to it. At first, the water passing through this pipe was the only water supply to Braxton, but after a time Colonel Money obtained a supply for the house from a local water company, and the water passing through the pipe was only used for garden purposes. This user continued till the year 1914, by which time the source from which the water came and the existence of the pipe passing through Malta seems to have been forgotten, or, at any rate, not known to the then occupiers of the three pieces of land, though the supply was continuously G used by the occupiers of Braxton, and the source of the supply and the course of the pipe could easily have been ascertained. In 1902, Colonel Cotton died, leaving Malta with its appurtenances to his son, and Braxton with its appurtenances to his wife and daughters. The plaintiff derives her title from the wife and daughters, and the defendant A. W. Cotton's wife, in whose interest he defends this action, H from the wife.

I In 1914, the defendant Cotton made a new drive from the house Malta, and, in doing so, the workmen discovered the pipe leading to Braxton and cut it while making the drive. The defendant Cotton was then away from home, and his gardener, on the remonstrance of the plaintiff, very properly repaired the pipe till he received instructions from his master. The defendant Cotton ordered the pipe to be cut again, and the plaintiff instructed his solicitor to write to him claiming a right to have the supply of water restored. The defendant Cotton replied in a tone which practically made litigation inevitable. There may have been some reason for his adopting this tone, though I see none in the evidence, and, therefore, I shall say no more about it. But I think there is little doubt that an arrangement could have been made which would not have materially interfered with the interests of either party. However, none was made, and we have now to decide the right of the parties. There is no doubt that, at the time the pipe was inserted into the well on Nugent's land and carried across the road through Malta to Braxton, it was done openly and with the knowledge of all concerned in the land through which the pipe passed. But there is nothing to show on what terms the supply was obtained from the then owner of Nugent's land.

The defendant Cotton contends that, under these circumstances, the plaintiff has not proved any rights against Nugent's land to a supply of water, and, therefore, the rights claimed to a passage of that water through the pipe under the defendant's land is a right not known to the law, and cannot be enforced against him who, as representing his wife, is a purchaser without notice. He also contends that the supply was precarious, as it might have been cut off by the owner of Nugent's land, and that it was not apparent or necessary to Braxton. I do not think it necessary to decide the plaintiff's rights against Mr. Nugent, who has up to now not interposed in the dispute at all, though he was a witness at the trial. He is not a party to the action or before the court at all, and I wish to say nothing that may prejudice the question between him and the plaintiff if it ever should arise. I will assume for the purposes of this case that the plaintiff has not such a right against him.

Under these circumstances, has the plaintiff a right as against the defendants? I think he has. A great part of the able argument of the defendants' counsel was devoted to showing that such a right could not be acquired by user and prescription. I do not think it necessary to deal with this part of the argument, because I do not think that the plaintiff's right depends on user or prescription, but on grant. I can see no objection in law to a grant by the testator of a right to pass through a pipe under his land a supply of water in fact existing, even though a third party may have a right if he wish to cut off that supply.

When the testator devised Malta and its appurtenances to the defendant Cotton's predecessor in title, and Braxton and its appurtenances to the plaintiff's predecessor, the effect was, in my opinion, the same as if he had made two simultaneous conveyances to the same effect, and in that case Braxton would pass with the rights of passage of such water as in fact flowed through the pipe, and Malta subject to such right: see Phillips v. Low (1). If this were a case where Braxton had been conveyed and Malta retained, the owner of the latter could not derogate from his grant of the right to use the pipe. And, in the case of separate devises of the two pieces of land, I think the effect is the same, and that the defendant Cotton, as claiming under the testator by virtue of the devise of Malta and purchase from the devisee, is in the same position. I think, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed. I have not thought it necessary to discuss the authorities at any length, as they are sufficiently dealt with by the other members of the court.

WARRINGTON, L.J.—The plaintiff is the occupier of a parcel of land near Freshwater in the Isle of Wight with a house thereon. I shall refer to this as "the plaintiff's land." The defendant Cotton and his wife are in the occupation of, and that defendant's wife is the owner of, a piece of land adjoining the plaintiff's land. This I shall refer to as "the defendant's land." The defendant Cotton is in substance defending this action on behalf of his wife. The plaintiff claims, as an easement appurtenant to his land, the right to maintain a pipe in the defendant's land and to the uninterrupted flow through such pipe of water from a well in the land of a third person with which the pipe is connected. The pipe has been cut and the water supply thus interrupted by the defendant Cotton and the defendant Hayes, who is his servant and acted under his instructions. This action has been

A brought for the purpose of establishing the right claimed by the plaintiff and for an injunction protecting that right. ASTBURY, J., has decided in favour of the plaintiff. The defendants appealed. The plaintiff does not claim the easement by prescription either at common law or under the statute, but as having been created by disposition of the common owner of the plaintiff's and the defendant's land. [HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts, and continued:]

B The first question is: Did the will, upon its true construction, operate to confer on the devisees of the plaintiff's land the right to insist on the maintenance of the pipe in the defendant's land and the uninterrupted flow of water through it? In my opinion, it clearly did. The owner of the two pieces of land enjoyed in respect of the plaintiff's land a supply of water by means of the pipe in the defendant's land. The plaintiff's land was in fact (to adopt the expression used by ERLE, C.J., in Pearson v. Spencer (8), 3 B. & S. at p. 767) necessarily dependent, in order to its enjoyment in the state it was in when devised, on the defendant's land.

C That being the case, I think it is clear that the devise of the plaintiff's land with the appurtenances operated to create as a right appurtenant to the plaintiff's land that which had been previously enjoyed as an incident to the common ownership, and to impose a correlative burden on the defendant's land: Pearson v. Spencer (8).

D But the defendants contend that the right so created was not a legal easement, but was dependent on a merely equitable obligation imposed on the devisee of the defendant's land, and that, as Mrs. Cotton purchased without notice of the existence of the circumstances giving rise to the obligation, she is not bound thereby. There is nothing in the nature of the right in question which would prevent its being a valid legal easement. The right to the free passage of water through my neighbour's land, and for that purpose to maintain a pipe or other channel therein, is one of the commonest forms of easement. So far as any objection founded on the nature of the right itself is concerned, any such objection would fail, and the right must, in my opinion, be held to be validly created as a legal easement.

E But the defendants contend that the plaintiff has failed to establish as against the owner of Nugent's land the right to the continuance of the supply of water from the well, and that, as against him the plaintiff's enjoyment must be taken to be precarious, and they maintain that this circumstance renders the enjoyment precarious as against the defendants also, and prevents the possibility of the right being claimed as a legal easement. In my opinion, the question whether or not as against the owner of Nugent's land the plaintiff can establish a legal right to a continuance of the supply is irrelevant to the question whether he is entitled as

G against the defendants to the right to the free passage of the water. Many artificial watercourses must depend for their supply on springs or percolating water, and it has never, as far as I am aware, been suggested that a grant by an upper proprietor to a lower of a right to the accustomed flow is in any way affected by the fact that the supply might at any time be cut off by the lawful interference of a third person with the flow of percolating water. So, in this case, I cannot think that

H the right of the plaintiff as against the defendants can be affected by the fact, if it be so, that the owner of Nugent's land might lawfully cut off the supply. He is not before the court, and I think it is undesirable to discuss on necessarily incomplete materials the question whether the plaintiff has in fact any legal right as against him; on the assumption that this should be answered in the negative, I should still be of opinion that the plaintiff must succeed.

I The fact is that the well-known condition that enjoyment must be nec vi, nec clam, nec precario is a condition necessary to the acquisition of an easement by prescription, and has no reference to and is in fact in the nature of things excluded where the acquisition is by grant. Reliance was placed on a dictum contained in the judgment of POLLOCK, C.B., delivering the judgment of the court in Wood v. Waud (9). Dealing with Bowling Sough, an artificial watercourse constructed by certain mineowners for the purpose of draining their mine and the rights of the landowners through which the sough passed, he says (3 Exch. at p. 779):

"The proprietor of the land through which the Bowling Sough flows has no right to insist on the colliery owners causing all the water from their works to flow through their land. These owners merely get rid of a nuisance to their works by discharging the water into the sough, and cannot be considered as giving it to one more than another of the proprietors of the land through which that sough is constructed; each may take and use what passes through his land, and the proprietor of land below has no right to any part of that water until it has reached his own land—he has no right to compel the owners above to permit the water to flow through their land for his benefit; and, consequently, has no right of action if they refuse to do so."

But all that this statement comes to is this, that, where the right claimed by the several proprietors depends on user only, the precarious nature of the original supply may affect the user of all the owners and prevent the acquisition by mere user of any legal right to a continuance, but he does not say that such a circumstance would prevent an owner from creating such a legal right by grant. No other authority which in any way touches the point has been cited, and I do not believe that an authority in support of the defendants' proposition could be found. On the whole, I am of opinion that the appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Marriage—Gift in contemplation of marriage—Engagement ring—Engagement broken off by woman—Obligation to return ring to donor.

Where a man gives an engagement ring to a woman, the ring is given on an implied condition that it shall be returned if the engagement is broken off by the woman.

Case referred to:

(1) Robinson v. Cumming (1742), 2 Atk. 409; 26 E.R. 646, L.C.; 25 Digest 525, 174.

Action tried before SHEARMAN, J., without a jury.

The plaintiff, Mr. Moss Jacobs, sued the defendant, Miss Fanny Davis, for the return of a three-stone diamond engagement ring given by the plaintiff to the defendant. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Austin Farleigh for the plaintiff.

Ernest Wild, K.C., and R. Woodfin for the defendant.

SHEARMAN, J.—The plaintiff alleges that on the day of the engagement he gave the defendant an engagement ring on the express condition that it should be

A returned in the event of the marriage not taking place. If I were dealing with the psychology of a class of people with whom I am more familiar than I am with Jews, I should not hesitate to disbelieve that story. As it is, I am not satisfied that the plaintiff has given a true account of the express terms on which the ring was given. The case is, therefore, reduced to one in which the defendant in the ordinary way wore the engagement ring for some months until the engagement was broken off. These people were living under the Mosaic law, but that is not the law which must be applied here. In order to decide the question at issue between the parties, I have to apply the English law. The question for my decision is, therefore, what is the law of this country with regard to engagement rings? Usually good sense secures the return of the engagement ring with other presents.

C The only English authority is Robinson v. Cumming (1). In that case, LORD HARDWICKE, L.C., said (2 Atk. at p. 409):

D "I think, in cases of this nature, these rules may be laid down. That if a person has made his addresses to a lady for some time, upon a view of marriage, and, upon reasonable expectation of success, makes presents to a considerable value, and she thinks proper to deceive him afterwards, it is very right that the presents themselves should be returned, or the value of them allowed to him: but, where presents are made only to introduce a person to a woman's acquaintance, and by means thereof to gain her favour, I look upon such person only in the light of an adventurer, especially where there is a disproportion between the lady's fortune and his, and therefore, like all other adventurers, if he will run risks, and loses by the attempt, he must take it for his pains."

E That deals with presents generally, and not engagement rings merely. The history of the engagement ring is interesting. We read in the Book of Genesis that, before the time of Moses, Abraham presented earrings to Rebecca on her betrothal to Isaac; and, no doubt, the story represents the ring in those days as a sign or symbol of an agreement to carry out a bargain and sale of the woman. When F one comes to the time of civilised law, the woman ceases to be a chattel, and we find in JUSTINIAN the ring used as an arrhabo, or a pledge for the contract of marriage, or sponsalia. This found its way into early English law. The times are changed now, however, but, though the origin of the engagement ring has been forgotten, it still retains its character of a pledge or something to bind the bargain or contract to marry, and it is given on the understanding that a party who G breaks the contract must return it. Whether the ring is a pledge or a conditional gift, the result is the same. The engagement ring given by the plaintiff to the defendant was given on the implied condition that it should be returned if the defendant broke off the engagement. The defendant did break off the engagement and, therefore, she must return the ring.

Judgment for plaintiff.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL (Viscount Reading, C.J., Avory and Rowlatt, J.J.).
April 2, 1917]

[Reported 1917 2 K.B. 198; 86 L.J.K.B. 773; 117 L.T. 160; 81 J.P. 152;

Criminal Law—Appeal—Fresh evidence—Admissibility—Matter occurring after trial—Letter containing confession written by convicted man in prison—Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (7 Edw. 7, c. 23), s. 9—R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4.

By the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 9: "... the Court of Criminal Appeal may, if they think it necessary or expedient in the interest of justice . . . exercise in relation to the proceedings of the court any . . . powers which may for the time being be exercised by the Court of Appeal on appeals in civil matters . . ." By R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 4: "The Court of Appeal shall have . . . full discretionary power to receive further evidence upon questions of fact . . . in any case as to matters which have occurred after the date of the decision from which the appeal is brought . . ."

After the conviction of the appellant of murder, he wrote from the prison where he was confined a letter containing a confession which, it was admitted, had a most material bearing on the case. The recipient of the letter had destroyed it, but the prison authorities, following their usual practice, had taken a copy before posting it. The appellant applied to the Court of Criminal Appeal for leave to appeal against his conviction, and the prosecution gave him notice that, on the hearing of the application, they would apply for leave to call evidence showing that the original letter had been destroyed and to produce a copy in evidence.

Held: the evidence was admissible and no privilege attached to the letter.

Notes. As to procedure on appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeal, see 10 HALSBURY'S LAWS (3rd Edn.) 524 et seq.; and for cases see 11 DIGEST (Repl.) 599 et seq. For the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 9, see 5 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 932.

Application for leave to appeal against a conviction for murder.

The appellant was convicted of murder before COLERIDGE, J., at the Central Criminal Court on Mar. 6, 1917. He was sentenced to death and confined in Brixton Prison, and on Mar. 9 he wrote to a woman a letter which contained important admissions with reference to the crime charged against him. This letter was destroyed by the recipient, but the prison authorities, following their usual practice, took a copy of the letter before posting it. On Mar. 29, the appellant received notice that, on the hearing of his appeal, the prosecution would apply for leave to call evidence showing that the original letter had been destroyed, and for leave to produce a copy in evidence. The application for leave to appeal against conviction was dealt with as if it were the hearing of the appeal.

R. D. Muir and Percival Clarke in support of the application for leave to call further evidence.

Arthur Bryan for the appellant.

VISCOUNT READING, C.J., delivered the following judgment of the court: We are of opinion that this court has power to admit the proposed evidence under s. 9 of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907. That section gives to this court the same powers as those which the Court of Appeal possesses in regard to civil matters. Clearly the Court of Appeal in civil matters has power to admit evidence which has a material bearing on the issue, although such power must always be exercised with great care. In the present case, it is admitted that the evidence which it is proposed

A to give is most material, and we think it ought to be admitted. The value of the evidence can be arrived at when the evidence has been given.

[Evidence was then formally given showing that the original letter had been destroyed, and that the copy which the prosecution wished to adduce in evidence was a true copy.]

B Muir submitted that the copy of the letter, having been formally proved, could be read.

Arthur Bryan submitted that the letter, which was written after conviction, was privileged.

VISCOUNT READING, C.J.--We are of opinion that no privilege attaches to the letter, and that evidence of its contents is admissible.

C [A copy of the letter was then read. It contained passages which stated that the appellant was guilty of the crime, that he was satisfied with his sentence, and that the motive of the crime was not robbery, but that the appellant had mistaken the murdered man for a man with whom he had had a quarrel the day before. The appellant was then called and gave evidence to this effect. He did not deny that he signed the letter, but said that he had no recollection of signing it.]

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., and Scrutton, L.J.), March 27, 1917]

G [Reported [1917] 2 K.B. 72; 86 L.J.K.B. 775; 117 L.T. 7; 61 Sol. Jo. 382]

Husband and Wife—Property—Dispute—Jurisdiction of judge on originating summons to refer whole subject-matter to official referee—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict., c. 75), s. 17.

H On an originating summons under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17, which provides that any question between husband and wife as to the title to or possession of property may be referred to a judge of the High Court who may make such order with respect to the property in dispute or direct any inquiry touching the matters in question as he thinks fit, the judge has no jurisdiction to refer the whole subject-matter to an official referee for trial.

I Notes. The Arbitration Act, 1889, s. 14, was repealed by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and replaced by s. 89 of that Act, which has been repealed by the Administration of Justice Act, 1956. See now s. 15 of the Act of 1956, which came into force on Oct. 1, 1957.

Appeal by the wife from an order made by RIDLEY, J., on an originating summons taken out by the wife under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. The facts are set out in the judgment of LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.

Disturnal, K.C. (with him St. John Field), for the wife.

Colam, K.C. (with him Douglas M. Hogg and R. Fortune), for the husband.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This is an appeal from an order of RIDLEY, J., in chambers on an originating summons taken out by the wife under s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and it raises a point of some interest. The wife says that there is certain property to which her husband and she are entitled jointly. It is not a trivial matter as the property in question is of considerable value. There is a sum of £1,000 in their joint names at a bank. There is a house of which the value may be £4,000 or £5,000—at any rate it is a very substantial amount. A third item is a motor car of the value of some £600. The appellant says that all those items are joint property and she asks for a declaration to that effect. Then there is a further claim in respect of some furniture in the house, of which there are a good many items of comparatively small value, and as to which considerable detailed investigation and evidence may be necessary. The appellant wants a declaration that the same are all joint property.

It is conceded by the wife that this is a matter on which the learned judge is entitled to have the assistance of a report. But the judge has made this order.

"It is ordered that the whole of the subject-matter of the originating summons herein dated Feb. 14, 1917 be referred to an official referee for trial."

This is, of course, not an application in an action but in a matter. But there are the provisions of s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, which are very peculiar, and I have come to the conclusion that they confer a very special jurisdiction which is given to the judge alone. It is not before the master but before the judge that the application has to be made. He may "hear any such application in his private room." He may direct "any inquiry touching the matters in question to be made in such manner as he shall think fit." But I look in vain in s. 17 for any power given to the judge to refer the originating summons and all the questions raised by it to any other tribunal for trial. The judge cannot, of course, be expected to go into all the various items of the furniture. Those are matters of detail with regard to which the judge is entitled to be assisted by means of a report by some qualified person. It is quite a different matter, however, to say that it is competent for the judge under the provisions of that section to refer the whole matter to an official referee.

We have been referred to s. 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and it is said that that section shows that the court has jurisdiction in any cause or matter

"if the question in dispute consist wholly or in part of matters of account . . . to order the whole cause or matter or any question or issue of fact arising therein to be tried before a special referee or . . . an official referee or officer of the court."

Speaking for myself, I do not think it is necessary to decide that point. My present view is that there is grave doubt whether the provisions of s. 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, have any application to any matters arising under the special and peculiar jurisdiction given by s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. I think that that special and peculiar jurisdiction negatives the idea that

A s. 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, can be applicable. However that may be, and even assuming that the matters in the originating summons could be referred under s. 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1899, there is at any rate nothing in the present case which justifies such an order as has been made. The items in dispute between the parties are now, besides the furniture, only three in number. And they are certainly not of such a nature as to need a reference under s. 14. If the judge should, B in the course of hearing the case, take the view that he requires assistance on any question of account, he can request the official referee to report to him.

With great respect to RIDLEY, J., I think the learned judge has exceeded his jurisdiction by delegating his powers as a judge in chambers to an official referee. The case must go back to the judge in chambers, who will have full power to obtain, if desirable, further assistance by way of report. Care must be taken in drawing up C the order, which should provide for reference to an official referee or to a master to report as to the furniture, and for the judge in chambers to deal with the rest of the matter.

SCRUTTON, L.J.—I agree. This originating summons is one of a kind which frequently comes before judges of the King's Bench Division, and it asks for the D determination of the title to and the possession of six items of property—a house and the land on which it stands, a sum of £1,000 being on deposit at a bank, a wherry and dinghey, a motor car, a sum of money lent to a Mr. Hancock, and certain furniture and household effects. When the summons came before RIDLEY, J., sitting in chambers, he referred the whole matter to an official referee for trial. The summons was taken out under the peculiar jurisdiction which is conferred E by s. 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. That section provides that:

"In any question between husband and wife as to the title to or possession of property, either party . . . may apply by summons or otherwise in a summary way to any judge of the High Court . . . and the judge . . . may make such order with respect to the property in dispute . . . as he thinks fit, or may F direct . . . any inquiry touching the matters in question to be made in such manner as he shall think fit. . . . Provided also, that the judge . . . if either party so require, may hear any such application in his private room. . . ."

That section seems to me to contemplate that the judge should keep control over the whole matter, and that he should determine all questions relating to it, although he may have assistance. But he is to keep his hand on the whole matter, hearing G the proceedings in his private room if so required by either party. I agree with the Master of the Rolls that it is not necessary for us finally to decide whether it is ever possible for the judge to use the powers given by s. 14 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and to send the whole subject-matter of the summons to an official referee for trial. But, in view of the very peculiar provisions of s. 17 of the Married H Women's Property Act, 1882, I think that a very strong case would have to be made out to enable him to relieve himself of his responsibility under that section.

Of the six items mentioned in the summons, two of them—namely, the wherry and dinghey, and the money lent to Mr. Hancock—have been disposed of and are now admitted to be joint property, and as regards the furniture it is agreed that all questions concerning it should be sent for inquiry into before an official referee. I But there remain three items in dispute which are, nevertheless, items of considerable value—that is to say, the house and land, the money in the bank, and the motor car. It may be necessary to look into accounts in respect of these items. But the matters of account are so subordinate to the questions of ownership of the items themselves that, in my opinion, there is not sufficient to justify the relegation of the whole matter to a subordinate tribunal. I agree, therefore, with the Master of the Rolls that the appeal should be allowed, the effect of which will be that those matters will go back to the judge in chambers to be dealt with. It may be that he will think right to order further inquiries. We only say that these items prima facie are such that they should be dealt with by the judge himself and not by a subordinate tribunal. A

GRAY v. LORD ASHBURTON

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Earl Loreburn, Viscount Haldane, Lord Atkinson and Lord Shaw), November 23, 1916] C

[Reported [1917] A.C. 26; 86 L.J.K.B. 224; 115 L.T. 729; 81 L.J.P. 17; 61 Sol. Jo. 129] D

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Arbitration—Costs—Discretion of arbitrator—Successful party ordered to pay costs—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908 (8 Edw. 7, c. 28), Sched. 2, r. 14, r. 15. E

By the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, Sched. II, r. 14, the costs of and incidental to an arbitration under that Act "shall be in the discretion of the arbitrator, who may direct to and by whom and in what manner these costs or any part thereof are to be paid." By r. 15 the arbitrator, in awarding costs, "shall . . . take into consideration the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the claim of either party, either in respect of amount or otherwise." F

In an arbitration under the Act of 1908 a landlord claimed £744 for dilapidations against a tenant, and it was ultimately decided that the tenant was liable. The arbitrator awarded the landlord £71, and directed that he should pay the costs of the arbitration and of the award. G

Held: the arbitrator had acted in the exercise of his discretion, and, there being no ground for suggesting either misconduct or want of jurisdiction on his part, his award must be upheld.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, [1916] 2 K.B. 353, reversed.

Notes. The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, was repealed by the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, which in turn has been repealed by the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. For Sched. II, r. 14 and r. 15, to the Act of 1908, see now Sched. VII, r. 21 and r. 23 to the Act of 1948. H

Appeal by the tenant from an order of the Court of Appeal (LORD READING, C.J., WARRINGTON, L.J., and LUSH, J.), reported [1916] 2 K.B. 353, reversing an order of the Divisional Court (RIDLEY and LORD COLERIDGE, J.J.), reported [1916] 1 K.B. 452, upholding the award of an arbitrator which the Winchester County Court, on a Special Case stated by the arbitrator, refused to set aside. The facts are set out in the opinion of EARL LOREBURN.

Clavell Salter, K.C., and S. H. Emanuel for the tenant.

Disturnal, K.C., and W. Allen for the landlord.

EARL LOREBURN.—My real and only difficulty in this case is that there has been a judgment of the Court of Appeal for which I and all your Lordships entertain the greatest respect, and, although to my mind the thing seems plain, I cannot help having my judgment arrested by the reflection that it has appeared differently to those learned judges.

In this case, in an arbitration under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, the landlord claimed a sum of £744 for dilapidations against the tenant; the tenant disputed his liability, and the Court of Appeal decided that he was liable. Then the subject went under the statute to arbitration, and the arbitrator awarded that the costs of that litigation which I have already mentioned should be disposed of by the successful landlord and the unsuccessful tenant each paying his own costs. As regards the amount claimed for dilapidations, the arbitrator awarded the sum of £71 instead of the sum of £744 which had been demanded by the landlord. Then comes the order with regard to costs. The arbitrator directed that the landlord, although he had recovered £71 out of £744 which he claimed, should pay the costs of the arbitration and the costs of the award. The Divisional Court decided that that award could not be disturbed, but in the Court of Appeal the learned lords justices set aside that award. It was said by the Court of Appeal that it was wrong, in substance on the ground that the arbitrator was bound as regards costs by the same principles and rules as were applicable to a learned judge of the High Court. I do not wish to enter on the question what are the principles and rules which are binding on a judge of the High Court in regard to costs, although I must not be taken to assent to the statements that have been made as to that; but I do not enter on it because, with all respect, I do not see that the rules or practice of the learned judges have anything at all to do with this case. This case is regulated by an Act of Parliament of its own.

The Agricultural Holdings Act, to which I will not advert for a moment, contains two rules which I will not read at length; I will merely state in a sentence the substance of them. Schedule II, r. 14, says:

"The costs of and incidental to the arbitration and award shall be in the discretion of the arbitrator, who may direct to and by whom and in what manner these costs or any part thereof are to be paid";

and r. 15 says :

"The arbitrator shall, in awarding costs, take into consideration the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the claim of either party, either in respect of amount or otherwise."

That is the statutory discretion which is given to the arbitrator, and he has sworn in an affidavit that he did look at the statute; that he did consider that very thing, the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the claim, in coming to a decision as regards costs. The effect of those two rules is that, unless there is misconduct, which, of course, the court can always survey, the arbitrator cannot be overruled in regard to his discretion about costs, provided that he is acting in the exercise of his discretion and in a case arising within his jurisdiction. It is said that this order was not made in the exercise of his discretion. With all respect to counsel for the landlord, I think it was nothing else. It is said that it was not within his jurisdiction. I think the jurisdiction was intended for this particular class of case, and, to my mind, there is nothing more to be deprecated than placing a gloss on the quite simple language of an Act of Parliament by reference to other Acts which contain different language. There is the Arbitration Act, there is the Judicature Act, there is the Workmen's Compensation Act, to which reference has been made, each of which speaks about costs in its own language and makes its own rules. There are also rules to be observed by learned judges which speak for themselves. But this Act also speaks for itself, and it governs this case. In my view, there is no ground whatever for suggesting any misconduct at all in a legal or any other sense against the arbitrator, and I think that this is simply a case within that class which was intended to be decided by the arbitrator. Therefore, I think there was neither misconduct nor want of jurisdiction, and I think this judgment of the Court of Appeal ought to be reversed.

VISCOUNT HALDANE.—I agree. In this case, the landlord was virtually in the position of a plaintiff, and he has recovered a percentage out of a very large demand which he made, and the arbitrator, in the exercise of his discretion, has ordered him, although he succeeded as to a percentage, to pay the costs. The question is, was there power to make that order? Undoubtedly the words of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, taken as they stand and read as a plain man would read them, confer on the arbitrator that discretion; but the Court of Appeal has held that these general words, occurring in this particular statute, are to be interpreted by analogy to the interpretation which has been placed on the rules made under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act.

In the case of the rules which govern the procedure of the courts, it is said that the costs are to be in the discretion of the judge or the court, but the very scheme of the Judicature Acts is that there should be an appeal from the judge who awards the costs to a Court of Appeal. That Court of Appeal also may, therefore, have to exercise the discretion which the rule confers. The Court of Appeal has laid down the practice, which is a rule of practice and not of principle restricting legal power, that it will not interfere with a discretion exercised by a judge of first instance in a matter in which discretion is intrusted to him such as costs. But the Court of Appeal only applies that limitation of its powers in cases where the judge has acted, in exercising his discretion, on judicial principle and on the proper principle. There are many cases in which the Court of Appeal interferes with costs, and it is always free to interfere as regards costs if it thinks that the judge has exercised his judicial discretion in a fashion that is not in accordance with settled principle. That is a very different thing from a case such as we have under this statute. The Court of Appeal seems to have first of all construed the statute by

A analogy to the rules of procedure to which I have referred—an analogy which is a misleading one, because it is not a case in which a court is sitting to entertain an ordinary appeal. This very view is put in the judgments in another form, which appears most definitely in WARRINGTON, L.J.'s, judgment, and that is that the words conferring the discretion are so construed that no difficulty arises from the fact that there is no appeal, because it was ultra vires to act in the manner in B which the arbitrator in this case has acted. He has, it is said, dealt with matters which he had no power to deal with because of an implied limitation, derived from the practice of the Supreme Court, which ought to be read into the words used.
I again say that, for the reasons I have already given, I see no ground for reading in any such limitation. Even if you did read in the only limitation of the kind which I know of, it would not help in this case. This is an instance in which C the plaintiff is being deprived of his costs, a very different thing from making a defendant who has been completely successful in resisting the action pay the costs.
There is authority for saying that, under the unwritten practice of the old court of Chancery, and, I should think, of the old courts of common law too, the courts did not treat themselves as having jurisdiction to order a completely successful defendant to pay the costs. But I know of no authority, and certainly Cooper D v. Whittingham (1), which was cited, is not adequate authority on the point, for saying that a plaintiff may not be made to pay the costs of an action even although he succeeds in a part of his claim.

Reliance was placed in the argument on Foster v. Great Western Rail. Co. (2).
That was a remarkable case in many ways, and it may, or may not, have been rightly decided; it is not necessary for us to consider that here, for there were E peculiar circumstances in the case. But, to begin with, it was a case in which the defendants, who had completely succeeded, were ordered by the commission to pay the costs, and the Court of Appeal thought there was no jurisdiction to do that. If the only ground of the decision in that case had been the broad one that was put forward, I should have thought it necessary to examine the reasons given for the judgment and to have asked the question whether BOWEN, J., had not F taken the true view when, in the Divisional Court, he decided, what the Court of Appeal overruled, that the discretion which was conferred on the commissioners by the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, was unfettered and bore no analogy to any rules of procedure in courts where there was an appeal. But there were other circumstances in the case which may, or may not, have sufficiently afforded a reason for saying that it was one where the commissioners had no jurisdiction.
G Certainly, so far as general expressions which are used in the judgments, both of BRETT, L.J., and COTTON, L.J., are to the effect that general words of discretion occurring in a statute which gives the commissioners or an arbitrator power to award costs are to be cut down by importing limitations derived from the analogy of courts of law, I should desire to guard myself against being supposed to give my approval to any such doctrine. When the Act of Parliament says that an H arbitrator is to have full discretion as to costs, I think the Act of Parliament must be taken to mean what it says. It is not the case of giving jurisdiction to an ordinary court from which there is an appeal, and as to which there might be a review of the mode in which the discretion has been exercised contrary to some settled principle which governs the practice of the court. It is a case of purely I statutory proceeding, and outside the limits of the statute you cannot go. For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was wrong.

LORD ATKINSON.—I agree, and I have very little to add. In this case the only litigant was the landlord, because the tenant's claim was admitted and practically agreed on, and, therefore, he was the cause of all the litigation that ensued, and, having put forward a claim for £744, he succeeded in establishing £71.

The case has been argued as if you should import into Sched. II, r. 14 to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, after the words "the costs of and incidental to the arbitration and award shall be in the discretion of the arbitrator, who may direct to and by whom and in what manner these costs or any part thereof are to be paid," the words "according to the principles prevailing in the superior courts." The whole argument has been on that ground; it is to import those words as to the practice and rules of the superior courts in dealing with costs into this statute, which is couched in general language; and, having adopted that construction, counsel for the landlord goes on to argue that, as regards the words in r. 15, "the arbitrator shall, in awarding costs, take into consideration the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the claim of either party," the reasonableness or unreasonableness can only be taken into consideration in depriving a person of costs, which costs he would get under the rules of the superior courts. It does not seem to me that there is any authority for making that limitation. The words are general. They cannot be limited in the way suggested, and they afford an entire warrant, in my judgment, to the arbitrator for visiting with costs a plaintiff who persists in maintaining an extravagant and unreasonable demand. That is what the arbitrator has found has been done in this case, and, when a claim of that character has been made the subject for consideration, it is obvious that some effect must be given to those words "the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the claim." The effect that the arbitrator has given to them is to make this litigant pay costs. I think that was perfectly legitimate. I do not think there is anything whatever in the statute itself to justify the limitation that has been contended for.

My noble and learned friend who has preceded me has already pointed out that Foster v. Great Western Rail. Co. (2) is no authority whatever for the proposition that a plaintiff, though successful in a small degree, may not be made to pay the costs of the defendant. Visiting a successful defendant with costs is an entirely different thing, because, if he be successful, he succeeds along the whole line. For these reasons, and for the reasons which have been given by my noble and learned friends who have preceded me, I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal was wrong and should be reversed.

LORD SHAW.—I agree with all your Lordships, and I have but few words to add. I think the Act of Parliament in the present case is singularly plain. It does not confine itself to a declaration that the arbitrator shall have a discretion. Had it done so, probably the result of the appeal to-day might have been the same; but, after stating the discretion in the arbitrator, it proceeds to say what this arbitrator charged with the discretion may do. It expressly declares in Sched. II, r. 14, to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1908, that he "may direct to and by whom and in what manner these costs or any part thereof are to be paid," and in r. 15 it declares that he "shall, in awarding costs, take into consideration the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the claim." Confronted with an Act of Parliament so comprehensive and almost so peremptory, I decline respectfully to follow the proposition that you must import into it, for the purpose of restricting or limiting the terms, certain rules derived from the common law of England or the practice of the superior courts with reference to the discretion vested in judges.

Foster v. Great Western Rail. Co. (2) has been cited, and I must express a certain surprise at the judgment of the Court of Appeal in regard to it. If Foster's Case (2) be fully analysed, it will be found that that case, even if it were admissible in the present on the argument of analogy, which I decline to follow, would be an authority in favour of the tenant and not in favour of the landlord. It was, in my view, apprehended in that sense by the learned Lord Chief Justice (LORD READING), because, after dealing with Foster's Case (2) and the rules applicable to the High Court of Justice, he sums up the proposition in this form ([1916] 2 K.B. at p. 358):

"You may, nevertheless, make the person who invokes the assistance of the court pay the costs notwithstanding that he is successful."

Applying that language to this case, I ask myself what more has the arbitrator

A here done than to make the claimant who invoked his assistance pay the costs, notwithstanding that he was successful. I look to Foster's Case (2) as no authority in favour of the landlord.

But I have a second object in citing that case; it is that I may adopt for present use the general proposition on this part of the law laid down by the late LORD BOWEN. He expressed himself in this language (8 Q.B.D. at p. 29):

B "It appears to us that in establishing an extraordinary tribunal of the kind the legislature have in plain terms conferred upon them a wide discretion as to the manner in which they should deal with all questions of costs arising before them, and, provided that their decisions on such matters are bona fide, it is not for a court of law to examine the principle upon which such decisions are based."

C I think this view entirely sound, and that it applies a fortiori to the case of an arbitrator. May I venture to say again that I decline to import into the terms of a statute so plain and so comprehensive any restriction or limitation derived from the general law of England, or any analogy between the position of an arbitrator and that of a judge. Analogies are dangerous. Why an analogy with a judge in a court of law? I might as well be asked to import an analogy between the discretion exercised by the pilot or the captain of a ship, or the discretion exercised by an auctioneer who is expressly elected to be judge in a sale. In regard to the actings of an arbitrator, whether under the Agricultural Holdings Act or otherwise, two things especially were in the view of the legislature—namely, first, finality; and, secondly, promptitude. The special danger of analogies with the case of a judge is particularly this, that, in the exercise of judicial discretion, there may be appeal from court to court. At this moment there is an appeal before this House depending on the question of an exercise of judicial discretion, and to import the analogy of any such appeal to a court of law as against the discretion exercised by an arbitrator would be to destroy the whole virtue of that finality which it was the object of the legislature to attain.

F In conclusion, I would only say that the view expressed by LORD COLERIDGE, J., with regard to what the arbitrator had done in this case is exactly the view which I myself have adopted. I think, to use his Lordship's language ([1916] 1 K.B. at p. 459), that

G "a very exorbitant claim was made, and it may be that the arbitrator might reasonably think that the arbitration was practically forced upon the tenant by its unreasonableness, and that if a reasonable claim had been put forward no arbitration would have resulted. If that be the case, then the discretion given him by the Agricultural Holdings Act would seem to be ample to enable him to do what he has done."

Appeal allowed.

D Appeal by defendants from an order of the Divisional Court (LUSH and ATKIN, JJ.) directing that there should be a new trial.

F. Newbolt, K.C. (H. J. Turrell with him) for the plaintiffs.—There is a preliminary objection to the hearing of this appeal, which in its nature is final and not interlocutory, and has therefore been entered in the wrong list.

E R. V. Bankes, K.C., and J. Flowers, for the defendants, were not called on to argue.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—The preliminary point has been taken that this appeal has been wrongly entered in the interlocutory list. The plaintiffs brought the present action in the City of London Court, where the deputy judge gave judgment for the defendants. From that decision the plaintiffs appealed to the Divisional Court, who discharged the judgment and ordered a new trial. The present appeal was brought from that decision. The question turns upon what is the proper construction to put upon Ord. 58, r. 15, which deals with the time for bringing appeals. Rule 15 is as follows :

G “Subject and without prejudice to the powers of the Court of Appeal under Ord. 64, r. 7, no appeal to the Court of Appeal from any interlocutory order, or from any order, whether final or interlocutory, in any matter not being an action, shall be brought after the expiration of fourteen days, and no other appeal shall be brought after the expiration of six weeks unless the court or a judge, at the time of making the order or at any time subsequently or the Court of Appeal shall enlarge the time. . . .”

H We have to determine whether the order under appeal is interlocutory or not. In my opinion, this is an interlocutory order; it does not finally dispose of the matters in litigation or the rights of the parties. No order directing a new trial of the matters in dispute can in its nature be a final order finally determining the rights of the parties, so that apart from authority I should have no difficulty in deciding that this was an interlocutory order. How do the authorities stand?

I Bozson v. Altrincham U.D.C. (1) was an appeal by the plaintiff from an order of WILLS, J. The facts shortly were these. An order had been made in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract that the questions of liability and breach of contract only were to be tried, and that the rest of the case, if any, was to go to an official referee. At the trial the learned judge held that there was no binding contract between the parties, and made an order dismissing the action, upon which judgment was entered for the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed. Manifestly, on the facts, it was an appeal from a final judgment, which, unless reversed on appeal, finally decided the rights of the parties. The EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., said ([1903] 1 K.B. at p. 548):

"I think the order appealed from was a final order, and the appeal is therefore brought within the prescribed time."

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., said (ibid.):

"It seems to me that the real test for determining this question ought to be this: Does the judgment or order, as made, finally dispose of the rights of the parties? If it does, then I think it ought to be treated as a final order; but if it does not, it is then, in my opinion, an interlocutory order."

Applying the test there laid down, I think the order which is appealed from in the present case is an interlocutory order.

Two earlier cases have been cited to us which, it is said, are difficult to reconcile with Bozson v. Altrincham U.D.C. (1). In Shubrook v. Tufnell (2), which was a Case stated for the opinion of the court, the plaintiff, who was a lessee of two houses, brought an action against the lessor to recover damages for structural damage caused to them by the defendant making a drain through adjoining land. The action was referred to arbitration, and the arbitrator stated a Case which only raised a point of law. In the Case so stated, if the defendant won the decision would finally dispose of the rights of the parties, but if the plaintiff won it would not, as the Case would have to go back to the arbitrator. The Divisional Court decided in favour of the plaintiff and referred the case back to the arbitrator. On appeal to the Court of Appeal the question arose whether the appeal was final or not. JESSEL, M.R., in giving judgment, said that his attention had been called to Collins v. Paddington Vestry (3), and he continued as follows (9 Q.B.D. at p. 623):

"The first clause of the headnote is too wide; the court did not decide the general proposition there laid down, but only held that where the decision of the court on the point submitted to it could not in any event necessitate the entering of final judgment for either party, the decision was interlocutory."

That explained the true effect of the decision in Collins v. Paddington Vestry (3); and he went on to add:

"Here, if we differ from the court below, final judgment has to be entered for the defendant, and there is an end of the action."

The effect of that decision is this, that if as the result of the appeal final judgment may be entered for either party, it is a final order. In Salman v. Warner (4), it was held that a "final order" was one made on such an application or proceeding that, for whichever side the decision was given, it would, if it stood, finally determine the matter in litigation. If the decision finally determines the matter, then neither of the two last-mentioned cases seems quite consistent with Bozson v. Altrincham U.D.C. (1), which puts the matter upon the true footing, namely, that what you must look to is the order under appeal. In the present case I am of opinion that the order is clearly an interlocutory order, and that the appeal has been properly entered in the interlocutory list.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Looking at Shubrook v. Tufnell (2), if the decision of the Court of Appeal is to make it a final decision, then the order under appeal is a final order, but Salman v. Warner (4) decided that the order was only final if it finally determined the matter in litigation, which ever side the decision was given. In Bozson v. Altrincham U.D.C. (1) the Court of Appeal declined to follow the decision in Salman v. Warner (4), and said that they preferred to follow the earlier decision of Shubrook v. Tufnell (2), but I do not think that they quite followed it. Thus LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., said this ([1903] 1 K.B. at p. 548):

"It seems to me that the real test for determining this question ought to be this: Does the judgment or order, as made, finally dispose of the right of the parties?"

In the present case it seems to me that the order which is appealed from does not finally determine the rights of the parties, and, therefore, this is an appeal from an interlocutory order and not from a final order.

BANKES, L.J. —I agree.

The appeal was then heard.

R. V. Bankes, K.C., and J. Flowers for the defendants.

F. Newbolt, K.C., and H. J. Turrell for the plaintiffs.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J. The plaintiffs sued the defendant, Harry Salbstein, and Edith his wife, and contended that these defendants are, or one of them is, liable for the sum of £20 16s. 2d., being the balance which the plaintiffs say is due to them in respect of a contract for the sale of lemons, which contract was broken by the defendants. The plaintiffs' case is that they put up for sale by auction 138 cases of lemons which were knocked down to the defendant Harry Salbstein, but that he did not complete the purchase, with the result that there is a claim against him for £20 16s. 2d. in respect of these goods. It is in dispute who the person was for whom the goods were in fact purchased. The deputy-judge of the City of London Court held that the plaintiffs had failed to make out their case. There had been a previous action for the same sum of money in June, 1914. The plaintiffs in that action were the same as in the present action, but the defendants were a firm named Salbstein Bros. The writ which was issued against them was served upon Julius Salbstein, who was alleged to be a partner in Salbstein Bros. No appearance was entered, and judgment in default of appearance was recovered against Salbstein Bros. Execution was issued in due course, and certain goods were seized under a writ of fi fa. Joseph Salbstein put forward a claim against these goods and there were interpleader proceedings in which Joseph Salbstein maintained his claim, and he recovered damages for trespass, but the judgment which had been recovered against Salbstein Bros. still remained unsatisfied, and it is not agreed whether there was such a firm as Salbstein Bros. at all.

The defence which was relied upon in the City of London Court was that the plaintiffs had already recovered judgment against some persons other than the defendants, and that any cause of action which they might have had against the defendants had thereby become merged. But a judgment recovered against one of several joint debtors cannot be pleaded as a defence to a subsequent action against another joint debtor in respect of the same cause unless the plea shows that the judgment was recovered on a ground which operated as a discharge at all: Phillips v. Ward (5). Here it is not shown that there was such a firm as Salbstein Bros. in existence at the time when the alleged debt was contracted or when the writ in the first action was issued or the judgment in that action was signed in default of appearance. The plaintiffs allege in the affidavits which were used before the deputy-judge that there were admissions to the effect that no such firm as Salbstein Bros. was in existence. On the other hand, the defendants deny that those affidavits were put in as admissions at all or that they were referred to in the county court. I think it is sufficient for the purposes of this case to say that, the burden of proof being upon the defendants, they did not adduce any evidence upon the point. If the defendant Harry Salbstein had established that the firm of Salbstein was in existence at the material times and that he was a partner in that firm and that any obligation of the partners was a joint obligation on behalf of the firm, it would have afforded a complete defence to the action. Again, if it had been shown that the plaintiffs, having a right of election between the parties, had sued one party and had recovered judgment, an action against the other party would be thereby barred. Again, if the defendants or either of them had been jointly liable with a real firm of Salbstein Bros., this would have been a good defence to this action. A

In King v. Hoare (6) it was decided that a judgment recovered against one of two joint debtors was a bar to an action against the other. PARKE, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, said (13 M. & W. at pp. 503, 504):

"The matters of form being disposed of, the question is reduced to one of substance, whether a judgment recovered against one of two joint contractors is a bar to an action against another. It is remarkable that this question should never have been actually decided in the courts of this country. There have been, apparently, conflicting dicta upon it. LORD TENTERDEN, in the case of Walters v. Smith (7) (2 B. & Ad. at p. 892) is reported to have said that a mere judgment against one would not be a defence for another. My brother MAULE stated in that of Bell v. Banks (8) (3 Man. & G. at p. 267) that a security by one of two joint debtors would merge the remedy against both. In the case of Lechmere v. Fletcher (9) (1 Cr. & M. at p. 634) BAYLEY, B., strongly intimates the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, that the judgment against one was a bar for both of two joint debtors, though the point was not actually ruled, as the case did not require it. In the absence of any positive authority upon the precise question we must decide it upon principle and by analogy to other authorities, and we feel no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the plea is good. If there be a breach of contract, or wrong done, or any other cause of action by one against another, and judgment be recovered in a court of record, the judgment is a bar to the original cause of action, because it is thereby reduced to a certainty, and the object of the suit attained, so far as it can be at that stage, and it would be useless and vexatious to subject the defendant to another suit for the purpose of obtaining the same result. Hence the legal maxim, transit in rem judicatam—the cause of action is changed into matter of record, which is of a higher nature, and the inferior remedy is merged in the higher." B C D E

This case was adopted and approved by the House of Lords in Kendall v. Hamilton (10). EARL CAIRNS, L.C., there pointed out that the result did not necessarily depend upon an election between two courses, which would imply that, in order to an election, the fact of both courses being open was known, but was because the right of action could not, after judgment obtained, co-exist with a right of action on the same facts against another person. The ground upon which the rule is founded "is the right of persons jointly liable to pay a debt to insist on being sued together." This was the principle contended for by counsel in King v. Hoare (6) and as expressed by PARKE, B. (13 M. & W. at p. 501): F G

"The principle is that a person who enters into a joint contract has a right to say he will not be sued but with his co-contractor, and the plaintiff by his act cannot deprive him of that right." E

But where the obligation binds two or more persons severally a judgment against one is no bar to an action against another. In Lechmere v. Fletcher (9) BAYLEY, B., states the case thus (1 Cr. & M. at p. 635):

"There are many cases in the books as to joint and several bonds, from which it appears that, though you have entered judgment on a joint and several bond against one obligor, you are still at liberty to sue the other, unless indeed the judgment has been satisfied; but so long as any part of the demand remains due you are at liberty to sue the other, notwithstanding you have obtained judgment against one. This, I think, establishes the principle that where there is a joint obligation and a separate one also you do not by recovering judgment against one preclude yourself from suing the other." I

That statement was recognised by PARKE, B., in King v. Hoare (6). If, then, the law is as it has been stated by the learned judges to whom I have just referred, I can see no ground for saying that where an action is brought in error against a fictitious person, or against a person who is not under any liability, it is a bar to an action against the person who is alleged to be in fact liable, the cause of action in each case being the same.

For the defendants it was contended that if a person who had sold goods to A. afterwards sued a stranger for the price, he could not recover, and in order to support this proposition reliance was placed upon Buckland v. Johnson (11) in the Court of Common Pleas, where MAULE, J., said this (15 C.B. at p. 166):

"The circumstance of the present defendant having been a joint converter, or a stranger, makes, I think, no difference. If he were a stranger, the plaintiff, having once recovered in respect of the same goods, cannot recover again the same thing against somebody else. There is an end of the transaction. Having once recovered a judgment, his remedy was altogether gone; his claim was satisfied as against all the world. He was, in fact, in the position of a person whose goods had never been converted at all."

I do not think that that case is an authority for the proposition put forward by the defendants; it is clearly distinguishable on the facts. It appears that in that case the defendant and his son had wrongfully converted the goods of the plaintiff by selling them, and that the proceeds of the sale were received by the defendant alone. The plaintiff, having the election, then sued the son and recovered a verdict for the value of the goods so converted, and the court held that the plaintiff, having made his election to sue for the tort and having recovered what the jury considered the value of the goods at the time of the conversion, could not afterwards bring the action against the father for money had and received. In my opinion, the decision of the Divisional Court was right and must be affirmed, and there must be a new trial of the action.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I agree. The contention put forward on behalf of the defendants is that, if a plaintiff has recovered judgment against a person who turns out not to be liable, that judgment is a bar to his suing the real purchaser of the goods. The decision of the county court judge went somewhat further than that. It has been pointed out that there was no evidence whether there was a firm of Salbstein Bros. in existence or not. They were the defendants against whom judgment had been obtained in the first action, and the learned judge decided that the judgment so obtained was a bar to the action against the defendants. I do not think that that decision can possibly be right, because a judgment against a firm which has no existence cannot operate as a bar to an action against the person or persons in fact liable. Assuming, however, there was such a firm as Salbstein Bros. and that judgment had been duly obtained against that firm, in my opinion, such a judgment cannot be a bar to an action against the person really liable unless it can be shown that he was a partner or in some way jointly liable with the firm. If the firm of Salbstein Bros. and the defendants are either of them liable they must be liable either jointly or severally or alternatively. If they are jointly liable it is well established that a judgment recovered against one is a bar to an action against the other, but if they are severally liable it is clear that it is not a bar, because the course of action is not the same. If there is a joint liability there is only one cause of action, and that becomes merged in the judgment; if the liability is several there are two causes of action and there is no merger. It is possible in this case that the firm of Salbstein Bros. are not liable and that the defendant and his wife are; it is, therefore, a case of several liability. If the defendants contracted to pay for the goods and Salbstein Bros. did not, the judgment which has been recovered against Salbstein Bros. cannot be a bar to an action against the defendants. Therefore, that contention fails. The next point which is taken is that the plaintiffs elected to sue Salbstein Bros. as principals, and that, having so elected, they cannot now sue the agents. If there was evidence to support that, it would be a good point, but there is no evidence one way or the other. If there was no firm of Salbstein Bros. in existence they could not, of course, be principals to anybody. For these reasons I am of opinion that the order made by the Divisional Court was right and that there must be a new trial.

BANKES, L.J., read the following judgment.—In the county court the defendants relied upon the fact that the plaintiffs had recovered judgment against Salbstein Bros. for the same sum of money for which they are being sued in this action. They did not attempt to set up either that the debt was a joint debt of themselves and Salbstein Bros. or that they acted as agents in the matter for Salbstein Bros. They were content to rest their defence upon the mere fact that judgment had been recovered, and they rested it upon the ground of the maxim transit in rem judicatam. The meaning of that maxim has been expounded by PARKER, B., in King v. Hoare (6) (13 M. & W. at p. 504). The case has been argued for the defendants upon the assumption that, in considering what any particular cause of action is which is, changed into matter of record, it is sufficient to consider the nature and amount of the plaintiff's claim only without any reference to the nature of the obligation on the part of the person or persons against whom it is sought to establish the claim.

In my opinion, this contention is not well founded. A definition of "cause of action" is given by BART, J., in Cooke v. Gill (12) where he says (L.R. 8 C.P. at p. 116):

"'Cause of action' has been held from the earliest time to mean every fact which is material to be proved to entitle the plaintiff to succeed—every fact which the defendant would have a right to traverse."

Some tests of whether a cause of action is the same in any two actions is referred to by BOWEN, L.J., in Brunsdon v. Humphrey (13) (14 Q.B.D. at p. 147). As illustrations of what I have said I may refer to the following instances: A. lends money to B. and C. jointly. Here there is only one cause of action; this is clear: see King v. Hoare (6) (13 M. & W. at p. 505); Re Hodgson, Beckett v. Ramsdale (14), 31 Ch.D. at p. 188, per BOWEN, L.J. So also where A. contracts with B. acting as agent for C., here also there is only one cause of action. In either case A. can only recover one judgment because he has only one cause of action. But if A. lends money to B. and C. for which they are jointly and severally liable, there are two causes of action. A. can recover judgment for the debt against B. and, if it is not satisfied, he can recover judgment for the same sum of money against C. The rule which enables him to do this appears to me to be the rule that the judgment against B. is no estoppel as against C. Consequently, the plaintiff is entitled to prove what the facts really are—namely, that he has a separate and distinct cause of action against C. arising out of the several contract.

If this test is applied to the present case, what ground is there for saying that the plaintiffs are not entitled to go into the facts and to show, if they can, that they have a cause of action against the defendants or either of them separate and distinct from any cause of action they may have had against Salbstein Bros.? One way in which the plaintiffs could do this would be by showing that Salbstein Bros. were a non-existent firm, or that, although when they issued the writ and recovered judgment by default they were under the impression that they had a right of action against Salbstein Bros., they had since discovered that they were mistaken, and that the defendants were their real debtors, and they had no real cause of action against Salbstein Bros. Apart, therefore, altogether from the proposition that the onus lies upon the defendants of establishing some ground for saying that the cause of action relied on has merged in a judgment, there is, in my opinion, no ground for suggesting that it is not open to the plaintiffs to prove, if they can, that the defendants are the persons really liable to them for this debt. It is said that, if this is the rule of law, a person may recover a number of judgments against different persons for the same sum of money. I see no great objection to this.

having regard to the fact that a plaintiff cannot receive the amount claimed more than once; and the objection is less, in my opinion, than the objection that the defendant should escape a just liability upon the ground that the plaintiff made a mistake as to the proper person to sue. We have been referred to a number of dicta of learned judges, but, when read in reference to the facts of the particular cases in which those dicta occur, nothing I have said is, in my opinion, in conflict with them. The deputy-judge decided the case upon the question of law submitted to him. I think that the case must go back to be tried on the facts.

Appeal dismissed.

MORRISON v. SHEFFIELD CORPORATION

[COURT OF APPEAL (Viscount Reading, C.J., Pickford and Scrutton, L.J.J.), Jul. 5, 1917]

Highway—Lighting—Duty of local authority—Duty to take reasonable care for safety of public in abnormal circumstances—Trees on highway surrounded by spiked guards—Street lighting subsequently prohibited under war-time regulations—Personal injury from collision with guard in darkness—Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict., c. 51), s. 43.

The defendants, an urban authority, acting under powers conferred on them by the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, planted some trees in the highway and erected spiked iron guards around them. When the guards were erected there was normal lighting in the highway and the guards were reasonably safe for the public. Subsequently, the chief constable made an order under the Defence of the Realm Regulations requiring street lights to be put out at a certain hour, and after the order came into effect the plaintiff, while walking along the highway in the darkness, collided with one of the iron guards and suffered injury. In an action for damages for negligence the jury found that the guard was dangerous in the darkness and that the defendants had failed to take reasonable measures to avoid the danger, and judgment was entered for the plaintiff. On appeal, Held: the defendants were under a continuing duty to take reasonable care to prevent the guards from being a danger to the public even when abnormal conditions prevailed; they were not absolved from their duty of care because of the altered conditions in the highway caused by the lighting order, and, accordingly, the verdict and judgment must stand.

Appeal by the defendants from a judgment of ROWLATT, J., who tried the action with a jury at Leeds. D

By s. 43 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890 :

"Any urban authority may, if they see fit, cause trees to be planted in any highway repairable by the inhabitants at large within their district, and may erect guards or fences for the protection of the same, provided that this power shall not be exercised nor shall any trees so planted be continued so as to hinder the reasonable use of the highway by the public or any person entitled to use the same. . . ." E

In 1902 the defendants, an urban authority, acting under the above powers, caused trees to be planted in various highways in Sheffield. The trees were protected with iron guards about 5 ft. 2½ in. high, the tops of the guards being bent outwards to prevent boys from climbing over the guards. By an order made under the Defence of the Realm Regulations, power was given to local authorities to regulate the lighting of their districts, and on April 3, 1916, the chief constable of Sheffield ordered all the street lights in Sheffield to be put out at a certain hour. On April 20, seventeen days after the order came into effect, the plaintiff at night, without negligence on his part, seriously injured his eye by coming into contact with one of these tree guards. The particulars of the negligence alleged were as follow. (a) Maintaining on the causeway an erection with prongs or spikes in the position and at the elevation of the fence complained of. (b) Leaving the erection in such a position wholly unlighted or insufficiently lighted. (c) Omitting to paint the guard with luminous paint or white paint. (d) Taking no steps or precautions whatever to prevent the erection from being a danger to persons using the highway. The statement of claim alleged both nuisance and negligence, but the following questions were put to the jury on negligence only : (i) Was the guard dangerous in the circumstances of the darkness that existed? (ii) Ought the defendants, if they exercised reasonable foresight, to have taken reasonable measures to have neutralised the danger before the date of the accident? The jury answered both these questions in the affirmative, and awarded the plaintiff £660 damages. ROWLATT, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendants appealed. For the defendants it was contended that no duty lay on them to make the tree guards reasonably safe in the abnormal circumstances arising from the making of the lighting order. The plaintiff contended that the defendants were under a duty to take care to make the streets reasonably safe in all circumstances. F

VISCOUNT READING, C.J., having stated the facts and referred to the questions put to the jury, continued : The defendants have appealed to this court on the ground that there was no evidence to justify the verdict of the jury, inasmuch as there was no evidence of want of care by the defendants, or of any nuisance committed by them; and it is argued that the learned judge ought to have entered judgment for the defendants at the end of the plaintiff's case, or at the end of I

A the defendant's case, because it had not been shown that the defendants had committed any breach of duty. The basis of that argument is that the trees were planted, and the guards erected round them, by virtue of statutory authority; and reliance was placed for this purpose upon s. 43 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890, which gives power to an urban authority, if they see fit, to cause trees to be planted in a highway, and to erect guards or fences for the protection

B of the same,

"provided that this power shall not be exercised nor shall any trees so planted be continued so as to hinder the reasonable use of the highway by the public or any person entitled to use the same, or so as to become a nuisance or injurious to any adjacent owner or occupier."

C The defendants contend that, having erected the guard round the trees, at times and in circumstances when it cannot be contended that they were not reasonably safe and so placed for the protection of the public, no further duty is imposed upon the defendants, because of the order issued by the chief constable, which plunged the city into darkness—that is really the substantial point in the case. The defendants could not contend, and of course their senior counsel has not contended,

D that when authority is given by statute to place a tree or a guard in a public highway there is not equally an obligation upon the public authority to whom the powers are granted to exercise those powers with reasonable care, having regard to the reasonable protection which the public is entitled to expect. No question arises with regard to this general principle of law, which is applicable to the exercise of any public authority of permissive powers which may be granted by

E statute. But it is contended that when, as in this case, it cannot be suggested that there was a nuisance or want of reasonable care on the part of the defendants in the normal conditions and in the circumstances which existed before the order of April 3 was issued by the chief constable, a greater duty is not imposed upon them, nor has a duty been created which makes it necessary for them to take further precaution during the currency of this order. I am unable to accept that

F view of the law. In my judgment, the obligation upon the defendants continues throughout the time that they are maintaining these trees and guards in the public highway. There is no duty upon them to keep them absolutely safe; but there is a duty upon them to use the statutory authorisation which has been given them with reasonable care; and they are not entitled to allow these guards to continue in such a way as to make them dangerous to the public who are using

G the highway. Whether or not they have taken reasonable precaution for the protection of the public after the new condition of things arose is, of course, a matter for the jury. Whether or not the defendants had the time, having regard to the seventeen days which had elapsed between the date of the order and the date of the accident, to make the changes or to take the precautions which would be necessary is again a matter for the jury. I am not prepared to say that I should

H have arrived at the same conclusion. But that is not the question before us. If there is a duty upon the defendants to take reasonable care in the circumstances which I have described, and to see that the guard was not dangerous in the circumstances of the darkness that existed on April 20, the date of the accident, it becomes a question of degree as to what amount of care ought to be exercised; and that must be a question which the jury must determine; and I am not prepared to say that

I there is no evidence upon which they could come to the conclusion that the defendants had omitted to take the proper precautions.

We have had to consider during the course of the argument Great Central Rail. Co. v. Hewlett (1), although, as counsel for the defendants has told us, he does not suggest that this case is an authority in his favour; and upon examination it is abundantly plain that it does not go so far as the contention which is put forward on behalf of the defendants here. There a gateway had been erected with posts by the Great Central Railway Co. in the Marylebone Road, for the purpose of protecting the ingress and egress to and from their station. After the orders had come into force which necessitated a darkness with which we have become familiar, at any rate during part of the war, a taxi-cab driver drove into the gate and was injured; and it was contended that the defendants ought to have put some kind of guard, a light, if it would have been allowed, or else painted the gate white in outline, or have painted some portion to have indicated to the driver that there was a gate at this particular place. The House of Lords held that in that case there was no duty upon the defendant, the Great Central Railway Co., because Parliament had by statute permitted the Great Central Railway Co. to keep the gateway and post where it had been erected, and Parliament having once done that, the House of Lords held that it could not be said that there was any obligation upon the defendants to do anything else; that all that Parliament had done was to give them authority to preserve and continue a thing where it actually was; and that being so, that no action would lie for negligence against the railway company in the circumstances which I have indicated. The general principle of law to which I have adverted was nowhere in controversy. As LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON says in his speech (post p. 1029):

"it is undoubtedly a well-settled principle of law that when statutory powers are conferred they must be exercised with reasonable care, so that if those who exercise them could by reasonable precaution have prevented an injury which has been occasioned, and was likely to be occasioned by their exercise, damage for negligence may be recovered."

Now here, although that principle is not in controversy, it is said that it has no application to the present case. That is where I differ from the argument that has been put by senior counsel for the defendants. I have come to the conclusion that the duty was a continuing one; that the degree of care that was required was not exhausted by erecting the fence around the tree in such a way as to be reasonably safe for the protection of the public at the time of its erection. In my view, the public authority to whom this permissive power has been given continued under the duty so as to keep that guard that it would not be a danger to the public passing along this public highway. I am not unmindful of the argument of counsel and of the obligation that this principle may be imposing upon public authorities during times of great stress and emergency, when abnormal conditions prevail, and when there are undoubtedly exceptional orders which are frequently issued and continued in force. But I cannot think that that abnormal state of things can absolve the defendants from the duty placed upon them as a public authority to use their powers in such a way as to be reasonably safe for the public. For this reason I come to the conclusion that the view taken by the learned judge was right, that it became a question of fact for the jury as to whether reasonable care had been exercised and as to whether the guard was dangerous in the circumstances; and the jury having found the answer in the affirmative to both of them, the result must be that the verdict and judgment must stand.

I desire only to add that we have had considerable argument as to whether or not the point was open to the plaintiff that the condition of the guard was that it was some 3½ in. out of plumb, that it was only 5 ft. 2½ in. from the ground, with the result that the point which would, according to the construction, protrude 3 in. from the guard almost at right angles, protruded in this particular case 6½ in. Whether that was open to the plaintiff or not in the particular case, it becomes unnecessary to say; but I am inclined to the view that in the way in which the case was conducted the plaintiff had taken his stand upon the points which were actually put to the learned judge. Certainly that was the learned judge's view in the summing-up, because he left no question as to the normal condition before the lighting order came into effect. It is unnecessary to say any more than that about it, for the reason that I have come to the conclusion that the verdict and judgment must stand.

A PICKFORD, L.J.—I agree. The tree and the guard were erected under the statutory powers of s. 43 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1890; and, therefore, the putting of them there was right; but they had to be put there, and they had to be kept there, in my opinion, in such a way as not to be a danger to the public, or at any rate, to put it more correctly, the defendants had to take reasonable care that they should not be a danger to the public. They were not a danger to the public in ordinary times when the lighting was ordinary; and I do not think any case was made that they were. I see no reason for thinking that they were. The minute point with regard to their being out of cant of three inches, the result of which was that anybody walking along the street would come into collision with this guard three inches sooner than he otherwise would have done, and the particular discussion as to the height, in my opinion, have very little, if any, importance.

C I start with this, that the guard as put there was safe under ordinary conditions. The conditions changed; and the point is whether, having put the guard there safe under ordinary conditions, there was no further obligation upon the defendants at all, and that in any change of conditions they were at liberty to allow it to remain exactly as it was and to take no care to prevent it being dangerous under the altered conditions. That is the principal proposition put before us, and, in my opinion, it is too broad. I think that under circumstances like these, if the conditions alter, there is an obligation on the persons who put the guard there to see that it is not a danger under the altered conditions. The lighting order came into existence suddenly; it was an order indeterminate in length. There is nothing to show that the defendants had reason to think that it would last a short time or a long time. A very short time, seventeen days, had elapsed from this sudden order to the time when the accident happened. All these things ought to be considered, because they were put to the jury by the learned judge. It may be that the conclusion that I should have come to would have been that no want of reasonable care was made out. But that was a question for the jury, and we are not asked to set the verdict aside on the ground of its being against the weight of evidence. If the jury, considering all those things—considering the time, the opportunity that there was to take some precaution, and considering that no precautions were taken at all, and considering that some precautions might have avoided this accident—came to the conclusion that there was a want of reasonable care, then I do not think we can say that there was no evidence upon which they could act. There being the obligation which I have endeavoured to express, it is stated that the decision would cast a very great burden upon public authorities. It may be so. We cannot help that, if it is the law. It is said that it would involve this, that they must take precautions to light or to guard or to paint or do something to every lamp post and every tramway post, every kerb stone and everything else in their district. I venture to think that it does not impose any such obligation. It imposes an obligation to do what is reasonable; and it is not reasonable to suppose that they would have to take precautions against every possible sort of accident. It does not impose any such obligation as that upon them. It simply imposes an obligation to take reasonable care that, under these conditions, the altered conditions, what they have put in the roadway shall not be a nuisance and a danger. All these things would be for the jury to consider, in the case of any complaint against the defendants for not having taken precautions in any particular instance. In this particular instance, I think, there was evidence upon which the jury could act, although it was not great; and as to the real point whether there was this obligation or not, I think this appeal should be dismissed.

SCRUTTON, L.J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

HILL v. SETTLE

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Warrington, L.J., and A. T. Lawrence, J.), January 18, 1917]

Bankruptcy—Property available for distribution—After-acquired property—"Intervention" by trustee—Notice in general terms requiring payment to trustee of all sums becoming due to bankrupt—Vesting of property in trustee—Power of trustee to withdraw notice—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59), s. 47 (1).

A notice, dated Oct. 26, 1915, and served on the defendant by the official receiver as trustee in the bankruptcy of J. R. H., was in the following terms: "Re J. R. H.—I beg to give you notice that I require payment to be made by you to me of all moneys which may now and hereafter be and become due from you to the bankrupt, on the ground that he has not obtained his discharge in the proceedings." On July 31, 1916, the official receiver wrote to the defendant a letter in which he said: "As there are disputes between [the bankrupt and the defendant] as to the facts, and I have no knowledge of what the true facts or position is, I am advised that my proper course is to withdraw the notice I gave to [the defendant] on Oct. 26, 1915, and I withdraw such notice accordingly."

Held: (i) although the notice of Oct. 26, 1915, was in general terms and did not specify with particularity the debts which might become due from the defendant to the bankrupt it unmistakably manifested what was the trustee's intention, and, therefore, it was a good notice and constituted a valid "intervention" by the trustee within s. 47 (1) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (2 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 321), which was effective to vest in the trustee the after-acquired property in question; (ii) the notice of Oct. 26, 1915, having absolutely and indefeasibly vested the property in the trustee, the trustee, by the letter of July 31, 1916, could not withdraw that notice and re-vest the property in the bankrupt.

- C LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This appeal raises a curious and important point. The bankrupt, Hill, was adjudicated bankrupt on Dec. 19, 1908. He has never obtained his discharge, and the official receiver is the trustee in his bankruptcy. According to the statement of claim, in 1913 the bankrupt entered into partnership with the defendant to carry on the profession of physicians and surgeons for a period of five years. In the same year there was a further agreement, by which the defendant agreed to carry on the business alone and to give the bankrupt half the profits. On Oct. 26, 1915, the official receiver, as trustee in bankruptcy, served the following notice in writing upon the defendant:

E "Re John Robert Hill.—As official receiver and trustee of the estate of John Robert Hill, described as of 456, Attercliffe Road, Sheffield, surgeon, I beg to give you notice that I require payment to be made by you to me of all moneys which may now and hereafter be and become due from you to the bankrupt, on the ground that he has not obtained his discharge in the proceedings."

F That notice was given to the defendant, who himself informed the bankrupt of this intervention, as appears by a letter of Oct. 31, 1915. On Mar. 13, 1916, the writ in this action was issued. The statement of claim was delivered in May, and on July 7 the defendant made an application to stay the proceedings until the trustee in bankruptcy was made a party to the action, because, in his view, the trustee would be entitled to any money which might become due from the defendant to the bankrupt. On July 31, 1916, the official receiver wrote this letter:

G "Referring to the action commenced by the bankrupt against Dr. Settle and the order made staying proceedings in the action until I was made a party, as there are disputes between the parties as to the facts, and I have no knowledge of what the true facts or position is, I am advised that my proper course is to withdraw the notice I gave Dr. Settle on Oct. 26, 1915, and I withdraw such notice accordingly."

H In fact, no order for a stay had been made. The matter came before EVE, J., on the adjournment into court of the summons which had been before the master.

The learned judge dealt with two points. He first of all dealt with the notice of Oct. 26, 1915, which I will call the intervention of that date, and he said that, in his view, that intervention was complete, and that as long as it was in force it prevented the plaintiff from maintaining his action. The learned judge said in his judgment:

I "The first question to be determined is: Did the trustee intervene in such a way as to bring about these results? In my opinion, he did. The position of the trustee as to these moneys, which represented after acquired property of the bankrupt, was that he might either claim them as assets vested in him as trustee, or he might, if he thought fit, allow the bankrupt to receive and use them for his own purposes, just as if he were free from the disadvantages of being an undischarged bankrupt. A trustee who adopts the latter course runs the risk of being called upon to justify his conduct by his cestuis que trust, the creditors of the bankrupt, and this no doubt is an important factor in determining his course of conduct. When he has once made it clear that it is his intention to intervene and to assert his paramount title to the property, the bankrupt is disqualified from giving a valid receipt for and from maintaining an action to recover such property. So long as the trustee's intention is unmistakably manifested it is, in my opinion, immaterial how it is manifested, and in this case I hold that the notice of October, 1915, constituted an effectual intervention by the trustee and disqualified the bankrupt from instituting this action or giving a valid receipt for the moneys claimed in the writ."

I think that that part of the judgment is perfectly right. I cannot assent to the point strenuously argued by counsel for the bankrupt that there is something in this notice so vague and uncertain as to prevent it from being an intervention, which I must afterwards endeavour more carefully to explain. I think that it is a perfectly good notice. There was some money alleged to be due from the defendant to the bankrupt. The statement of claim showed that what the bankrupt was claiming was this: "There is a sum of money due from you, the defendant, to me arising out of partnership transactions and the subsequent agreement which terminated the partnership." I cannot see that there is any reason to hold that the notice is bad because it does not specify more particularly the nature of the debts which may become due. I think that it is a perfectly good notice, and that it would be technical and beyond all reason to say that it is not a good notice because you cannot tell the nature of the debts which are sought to be charged. The generality of the claim for "all moneys which may now and hereafter be and become due" cannot be complained of. It is not a claim for all future assets; it is not general in that sense, but it is simply saying, "I intervene in respect of moneys becoming due from you, Settle, to the bankrupt." I think, therefore, that the commencement of the proceedings by the official receiver was right.

Then the official receiver purported to withdraw the intervention by the letter of July 31, 1916, which I have referred to. It is remarkable that this action was commenced at a time when the notice of intervention was in force and had not been withdrawn. My present view is that upon that ground alone the action must fail as long as the intervention is in force. As the learned judge in the court below said:

"I hold that the notice of October, 1915, constituted an effectual intervention by the trustee and disqualified the bankrupt from instituting this action or giving a valid receipt for the moneys claimed in the writ."

The learned judge, however, based his decision on a second point. He said that the trustee had a right to withdraw that notice and that the effect of withdrawal was to undo the intervention which had taken place.

It is necessary to consider somewhat carefully what is the law upon matters of this kind. Under s. 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 [corresponding to s. 38 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914] all the property belonging to or vested in the bankrupt, or acquired by him or devolving upon him before his discharge is vested in the trustee. After-acquired property, according to the language of the statute, is vested in him. By a long series of authorities, which it is quite impossible, I think, for any court to review, it was held that that vesting could not be interpreted in the strict and full sense of the term. As long as the trustee did not intervene, the bankrupt himself had power to enter into transactions with people for dealing with his after-acquired property. That is dealt with in so many cases that I do not think it is necessary for me to refer to any more than Coker v. Mitchell (1), where the earlier authorities are carefully considered.

The legislature has passed two Acts of Parliament, neither of which, I agree, expressly deals with the present case, because one was passed in 1913 and the other in 1914, while this bankruptcy was in 1908. The legislature has plainly recognised the validity and effect of that which is to be found in what is, no

A doubt, judge-made law as expressed in a series of decisions extending over some 200 years. In s. 47 (1) of the Act of 1914 the legislature says:

B "All transactions by a bankrupt with any person dealing with him bonâ fide and for value, in respect of property, whether real or personal, acquired by the bankrupt after the adjudication, shall, if completed before any intervention by the trustee, be valid against the trustee, and any estate or interest in such property which by virtue of this Act is vested in the trustee shall determine and pass in such manner and to such extent as may be required for giving effect to any such transaction."

C Taking the language of the section first, that, in my view, clearly indicates "intervention" as a point of time. It says nothing about intervention continued from time to time. There is a period of time, namely, before any intervention by the trustee, during which the bankrupt's transactions, if bonâ fide and for value, and if completed before intervention, are valid against the trustee, and the trustee cannot impeach them—that is to say, if they are in good faith, for value and completed, then the trustee cannot interfere with or impeach them. Then, as there was some difficulty in seeing what would follow those transactions, the Act of Parliament goes on to provide that:

D "any estate or interest in such property which by virtue of this Act is vested in the trustee shall determine and pass in such manner and to such extent as may be required for giving effect to any such transaction."

E That enables the court or a judge to have a firm foundation for the theory established by numerous decisions, and says that that is the way in which effect is to be given to the title for value acquired by transactions completed. In my view, the section is an assertion of what was the common law, and does not introduce any novelty except in the last few lines, which imply a mode in which the title of persons with whom transactions are had is made unimpeachable.

F Apart from that section, what was the position? In Cohen v. Mitchell (1), a case of the very highest authority, decided in 1890, LORD ESHER said (25 Q.B.D. at pp. 266, 267):

G "Of course all the property which belongs to the bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy becomes at once the property of the trustee. But does all the property acquired by the bankrupt after his bankruptcy belong to the trustee absolutely, so that the bankrupt is divested of all interest and property in it, or does it remain the property of the bankrupt, so that, at any rate he can deal with it until the trustee interferes? In the case of property coming under the bankruptcy, if the bankrupt were to endeavour to maintain an action, in which the defendant was not estopped from denying the bankrupt's property in the subject-matter of the action, it would be a good plea that the property is not his, but is vested in the trustee: but with regard to after-acquired property, it has been held that such a plea would be bad unless it went on to show that the trustee had intervened before the transaction in respect of which the action is brought. That seems to be conclusive to show that the bankrupt has a property, whether absolute or not is immaterial, in such things till the trustee interferes."

H Then he says that the authorities do not conflict with the view which he has expressed, and he gives judgment to that effect. FRY, L.J.'s judgment, which seems to me to be extremely important, after quoting the judgment of TYNDALL, C.J., in Herbert v. Sayer (2) in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, said (ibid. at p. 269):

I "Now, I adopt that view, with the single exception that I think the language 'disaffirm his act' should be interpreted to mean 'intervene,' because I do not think that the trustee who does intervene has any power retrospectively to disaffirm what has otherwise been validly done by the bankrupt; but from the moment of his intervention the property vests in him absolutely, and can no longer be recovered by or dealt with by the bankrupt."

Assuming, as, in my view, I have stated is the fact, that in the present case there was a good intervention from the date of the notice, thereafter property could not be recovered by or dealt with by the bankrupt. That seems to me to be an authority which shows that even if the view is that the property was vested in the bankrupt until intervention, that will not help the bankrupt here. I think that the truer and safer view is that which is expressed by several of the judges—that the bankrupt was something in the nature of an agent who had power to deal in these transactions for value with his after-acquired property before intervention, but that was a right which ceased absolutely on intervention. From that moment the trustee's title was complete, and the property could no longer be "dealt with by the bankrupt" in the language of Fry, L.J. If that be so, the property at the date of the notice by the official receiver of Oct. 26, 1915, was vested in the trustee absolutely, and the bankrupt had no power whatever henceforward to deal with it. To talk of a continuous interference, or ready and constant interference, is to talk of something which I do not understand. Interference merely refers to a punctum temporis—to something which happens before or something which happens after that particular period.

What authority is there for suggesting withdrawal, if withdrawal can be effectual? If the property was at the date of the intervention absolutely and indefeasibly vested in the trustee without any power of the bankrupt to dispose of it by any transactions, what possible authority can there be for saying that there can be a withdrawal having the effect of re-vesting the property in someone else? There is not a vestige of authority in favour of that view. Affleck v. Hammond (3) ([1912] 3 K.B. at p. 173), in which KENNEDY, L.J.'s, dictum is to be found, seems entirely distinguishable. There was nothing in the judgments of VAUGHAN WILLIAMS and BUCKLEY, L.JJ., to support it, and KENNEDY, L.J.'s, dictum—for, on the face of it, it is mere dictum—does not amount to much. That was a case in which there was an assignment of a sum due for commission in respect of after-acquired property. But it was personal earnings, and probably not more than was required for maintenance. It was property which would not vest in or pass to the trustee except so far as it was not required for maintenance. There the trustee simply said that he had no title to the property, and that his notice was given wrongly. To give an instance: Suppose the bankrupt is John Smith and the trustee sees a notice that John Smith has come into a legacy of £1,000. The trustee gives notice with regard to that, and it turns out that it is not John Smith the bankrupt, but another John Smith. It would be a case in which the trustee's title never did attach to the property. In such circumstances I feel no doubt that the trustee would be perfectly entitled to say: "My intervention was due to a mistake. I never had any title to this property, and, therefore, as my intervention was wrong, I simply tell you to disregard it and I will withdraw it because it was made under a mistake."

In the present case, with great respect to the learned judge in the court below, I do not think that his judgment on this part of the case can stand. He says:

"This attitude gives rise to two further questions—the one, whether a trustee who has once intervened in relation to after-acquired property can determine his intervention, and the other whether assuming he can determine it at all—he can determine it as from a date antecedent to his notice of determination. I think he can do both. Inasmuch as it rested with him to determine in the first instance whether he should or should not intervene, and to choose the moment for intervention if he decided on intervention, I cannot myself see any reason why he should not have the same discretion in determining whether or no the intervention ought to be persisted in or whether it ought ever to have been made. Facts coming to his knowledge subsequent to the intervention

A may satisfy him that his intervention was from the first a mistake, or he may be able to make such terms with the bankrupt as to future earnings as may make a continuance of the intervention less in the interests of his cestuis que trust than its determination. I think in either case he has a power to put an end to the intervention, and when it comes to a question of date from which the intervention is to be treated as determined, I think the discretionary B power vested in him in this respect must at least be as wide as the discretion he possesses in fixing upon the date to intervene."

With great respect to the learned judge, I think that he overlooked the effect of the absolute and indefeasible vesting of this property in the trustee after his intervention. The learned judge does not really face the difficulty that withdrawal of a notice cannot operate as a re-vesting of the property in the bankrupt. For C these reasons I think that the decision of the learned judge was wrong, and that, therefore, the appeal must be allowed with costs. The order of the court below will accordingly be discharged and all proceedings will be stayed until the trustee in bankruptcy be added as a co-plaintiff. There will be a liberty to apply if that is not done within a reasonable time.

D WARRINGTON, L.J.—I agree. The main question, and I think the only substantial question, is whether the effect of the withdrawal, on July 31, 1916, of the notice of Oct. 26, 1915, is to re-vest in the bankrupt the right of action which he seeks to enforce in the present proceedings. We are dealing here simply with an item of property which consists of a chose in action. The law, stated E shortly, would appear to be this. Under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Acts property acquired by the bankrupt, including rights of action under contracts subsequent to the date of the order of adjudication—i.e., after the commencement of the bankruptcy—is vested in the trustee. So far the provisions of the Acts of Parliament appear to be clear. But, by a long series of decisions, it is now settled that, although the property is vested in the trustee, to use the words of the F Court of Appeal in Cohen v. Mitchell (1) (25 Q.B.D. at p. 267):

"Until the trustee intervenes, all transactions by a bankrupt after his bankruptcy with any person dealing with him bona fide and for value, in respect of his after-acquired property, whether with or without knowledge of the bankruptcy, are valid against the trustee."

G With regard to choses in action, that requires a little amplification, because among dealings with such a class of property is included the right of action to recover money represented by what lawyers call a "chose in action." In other words, until the trustee has intervened the right of action remains vested in the bankrupt.
But, from the moment that the trustee intervenes—using the words of Fry, L.J., in Cohen v. Mitchell (1) (ibid. at p. 269)—"the property vests in him"—the trustee
H—"absolutely, and can no longer be recovered by or dealt with by the bankrupt."
Therefore, in the case of a chose in action, which is the only kind of property we are dealing with, I think that there can be no question that the effect of the intervention by the trustee is to vest in the trustee in bankruptcy the right of action which previously was vested in the bankrupt himself. If so, then at the date when this action was commenced, and at the date when Eve, J., made his I order refusing the defendant's application, the right of action was vested in the trustee in bankruptcy and he was a necessary party to the action.

But it is said that, although the intervention of the trustee may have the effect which I have just mentioned, yet the trustee may destroy that right and restore the previously existing right of the bankrupt by withdrawing the intervention.
I do not know quite, to begin with, what is meant by "withdrawing the intervention." The intervention is there; it has taken place and it has a certain legal operation. What the bankrupt is really contending for is that it is open to the

operating, namely, by re-vesting the property in the bankrupt. In my opinion, that cannot be done. If we are to hold that the intervention was capable of being revoked, we should be unduly adding another element to the judge-made law which has already modified the express words of the Bankruptcy statutes. That, it seems to me, we are not at liberty to do. I say that with all respect to EVE, J.—using, I think, the words which the Master of the Rolls has already used—that he has forgotten that the exercise of what he calls the discretionary power of the trustee has had the legal effect to which I have already referred. It is not as if the trustee had a discretionary power which he might exercise one way at one time, and one way at another time. The exercise itself of the discretionary power has a certain legal effect, and it seems to me that it is not competent for the trustee to destroy that effect by something which he does afterwards.

There is only one other point. It was contended on behalf of the bankrupt that the notice of Oct. 26, 1915, was not an intervention on the part of the trustee within the meaning of the rule that I have referred to because it was in general terms, that is to say, a notice by the trustee requiring payment of moneys due or which had become due from the debtor to the bankrupt. In my judgment, with all respect to the argument, there is nothing in that point. The property in question is a debt due from the person to whom the notice was addressed to the bankrupt, and the notice is quite sufficient to make it improper thereafter for the debtor to pay any part of that debt to the bankrupt or to anyone except the trustee in bankruptcy. It seems to me that that is quite sufficient, and it matters not a bit whether there may hereafter be moneys becoming due under other contracts to which that notice would not apply, or could not apply. I do not think it matters in the least. It was a notice with regard to an existing debt, and, so far as that is concerned, it constitutes an intervention by the trustee. On the whole I think that the order of EVE, J., was wrong, and that this appeal should be allowed.

A. T. LAWRENCE, J.—I entirely concur in what has been said by the Master of the Rolls and WARRINGTON, L.J. It seems to me that this property, which was after-acquired property, vested in the trustee in bankruptcy absolutely when he gave his notice of intervention. And once it had vested in him absolutely I do not think it is possible to say that anything has taken it out of him. It was argued that the notice was a bad one by reason of its being in general terms. But I think that the argument which counsel sought to make, that it is necessary to have a specific and particular notice in order to affect the property, cannot be right. The reason is that it is a notice which has to be given by a trustee whose information may be extremely vague, and it would, I think, have the worst possible effect if we said that he must deliver a legal instrument actually touching the property itself in its terms. In my judgment, it is sufficient if he clearly conveys the fact that he requires delivery of the property to him. In the present case he required the payment “of all moneys which may now and hereafter be and become due from you to the bankrupt.” That shows that he was dealing with something, or affecting to deal with something which had become due under some contractual relationship, such as a contract of tenancy or a partnership—a contract of some such nature as to cause moneys to become due in the future. The trustee claims all those moneys, and thereby it seems to me that he shows that he is claiming title to the rights of the bankrupt in this partnership.

EVE, J., says in the earlier part of his judgment:

“When he [the trustee] has once made it clear that it is his intention to intervene and to assert his paramount title to the property, the bankrupt is disqualified from giving a valid receipt for and from maintaining an action to recover such property.”

I entirely agree with that. But then the learned judge goes on to say that the trustees may determine his intervention. I think that there the learned judge ignored the argument which counsel for the defendant addressed—namely, that

A this is a matter which deals with the vesting of property. Once you look at it from that point of view, it seems to me impossible to say that a mere notice of withdrawal will re-vest the property. It is quite true that the property was vested in the trustee in a qualified sense before the notice of intervention. But it was only in a qualified sense, and the proposition stated in Cohen v. Mitchell (1) is exactly that which has been reproduced in s. 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914. It is evident

B that the section is, in effect, a statutory declaration of the validity of the proposition in Cohen v. Mitchell (1). I do not think that the argument that this notice could be treated as a re-assignment is sound. It is not in any form a conveyance, and there are no words of assignment in it. To withdraw a notice cannot be said to have the effect of re-assigning property. It is true that when the trustee has acquired after-acquired property by his intervention, he can sell it and dispose of it in the C ordinary way that anyone else could, but that does not entitle us to say that the giving of a notice of withdrawal is a form of assignment. Therefore, I entirely agree with what has been said—that the learned judge in the court below did not deal with this case effectually in the latter part of his judgment.

Appeal allowed.

Negligence—Duty of occupier of premises to visitor—Volunteer with interest in common with occupier.

H

Where a person voluntarily and gratuitously places himself under the control of another to act in the capacity of a servant, both persons having a common interest in the transaction, he is not a mere volunteer, but has the same rights as an invitee (see note infra).

I

The plaintiff, a professional dancer, gratuitously attended rehearsals for a revue in the hope that she would thereby obtain an engagement to take part in the revue when produced. She was not under contract with the defendants, the producers of the revue, but they allowed her to join in the rehearsals so that they could, without expense to themselves, ascertain whether she was fit to be engaged. During a rehearsal the plaintiff was injured by the negligence of a servant of the defendants.

Held: though a volunteer, she was a volunteer with an interest in common with the defendants, and was entitled to recover damages from them in respect of the negligence of their servant.

Notes. The doctrine and defence of common employment was abolished by s. 1 (1) of the Law Reform (Personal Injuries) Act, 1948: 25 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 364. The duty which an occupier of premises owes to his visitors is now the common duty of care defined by s. 2 (2) of the Occupier's Liability Act, 1957: 37 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 832. The "visitors" to whom the duty is owed are those persons who at common law would be treated as invitees or licensees (see s. 1 (2) of the Act), but not volunteers. It is on this point that the present case is included in these reports. A

Appeal by the defendants from an order made by SHEPARDMAN, J., in an action tried by him with a common jury in which the plaintiff, Hilda Hayward, a

A professional dancer, claimed damages from the defendants, Drury Lane Theatre, Ltd., and Moss Empires, Ltd., for personal injuries occasioned by the negligence of the defendants' servants.

Rigby Swift, K.C., and Harold Brandon for the defendants.

Rawlinson, K.C., and Harry Dobb for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

B July 30, 1917. The following judgments were read.

VISCOUNT READING, C.J.—The plaintiff sued the defendants for damages for personal injuries sustained in consequence of the negligence of the defendants' servants, and obtained a verdict and judgment for £367 against Moss Empires, Ltd. At the trial before SHEARMAN, J., and a common jury the jury found that (i) the plaintiff was not in the employment of Moss Empires, Ltd.; (ii) Moss Empires did not use reasonable care to prevent unexpected danger on the stage of which they knew or ought to have known; and (iii) the injury was caused by the negligence of a person in their employment. All further questions of fact were left to the judge, who held that the plaintiff was on the stage at the request of the defendants, and for the purpose of assisting them as a person they professed themselves willing to engage when the time came. The defendants appeal on the ground that in law the plaintiff must be treated as a person in common employment with the servants of the defendants through whose negligence she was injured, and, therefore, that this action is not maintainable, and that the verdict and judgment for the plaintiff should be set aside and judgment entered for the defendants, Moss Empires, Ltd. It is admitted that the plaintiff was injured by the negligence of a servant of the defendants, and no question arises with regard to the amount of the damages. The only question on this appeal is as to the right of the plaintiff to recover damages upon the undisputed facts.

Moss Empires, Ltd., were in possession of Drury Lane Theatre and were intending on June 12, 1916, to produce a revue called "Razzle Dazzle." For this purpose rehearsals had been proceeding for some weeks, which were attended by the plaintiff, a professional dancer. She was not under contract with the defendants either to attend rehearsals or to perform in the proposed production. She was requested by the defendants to attend the rehearsals without payment, and she attended, the object on their part being to ascertain and test her fitness and capacity for engagement in the revue, and on her part to obtain a contract to perform in the revue when produced. While attending rehearsals on June 9, she was ordered by Wilson, the producer of the revue, who was in the defendants' employment, to stand on a staircase which was part of the scenery. She took her position accordingly, and the staircase, being insecurely fixed owing to the negligent orders of Wilson, collapsed and injured her.

If the plaintiff had been a stranger whom the defendants, for the purposes of their business, had invited to enter upon the premises, it cannot be doubted that they would have been liable for the failure to use reasonable care to prevent damage to the plaintiff from unusual danger which the defendants by their servants knew or ought to have known of: Indermaur v. Dames (1). But it is contended that the plaintiff is not in the position of a stranger, and is to be regarded as in common employment with the servant of the defendants, whose negligence caused the injury, and therefore the plaintiff cannot recover. That, in fact, the plaintiff was not in common employment with Wilson is beyond question, as there was no contract of service, but it is argued that she is to be regarded as in the same position as if she had been in common employment, first because she had submitted herself to the orders of Wilson on behalf of the defendants, and, secondly, because she was a volunteer. Upon the first point, the true inference from the facts is that she had not contracted to obey the orders of the defendants' servants, but that if she did not obey them she would imperil her prospects of obtaining an engagement. She was under no legal obligation to obey orders.

The second point raises a question of greater difficulty. The defendants' case rested, in the main, upon the authority of Degg v. Midland Rail. Co. (2). There the injured man was voluntarily assisting the railway company's servants in turning a truck when other servants of the railway company negligently ran a steam engine so as to cause his death. His administratrix brought the action. It was held that the action was not maintainable. BRAMWELL, B., said, in delivering the judgment of the court (1 H. & N. at p. 779):

"The cases show that if the deceased had been a servant of the defendants, and injured under such circumstances as occurred here, no action would be maintainable; and it might be enough for us to say that those cases govern this, for it seems impossible to suppose that the deceased, by volunteering his services, can have any greater rights or impose any greater duty on the defendants than would have existed had he been a hired servant. But we were pressed by an expression to be found in those cases to the effect that 'a servant undertakes as between him and the master to run all ordinary risks of the service, including the negligence of a fellow-servant': Wiggett v. Fox (3) and it was said there was no such undertaking here. But in truth there is as much in the one case as in the other; the consideration may not be as obvious, but it is competent for a man to agree, and as reasonable to hold that he does agree, that, if allowed to assist in the work, though not paid, he will take care of himself from the negligence of his fellow-workmen as it would be if he were paid for his services."

This decision was approved four years later by the Exchequer Chamber in Potter v. Faulkner (4). There ERLE, C.J., said (1 B. & S. at p. 806):

"This is the case of one who volunteers to associate himself with the defendants' servant in the performance of his work, and that without the consent or even the knowledge of the master. Such an one cannot stand in a better position than those with whom he associates himself in respect of their master's liability; he can impose no greater obligation upon the master than that to which he was subject in respect of a servant in his actual employ."

In both of these cases the injured person had of his own initiative volunteered to assist the defendants' servants, and in law was on the defendants' premises as a mere licensee.

In Holmes v. North Eastern Rail. Co. (5) it was held that, where a plaintiff was not a mere licensee, but was engaged with the consent and invitation of the defendants in a transaction of common interest to both parties, the defendants were liable if he was injured owing to their premises not being in a reasonably secure condition, upon the authority of Indermaur v. Dames (1). In Holmes' Case (5) the plaintiff was the consignee of a coal waggon, and, with the permission of the stationmaster, went to the waggon and took coal from it. In so doing he stepped on the flagged path, which gave way, and he was injured, and it was held that he was entitled to recover. The court took the view that he was not a mere volunteer: see particularly CHANNELL, B., who said (L.R. 4 Exch. at p. 258):

"In one sense the plaintiff was a licensee, but he was not a mere licensee, and the word 'mere' has a very qualifying operation. We must infer from the silence of the stationmaster that he acquiesced in the plaintiff going on to the siding for the purpose of getting coal from his waggon in the way in which he did get it."

This case was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber by COCKBURN, C.J., and six other judges.

In Wright v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (6) the principle in Holmes v. North Eastern Rail. Co. (5) was approved. The plaintiff was at the station to receive a heifer which was in a horsebox of the defendants. In order to save delay he helped the defendants' servants to shunt the horse-box, and, whilst so doing,

A was injured by the negligence of the defendants' servants. The stationmaster knew that the plaintiff was assisting in the shunting and assented. The court had to consider whether the case came within Degg v. Midland Rail. Co. (2) or Holmes v. North Eastern Rail. Co. (5), and decided, in the words of LORD COLERIDGE, C.J. (1 Q.B.D. at p. 255):

B "that the plaintiff was not acting merely as a volunteer, in which case he would have been bound to take all risks upon himself which he met with in the employment; nor was it the case of master and servant, in which case the defendants would not have been liable for the negligence of a fellow servant. But the defendants being bound by contract to deliver the heifer to the plaintiff, they, by their representative, the stationmaster, allowed the plaintiff to take part in the delivery, and they were therefore bound to see that he did not get injured by the negligence of their servants."

C JAMES, L.J., said it would be a shocking state of the law if a person in the position in which the plaintiff was could not recover, and he agreed with LORD COLERIDGE, C.J. CLIASBY, B., who was a party to Holmes v. North Eastern Rail. Co. (5) said (ibid. at p. 257): "He has not agreed to be the fellow servant of the defendants' servants."

D In the two earlier cases there was not, as in the present case, an invitation of the defendants, and there was neither knowledge nor assent of the defendants or of any person in the position to receive it or give it on behalf of the defendants, and the bearing of these facts upon the law must be considered. It is to be observed that in neither of them did the principle of Indermaur v. Dames (1) come under consideration. The judgment in Degg's Case (2) and Potter's Case (4) is based upon the principle that a volunteer cannot be in a better position to recover damages occasioned by the negligence of the defendants' servants whom he was assisting on his own invitation than a servant of the defendants.

E On behalf of the defendants reliance was placed upon the observations made by BRETT, L.J., in Swainson v. North Eastern Rail. Co. (7) (L.R. 3 Ex.D. at p. 349):

F "In order to give rise to the exemption there must be a common employment and a common master; it is not necessary that there should be a common service for a definite time or at fixed wages; for the exemption exists in the case of volunteers and of other persons where plainly there has been no contract for payment; a volunteer puts himself under the control of another person, and in respect of that other person he is for the time being in the position of a servant"

G and upon Johnson v. Lindsay & Co. (8), where LORD HERSCHELL, having quoted these observations, said ([1891] A.C. at p. 377):

H "A person who is not under any paid contract of service may nevertheless have put himself under the control of an employer to act in the capacity of a servant, so as to be regarded as such. This, as has been pointed out, is the position of a volunteer. But it is obvious that, if the exemption results, as it does according to the authorities I have cited, from the injured person having undertaken as between himself and the person he sues, to bear the risks of his fellow-servant's negligence, it can never be applicable when there is no relation between the parties from which such an undertaking can be implied. . . . I do not see how such an obligation can arise otherwise than from some contractual relation. The obligation and the exemption appear to me to be correlative and to be implied from the relation of master and servant created between the parties."

I LORD WATSON also held (ibid. at p. 382) that the immunity of the master in such a case rested upon an implied undertaking by the servant to bear the risks of a fellow-servant's negligence. In the present case the plaintiff has not, in my view of the facts, either expressly or impliedly, undertaken as between herself and the defendants to bear the risk of the negligence of the defendants' servants. Since A no contractual relation existed between the parties I cannot see how or from what relation such an undertaking can be implied. Therefore the plaintiff was not in common employment with Wilson.

It was argued for the defendants that, even if there was no such implied undertaking, the above quoted observations of LORD HERSCHELL showed that the plaintiff, being a volunteer, could not recover. I cannot find that these observations cast B any doubt upon the decisions in Holmes' Case (5) and Wright's Case (6). Neither LORD HERSCHELL nor BRETT, L.J., was considering the distinction between the case of a mere volunteer and one who voluntarily assisted the defendants' servants in the circumstances proved in Holmes' Case (5) and Wright's Case (6). I think the law is now well established that a mere volunteer cannot be in a better position to recover damages from the master for injury caused by the negligence of the C master's servants than the servants who are under contract of service with the master. Holmes' Case (5) and Wright's Case (6) show that there is a distinction to be made when the injured person voluntarily assists the master's servants in a service in which he has a common interest with the master, and by the invitation or with the acquiescence of the master or servant acting within the scope of his employment. He is not a mere volunteer, and can recover if he is injured by the D negligence of the master's servants. The present case falls within the principle of the decisions in the last-mentioned cases, and shows that the action by the plaintiff against Moss Empires, Ltd., is maintainable. Nothing that I have said is, in my opinion, in conflict with the true principle of the decisions in the Degg's Case
(2) and Potter's Case (4). I should have been sorry had I constrained by precedents to hold that the plaintiff could not recover against the defendants. In my judgment, E this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

SCRUTTON, L.J., stated the facts, said that the plaintiff was in the theatre by the licence or invitation of the company, she had an interest in the matter in that she hoped her performance at rehearsal would get her a permanent engagement, they had an interest in the matter in that they were able to test her abilities as F cheaply as possible, both parties contemplated a possible contractual relation in the future, but were under no present contractual relation; referred to the doctrine of common employment, and continued: It is not surprising that the question arose what was the position of a volunteer. In 1857 Degg v. Midland Rail. Co.
(2) was decided by the Court of Exchequer. In that case a carman of Pickford's, G seeing some servants of the railway company trying to move a turntable, of his own accord ran to help them, and was injured by an engine of the company. This case was considered in the Exchequer Chamber in 1861 in Potter v. Faulkner (4), in which case a carman waiting to receive goods for A. from a warehouse belonging to B. was asked by a carman of B.'s to help him stow some goods to be carried to C. He did so, and while helping was injured by the negligence of other servants of B. In neither case, it will be noticed, did the master know or approve of the H assistance rendered by the plaintiff, and in Degg's Case (2) the assistance was rendered without the request of the master's servants. In Degg's Case (2) BRAMWELL, B., held that the defendant, by volunteering his services, could not get any greater rights or impose any greater duty than could have existed [under the doctrine of common employment] had he been a hired servant. He also held that there was a similar undertaking to bear risks implied in the case of such I a volunteer. The greater part of his judgment is devoted to the view that there is no liability in tort to the trespasser or wrongdoer by a master for the negligence of his servants, though the master himself might be liable for negligence if he knew the trespasser was there and carelessly injured him. The Exchequer Chamber in Potter v. Faulkner (4) affirmed the principle of Degg's Case (2), which ERLE, C.J., put in this way (1 B. & S. at p. 806):

"This is the case of one who volunteers to associate himself with the defendants'

A servants in the performance of his work, and that without the consent or even the knowledge of the master. Such a one cannot stand in a better position than those with whom he associates himself in respect of their master's liability."

B These cases seem explicable on the ground that the volunteer is, as regards the master, a trespasser, and cannot claim a higher protection than that the master himself shall not wilfully or carelessly injure him. He cannot make the master liable for negligent acts of his servants, as their duties to the master do not include taking care of trespassers. The difficulty of implying the undertaking spoken of by BRAMWELL, B., is that there is no contract or legal relation between the master and volunteer in which the undertaking can be implied. POLLOCK ON TORTS (8th Edn.) p. 104, treats these cases as an application of the principle of volenti non fit injuria.

C Some years afterwards two more cases showed the difficulties involved in some of the language used in the former cases. In 1868 in Holmes v. North Eastern Rail. Co. (5) a consignee going with permission to the stationmaster to get coal from his wagon in the defendants' premises, work which the defendants should do by contract, was injured by a trap in the shape of a defective flagstone. He was held to be a licensee, but not a mere licensee, a licensee with a common interest with the licensor, and as such entitled to be warned of traps. Nothing was said about the doctrine of common employment. In Wright v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (6) a consignee helped the railway porters, with the assent of the stationmaster, to discharge his heifer, and was injured by a train negligently allowed to come out of the siding. It was argued, on the one hand, that he was a volunteer who within Degg's Case (2) had undertaken the risk, on the other that he was a licensee with an interest, within Holmes' Case (5). It was held the plaintiff was neither a volunteer nor a servant, but an invitee, with regard to whom the company must by their servants use reasonable care.

E There are, however, two opinions of weight which must be considered. Both arose in cases where it was endeavoured to extend the doctrine of common employment to cases where the servants were engaged in the same work though under different masters. In Swainson v. North Eastern Rail. Co. (7), BRETT, L.J., says (47 L.J.Q.B. at p. 376):

G "In all the cases there is a common employment, and work done in common by servants under a common master. The cases show that both these conditions, or something equivalent to both, is necessary to raise the exception to the general rule of liability. We cannot say that the common service required is necessarily a common service arising out of a binding contract to serve for a definite time, or on which the complainant is to receive wages; for these are cases of volunteers, and other cases in which there is certainly no contract and no payment in virtue of one. But when the volunteer cases are looked at it will be found that they are all cases of volunteering to serve, in which the complainant put himself voluntarily under the control and order of the defendant as his master; therefore, though not a paid servant, by his voluntary act he puts the defendant in possession of his services, and makes him unsuable so long as he chooses to remain under such orders and control, and so becomes a servant of the defendant."

I It will be noticed that the learned judge is meeting the argument that a contract of service is not necessary, because of the volunteer cases, by saying that the volunteer has offered to serve the master. I do not see how this can make any contract of service with a master who does not know of this voluntary offer, still less with a master who knows of the offer and refuses to make a contract. COTTON, L.J., says (ibid. at p. 377):

"If the injured man is a volunteer, and is acting as a servant when injured, it is well established that he cannot recover against the head of the establishment, but then he puts himself in the same position as if he were actually a servant, and there is the same applied contract because he has put himself in the same relation. That is the principle laid down in Degg's Case (2)."

Here, again, the learned judge speaks of the relation as a contract implied from a relation; and I cannot see how you can imply a contract with a person who is ignorant of the voluntary service. Both these passages, though entitled to the greatest respect, were obiter dicta not necessary for the decision. The same question of common employment was raised in Johnson v. Lindsay & Co. (8). LORD HERSCHELL explains the position of volunteers thus ([1891] A.C. at p. 377):

"These authorities are sufficient to establish the proposition that unless the person sought to be rendered liable for the negligence of his servant can show that the person so seeking to make him liable was himself in his service the defence of common employment is not open to him. Such service need not, of course, be permanent or for any definite term. The general servant of A. may for a time or on a particular occasion be the servant of B., and a person who is not under any paid contract of service may, nevertheless, have put himself under the control of an employer to act in the capacity of servant so as to be regarded as such. This, as has been pointed out, is the position of a volunteer."

This again is obiter dictum, and indeed the learned Lord goes on:

"The exemption can never be applicable when there is no relation between the parties from which such an undertaking can be implied. I do not see how such an obligation can arise otherwise than from some contractual relation."

As I have said, I cannot see how a contractual relation can be implied between a volunteer and a master ignorant of his volunteering. It appears to me that while Degg's Case (2) and Potter's Case (4) are rightly decided, they are right for the reasons given by BRAMWELL, B., that a trespassing volunteer cannot complain against the employer, ignorant of his presence, of the negligence of that employer's servants, on the ground of tort. That is justified by the reason given by ERLE, C.J., that to do so would be to allow him to put himself without the consent of the employer on a better position than the servants whom the employer consented to employ on the work into which the volunteer trespassed. I think it is not correct to base them on any contractual relation. In the case before us the employer knew of the volunteer's presence and action and of set policy declined to make a contract with her. I do not see after this how he can avail himself of a protection which, as LORD HERSCHELL says, can only be implied from a contractual relation. But he has invited the volunteer to be present, and licensed her remaining to endeavour to obtain a contract. This appears to me to impose on him a liability for tort. I understand that liability to be this. A bare or mere licensee, one who has no common interest with the owner of the premises, but is there by the owner's permission, takes the premises as he finds them, with all their dangers and traps, a trap being a danger which a person who does not know the premises could not avoid by reasonable care and skill. The owner is under no liability as to existing traps unless he has intentionally set them for the licensee, but must not create new traps without taking precautions to protect licensees against them: see the judgment of WILLES, J., in Gautret v. Egerton (9). A licensee who is on premises on the business of the owners, or with a common interest with them, is not a bare or mere licensee, but a licensee with an interest, and has the same rights as an invitee: see Holmes v. North Eastern Rail. Co. (5); Wright v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (6). In stating the rights of an invitee one must separate those cases where the person using the premises does it for payment. The owners in such a case are bound to see that the premises are reasonably safe, and if they are not safe and the owners could know of the dangerous condition and negligently did not know of it they are liable for damages caused: Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Trustees v. Gibb (10) (L.R. 1 H.L. at p. 104); Parnaby v. Lancaster Canal

A Co. (11). This latter case is treated by HAMILTON, L.J., in his very instructive judgment in Latham v. R. Johnson & Nephew, Ltd. (12) ([1913] 1 K.B. at p. 412) as a case applying to invitees generally. It seems to me to be a case of an invitee for payment. The rights of an invitee who does not pay for his presence are stated in Indermaur v. Dames (1), and are that the owner of premises must use reasonable care to protect him, either by warning or precaution, against traps, whether existing or new dangers which the licensee, if ignorant of the premises, could not avoid by reasonable care and prudence. Against dangers which are not traps in this sense the owner is under no liability—that is, he does not warrant the premises safe, or as safe as reasonable care could make them. The difference between the bare licensee and the invitee licensee with an interest is that, as to existing traps, the owner incurs liability to the latter and not to the former. The liability towards a trespasser is fully discussed by the Court of Appeal in Lowery v. Walker (13).

B If this statement of the law is correct, the volunteer in Degg's Case (2) and Potter's Case (4) was a trespasser, and the owner had no liability for any negligence of his servants without the need of implying a contractual relation, which I cannot think existed. The plaintiff in the present case was either a licensee with an interest or an invitee, as SHEARMAN, J., found, and was as such entitled to be protected against traps. A trap in my view is none the less a trap that it begins by an act of negligence, and continues so by an act of negligence, if its continuing condition is a danger which the licensee cannot avoid by reasonable care. The jury in this case have found there was danger unexpected to the plaintiff on the stage, which the defendants by their servants ought to have known of and prevented, and there was evidence on which they could come to this finding. If there had been a contractual relation between plaintiff and defendants, the plaintiff could, on the authorities, have impliedly taken the risk of negligence of fellow servants in creating such a danger, in the absence of personal negligence of the defendants, or negligent failure on their part to appoint competent servants. There being no contractual relation on the admitted facts, this implication cannot be made, and the plaintiff has the ordinary protection of an invitee and can, in my opinion, recover. On these grounds, in my opinion, the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

NEVILLE, J.—The doctrine of common employment appears to me to be a purely arbitrary and artificial rule founded upon neither principle nor (prior to 1837 according to LORD WATSON, see Johnson v. Lindsay (8)) authority. A mere excrescence upon the common law devised apparently for the purpose of exempting a particular class from an otherwise universal liability. The best to be said for it probably is that it was considered at the time of its innovation to be in furtherance of public policy, inasmuch as the application of the law as it stood to the case of the masters might operate to the discouragement of the employment of labour. The rule, however, is to-day established beyond question and cannot be disregarded by the court.

H
I It remains to consider whether the doctrine is applicable where the services rendered by the injured person are voluntary. There are dicta of eminent judges, for whose opinion I entertain the most profound respect, in the affirmative. I gather from the cases cited that this extension of the doctrine is sought to be established by Degg v. Midland Rail. Co. (2) and Potter v. Faulkner (4). With these cases I will deal later. The extent of the rule is plainly stated by LORD HERSHELL in Johnson v. Lindsay & Co. (8) ([1891] A.C. at pp. 377, 378, 380), and it is there stated to extend to volunteers, though that extension was not necessary for the decision. It is said (ibid. at p. 378) to rest upon some contractual relation, so that in the case of volunteers we are at once faced by the amorphous conception of a contractual relation arising in the absence of a contract. To say that parties bear a contractual relation to one another where no contract exists between them is, to my mind, to state a legal paradox. The idea that the doctrine of common employment extends to the case of volunteers appears, as I have said, to depend mainly upon Degg v. Midland Rail. Co. (2) and Potter v. Faulkner & Co. In neither of these cases was there any consideration for the acts done by the injured person, and both appear to have been accepted as instances of the application of the doctrine of common employment. Indeed, the language of the judgments in those cases lends itself to such a construction. But even if the phrase "contractual relation" is extended beyond its extreme limit so as to cover the case of a voluntary relation which would have been contractual had there been any consideration to support it, it will not fit the facts in either of those cases. In neither case was there any relation at all between the master and the injured person beyond that which arose from the gratuitous interference of the latter with the master's business. There was no invitation to do the acts by the master or any person having his authority. Applying the law, therefore, as laid down in Johnson v. Lindsay & Co. (8), there being no contractual relation between the master and the injured person, either real or supposititious, in either of these cases, they must be both excluded from the operation of the doctrine of common employment. They do not stand the test of the definition of the rule, and yet are relied upon for the extension of the rule to volunteers. A somewhat remarkable result.

The truth is, in my opinion, that in both Degg v. Midland Rail. Co. (2) and Potter v. Faulkner (4) the true ground for the decisions, or, at all events, a ground upon which both cases can be supported, is not the application to them of the doctrine of common employment at all. In both cases the injured person when the accident happened was interfering voluntarily and officiously with the affairs of another, and it seems to me consistent both with law and good sense (which in the main are identical) to hold that in such circumstances the injured person can have no legal claim against the master of the servant whose negligence occasioned the accident. It seems to me that in such a case the master could answer the claim by saying conclusively: "You meddled in what was no business of yours. You interfered with my property without any invitation from me. In so doing you acted illegally, and that can give you no claim against me." As at present advised, having regard to the decisions to which our attention has been called, the doctrine of common employment extends to cases where there is in fact no contractual relation between the master of the negligent servant and the injured person. The dicta of other judges afford valuable assistance to a judge in the determination of the case before him, but, in my opinion, he is not bound, and, therefore, certainly not entitled to follow, the dictum of another judge, however eminent, unless it accords with his own judgment, which I think, in the absence of binding authority, he is bound to exercise. I do not think, however, that the question I have dealt with necessarily arises in the present case.

Holmes v. North Eastern Rail. Co. (5) and Wright v. London and North Western Rail. Co. (6) differentiate from cases coming within the rule of cases where the master and the injured person have what has been called a common interest in the transaction in the course of which the accident happens. I do not think, speaking with deference, that "common interest" is a phrase happily chosen to represent what appears to me to have been the ground of decision in these cases. In the first, the accident happened while the plaintiff was seeking delivery of his own coal; in the second, of his own heifer. In both cases the plaintiff was pursuing his own business and seeking to advance his own interest exclusively. Any benefit that the defendants might derive from his action was purely incidental. That appears to me in each case to be the true ground of the decision, subject to what I have said above with regard to the effect of absence of consideration. The question in each case appears to me to be: Was the injured person acting for himself and for his own interests, or was his action intended for the benefit of the master? Applying this test to the facts of the present case, it appears to me that the plaintiff was acting on her own account and in furtherance of her own interests alone. She

A desired to obtain an engagement, and attending the rehearsals, as desired by the defendants, appeared to her the best means of obtaining one. If she had gone to the office of the manager of the theatre to apply for an engagement, and, in obedience to his desire, she had accompanied him to the stage to exhibit her dancing, wishing to induce him to employ her, and had then been injured by a servant of the defendants, could it be successfully contended that she was engaged upon any business but her own in any sense of the word, however extended in their employment? I am unable to draw any sound distinction between that case and the case proved by the plaintiff here. The jury have found that she was not in the employment of the defendants, and I think they were amply justified by the evidence in so finding. If it be an inference of law, I come to the same conclusion. In my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

THOM (OTHERWISE SIMPSON) v. SINCLAIR

E [House of Lords (Viscount Haldane, Lord Kinnear, Lord Shaw and Lord Parmoor), October 30, 31, 1916, March 8, 1917]

[Reported [1917] A.C. 127; 86 L.J.P.C. 102; 116 L.T. 609;

F Workmen's Compensation—"Arising out of employment"—Accident with no causal relation to work on which injured workman employed—Workman required to work in particular building—Collapse of roof through adjacent wall, not belonging to employer, falling on it—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 58), s. 1 (1).

G If the conditions of his employment oblige a workman to work in a particular building or position which exposes him at the time and on the occasion of the accident to the injury for which compensation is claimed, then, although the accident is not consequent on and has no causal relation to the work on which the workman is employed, the accident arises, not only during the course of the employment, but also "out of the employment" within s. 1 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, as incident, not to the character of the work, but to the dangers and risks of the particular building or position in which by the condition of his employment he is obliged to work.

H So held by VISCOUNT HALDANE, LORD KINNEAR, LORD SHAW and LORD PARMOOR.

I Per VISCOUNT HALDANE: Under s. 1 (1) the court is directed to look at what has happened proximately and not to search for causes or conditions lying behind, as would be the case if negligence on the part of the employer had to be established. The governing purpose of the statute makes it irrelevant to look beyond the immediate cause of the accident for explanations or for remoter causes, as it would be in a case arising on a policy of marine insurance, provided that the circumstances bring the immediate cause within the definition.

Per LORD SHAW: The expression "arising out of the employment" is not confined to the mere nature of the employment. The expression applies to the employment as such—to its nature, its conditions, its obligations, and its incidents. If by reason of any of these the workman is brought within the zone of special danger and so injured or killed, the broad words of the statute—"arising out of the employment"—apply.

The appellant was employed to pack herrings in a shed belonging to the respondent, a fish-curer. While she was at work an adjoining brick wall in course of erection, which did not belong to the respondent, fell on the shed, brought down the roof, and injured the appellant.

On a claim for compensation under the Act of 1906,

Held: the House could not go beyond the fact that the roof fell; it was enough that by the terms of her employment the appellant had to work in the particular shed and was in consequence injured by an accident which happened to the roof; and, therefore, the accident arose out of her employment although it had been ultimately caused by the fall of a wall belonging to someone other than her employer.

Decision of Second Division of Court of Session, 1916 S.C. 85, reversed.

Notes. The Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, was repealed by the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, itself repealed by the National Insurance (Industrial Injuries) Act, 1946, which prescribes a system of insurance against injuries caused by industrial accidents, but s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1946 provides that the insurance shall be "against personal injury caused . . . by accident arising out of and in the course of" employment, thus adopting the language of s. 1 (1) of the Act of 1906. Appeal by the workman from an order of the Second Division of the Court of Session setting aside an award in her favour by the Sheriff-substitute of Aberdeen.

The facts and cases cited sufficiently appear from the judgment of VISCOUNT HALDANE.

Douglas Knocker and Duffes (the latter of the Scottish Bar) for the appellant.

Menariff, K.C., and T. M. Cooper (both of the Scottish Bar) for the respondent.

The House took time for consideration.

Mar. 8, 1917. The following opinions were read.

VISCOUNT HALDANE.—In this case LORD KINNEAR requests me to say that he concurs in the opinion I am about to read. The question is whether the appellant, who was employed in packing herrings by the respondent, a fish-curer in Aberdeen, is entitled to recover compensation from him under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, for injury caused by accident. What happened was that a brick wall, about 20 ft. high, in course of erection on ground belonging to someone else, but contiguous to the curing-shed of the respondent in which the appellant was employed, fell, by reason of its instability, on the shed. The consequence was that the roof of the shed and part of its wall tumbled in, and the appellant and other workers were buried under fallen material composed mainly of corrugated iron and rafters which belonged to the roof of the shed, and of bricks from the wall on the adjoining property. The sheriff-substitute of Aberdeen decided that the accident to the appellant arose "out of and in the course of the employment" within the meaning of the statute, and awarded compensation for her injuries. But he stated a Case so as to raise a question of law for the opinion of the court. The Second Division, differing from his view of the law, reversed his decision, and hence this appeal.

It will, I think, be convenient in considering the question of law raised, which is one of construction of the words of the Act, to examine it in the first instance apart from authority, and then to see whether the decided cases, looked at in the light so obtained, admit of freedom in interpretation. This is the more expedient because the decided cases, as was established in the course of the able and elaborate arguments which were addressed to your Lordships from both sides of the bar, are not altogether in harmony. I turn to the words in the statute on which the question depends. It will be observed that the legislature has imposed a double condition for the liability of the employer for injury from accident, a condition that the injury must arise not only in the course of the employment but out of it. It is easy in a case like the present to determine the satisfaction of one of these conditions. The appellant was actually employed when the accident occurred, and she was obviously injured by an accident in the course of the employment. But did the accident arise out of the employment? As to the meaning of these words, two contentions have been put forward. According to one of them the language used is satisfied if injury has been inflicted on the workman by any accident, such as something falling on him, which would not have happened to him if his employment had not caused him to be in the place at which the accident occurred at the time of its occurrence, the place and time having thus been conditions of the result brought into existence by the employment. Once establish this and it is said that no further causal connection need be sought. I think that this interpretation is too vague. It would cover the case of a farm labourer struck by lightning while walking across a field on the farm on which he was employed. Yet he might just as readily have been struck while walking elsewhere off the farm. A further condition seems to be required, the condition that the injury should have arisen, not merely by reason of presence in a particular spot at a particular time, but because of some special circumstance attending the employment of the workmen there. His duty may have occasioned his being near a tree which attracted the lightning, or being under a roof which for some reason fell in. According to the other contention a still fuller and more definite causal relation than this is essential. Unless, it is argued, the accident was due to something the man was doing in the course of his employment or was exposed to as a peculiar danger by the nature of his employment, the conditions required by the statute are not fulfilled. This view of its requirements was adopted in the judgments of the Second Division in the present case, who thought that it derived countenance from expressions used by LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., in Craske v. Wigan (1), to which I will refer later on. The foundation of the argument is that the mere fact of a man being, by reason of the locality of his employment, in the place where an accident happens to him does not distinguish his case from that of mankind generally if the accident is one, such as a stroke by lightning, which might have happened to him as readily in some other spot as in the one where he was employed. In order that the accident may be truly said to have arisen out of the employment it is argued that

A the character of the employment must be shown to have actively contributed to its occurrence.

B There are, no doubt, many kinds of accident which do not in any sense arise out of the employment. There may be no reason why such accidents should happen to a man in one situation rather than to a man in another, and it may, therefore, be impossible to pronounce truly that they are so connected with the employment as to have arisen out of it. But where a man is ordered to work under a particular roof and that roof falls in on him, it is not clear that the accident belongs to that category. If the particular accident would not have happened to him had he not been employed to work under the particular roof, there seems to be nothing in the language of the Act which precludes an occurrence from being held within it which satisfies the test proposed by the first of the alternative constructions modified to the extent I have suggested. The falling of the particular roof could only happen in one place, and the presence there of the person injured was due to the employment. The question really turns on the character of the causation through the employment which is required by the words "arising out of it." Now, it is to be observed that it is the employment which is pointed to as to be the distinctive cause, and not any particular kind of physical occurrence. The condition is that D the employment is to give rise to the circumstance of injury by accident. If, therefore, the statute, when read as a whole, excludes the necessity of looking for remoter causes, such as some failure in duty on the part of the employer as a condition of his liability, and treats him rather as in a position analogous to that of a mere insurer, the question becomes a simple one. Has the accident arisen because the claimant was employed in the particular spot on which the roof fell? E If so, the accident has arisen out of the employment, and there is no necessity to go back in the search for causes to anything more remote than the immediate event, the mere fall of the roof, and there need be no other connection between what happened and the nature of the work in which the injured person was engaged. The expression "cause" is almost invariably used in a way which lacks precision. In strict logic the cause cannot be pronounced to be less than the sum of the entire F conditions. But in ordinary speech and practice we select some one or more out of what is an infinite number of conditions to be treated as the cause. From the practical standpoint of the man in the street the cause of the setting the house on fire was the striking of a match, while from that of the man of science it was the presence of all the conditions which enabled potential to be converted into kinetic energy. On the other hand, for the court which tries a question of arson the cause G is the intention of the accused and any deed done which has accomplished this intention.

What, then, is the special point of view which the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, directs us to take in the practical selection of the circumstances which are to determine whether an event has arisen out of the employment which has amounted to injury by accident within the meaning of the Act? I think that the H court is directed to look at what has happened proximately, and not to search for causes or conditions lying behind, as would be the case if negligence on the part of the employer had to be established. For the reasons which I assigned in this House in Trim Joint District School Board of Management v. Kelly (2), reasons which I abstain from repeating, I am of opinion that the governing purpose of the statute makes it as irrelevant to look beyond the immediate cause of the accident I for explanations or for remoter causes, as it would be in a case arising on a policy of marine insurance, provided that the circumstances bring the immediate cause within the definition. Where the question is one of the construction of an obligation to insure against accident the law looks to the proxima causa of the accident as decisive and does not look behind it.

If, therefore, the language in question were to be construed upon principle and apart from authorities I should be prepared to hold that it was satisfied where, as here, it has been established as a fact that it was as arising out of her employment that the appellant was under the roof by the falling in of which she was injured.

Behind the fact that the roof fell we cannot go. The limiting words in the Act do not refer to any act of negligence on the part of the employer as to be looked for, but simply to a restriction of the class of accident against which he is to provide insurance. The appellant was injured because she happened at the moment of the accident to be working in the shed where she was employed to work, and I think that, unless authority constrains us to hold the contrary, the Act ought to be construed as signifying that an accident such as this comes within the class against which she is insured. Whether the remoter cause of the roof falling was the collapse of a neighbouring wall, or the falling down of some high adjacent building, or a stroke of lightning, seems to me immaterial in the light of this construction. It is enough that by the terms of her employment the appellant had to work in this particular shed, and was in consequence injured by an accident which happened to the roof of the shed. The accident is one arising out of the employment not the less if ultimately caused by the fall of someone else's wall than if it had been caused by inherent weakness of the employer's roof.

I turn now to the authorities to see what bearing they have on the construction of the statute. The first observation I must make is that decided cases afford less guidance than usual on such a question. The reason is that the appellate tribunals have consistently shown a proper reluctance to look beyond findings of fact by the arbitrator. This has been particularly so in the course of the decisions on the Act in your Lordships' House. Warner v. Couchman (3), the frost-bite case, is an excellent illustration of this, and in consequence nothing that was said there is authority on which the appellant here can rely. After examining what has been decided in this House I have come to the conclusion that we are free on the present occasion, so far as decisions in this House are concerned, to construe the statute in the sense I have indicated. I wish particularly to say that, in my view, there is nothing in Plumb v. Cobden Flour Mills Co., Ltd. (4) which really touches the point here. But in the Court of Session and in the Court of Appeal in England opinions have occasionally been indicated which apparently militate against this construction, and, if there had been anything like a uniform course of decisions to that effect, I should naturally have hesitated before disturbing them. However, on examining the authorities I find that they are far from harmonious. I deal with some of the more important.

Guthrie v. Kinghorn (5) was a case in which a carter in charge of a horse and lorry within his employer's yard was struck by a sheet of corrugated iron blown from the roof of an adjoining building. The Second Division of the Court of Session held that the case was not within the Act because what had happened was not an ordinary risk of the employment. I doubt whether this was right. But the decision, which proceeded on the narrower interpretation of the statute, was followed by the Second Division in the present case. It was thought to have proceeded on a principle believed to have been laid down in Criske v. Higan (1) ([1909] 2 K.B. at p. 638), where the accident was caused by a cock-bater which flew in at an open window and so frightened a lady's maid, who was doing needle-work for herself, that she threw back her hand and injured her eye. It was held that the mere fact that she was in her employer's house was not enough, for it did not really contribute to a risk which was common to humanity. That may well have been the correct interpretation of the facts. What the Master of the Rolls said as to its being necessary to say more than that "the accident would not have happened if I had not been engaged in that employment, or if I had not been in that particular place," is quite true when referred to the facts with which he was dealing. When he adds that the claimant must say that "the accident arose because of something I was doing in the course of my employment, or because I was exposed by the nature of my employment to some particular danger," that is also quite true as a criticism of the kind of claim that was before him. But I am not sure that the exposition of the Act by BUCKLEY, J., is not unduly abstract, and in consequence apt to mislead in some of its language. He said that the words "out of" point to the origin and cause of the accident, and the words "in the

A course of" to the time, place, and circumstances under which the accident takes place. In saying this he adopted what he had previously said to the same effect in Fitzgerald v. W. G. Clarke & Son (6). I doubt whether the time, place, and circumstances can properly be so sharply distinguished from other conditions which are described as belonging to the origin and cause as these words suggest. Michinso v. Day Bros. (7) is, I think, a more doubtful case. There a carter in charge of a horse and van was murderously assaulted, and it was held that the risk of being attacked by a man who was drunk did not arise reasonably out of the employment. In any view the facts differ from those in the present case, but I am not sure that the interpretation of the Act was not too narrow. In Martin v. J. Loribond & Sons, Ltd. (8) a brewer's drayman was driving the dray in the course of his employment left his dray to get a glass of beer, and in returning was knocked down by a motor car. His dependants were held entitled to claim. The Court of Appeal held that what had happened arose out of and in the course of his employment. The case shows how far the courts have sometimes gone in the direction of the wider interpretation of which I have spoken. Wicks v. Dowell & Co., Ltd. (9) was the case of a workman employed in unloading coal from a ship who had to stand by the open hatchway through which the coal was being brought up in the hold. He was seized with an epileptic fit while so engaged, and fell into the hold and was injured. COLLINS, M.R., and the Court of Appeal held that the causa proxima of the accident was his necessary nearness to the open hatchway, and, following the principle of the marine insurance cases to which I have already referred, held that in interpreting the Act this, the causa proxima, and not the idiopathic condition of the person injured, was to be looked to.

E I think that the main current of authority in the Court of Appeal in this country does not militate against the view taken by COLLINS, M.R., and in the Court of Session it seems to me that the weight of authority is in its favour and against what has been argued for by the respondent here. In Millar v. Refuge Assurance Co., Ltd. (10) a collector for the company had fallen down a stair which he had to use while seeking to collect a premium. Lord President DUNEDIN and Lord KINNEAR agreed in holding the company liable. The latter said that a risk was specially connected with a man's employment if it was due to the particular place where his employment required him to be at the time. Adamson v. Anderson & Co. (1905), Ltd. (11) is a decision of the First Division recognising this construction, and so, I think, are the decisions in Hughes v. Bell (12) and Nicol v. Young's Paraffin Light and Mineral Oil Co., Ltd. (13). White v. W. & T. Avery, Ltd. (14) proceeds on the same principle, and so, as it appears to me, does the earlier case of M'Neice v. Singer Sewing Machine Co., Ltd. (15). It is not necessary to proceed further in the examination of the authorities. For those to which I have referred show that there is no such uniform exposition of this very recent statute as precludes this House from feeling itself free, if it should be so disposed, to give effect to the construction which I am suggesting. For this construction decided cases disclose, indeed, a great deal of support. In the result, I move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be reversed and that of the sheriff-substitute restored, and that the appellant should have such costs in this House and in the courts below as are consistent with her appearance here in formâ pauperis.

I LORD SHAW.—The question which arises in this case is somewhat narrow, but I have had little hesitation in agreeing with your Lordships upon it. There have been many cases dealing with the consideration of those words in the Workmen's Compensation Act, namely, "arising out of the employment." The criticism is, of course, correct that those words must be taken to signify something more in the sense of limitation than "in the course of" the employment, and that both of those expressions of condition must be satisfied before the Act can apply. The decided cases are numerous and the dicta therein cannot always be reconciled; but a further consideration of the language of the statute itself—to which language one must go as the absolute test of liability—has confirmed my view that the decision pronounced by the learned sheriff-substitute was correct.

On Jan. 26, 1915, the appellant, who was then a fish-worker in the employ of the respondent, a fish-curer, was engaged in packing herrings into boxes. The work had to be performed in a brick shed, 7 ft. high, roofed with corrugated iron and lit by obscure windows in the roof. The appellant was, accordingly, obliged, as part of the conditions of her service, to be within the shed when engaged in her work and to be there at the time when the accident occurred. The accident itself was caused by reason of the collapse of a brick wall 20 ft. high. This was being erected on an adjacent building and it fell upon the roof of the shed where the appellant was working, bringing down the roof and part of the working shed, so that the appellant and other workers were buried under the wreckage. Three of them were killed, and six others, of whom the appellant was one, were injured. The learned sheriff-substitute found that the conditions of the appellant's employment "obliged her to work where she was and exposed her to the risk of said accident." As a statement of fact, this of course cannot be denied; but the respondent's argument before this House is that no liability is imposed under the statute, because such a situation is not covered by the words "arising out of the employment" where these words are properly construed.

The main argument relied on—the argument being successful in the Second Division of the Court of Session—was that the words of the Act "arising out of the employment" should be construed to mean "arising out of the nature of the employment." And a further construction is maintained to be correct, namely, that the words not only mean "the nature of the employment" in general, but the nature of the injured servant's employment. For myself I cannot so narrow the statutory words, either in the general or in the particular sense. The test applied by the learned Master of the Rolls (LORD COZENS-HARDY) in Craske v. Wigan (1) ([1909] 2 K.B. at p. 638) and referred to by the learned judges as an inviolable rule, is that "it is not enough for the applicant to say 'the accident would not have happened if I had not been engaged in that employment, or if I had not been in that particular place.' He must go further and must say 'the accident arose because of something I was doing in the course of my employment or because I was exposed by the nature of my employment to some peculiar danger.'"

This dictum has been given effect to in its full extent by the learned judges in the court below. The Lord Justice-Clerk observes:

"it seems to me that the accident must have arisen because of the nature of the employment in which the injured person was working at the time."

LORD DUNDALE puts the point with much clearness in application to the present case when he says:

"it seems to me impossible to say that it was because the poor woman was a fish-curer that the accident befell her."

And the other learned lords decide upon the same ground.

With much respect to the learned judges, I am unable to agree in such a limitation upon the words of the Act of Parliament. When a miner is engaged to hew coal, and in the course of his work brings down upon himself a mass of superincumbent material, it is plain that such a case would fall within the limited construction just cited. But such a case is comparatively rare. I ask myself what would result under the statute in those infinitely more numerous cases of accident to underground workers, the specific nature of whose employment was, for instance, not in actual excavation, but merely in the haulage of the coal or the lighting or watching of the pit? Accidents arise, not from anything in the nature of the particular miner's work, but possibly from causes, say subsidence, fires, or escapes of gas, taking their origin, it may be miles away, communicating along the strata

A of the earth and in no way causally connected with the particular workman's job. I think, accordingly, that the statute is not satisfied by asking the question whether the nature of the employment of the injured person had any causal relation to the accident, because it is clear that in very many instances the accident arose out of the employment as such, apart from the particular nature of the service which the injured workman had to render. When, in fact, the statute uses the words "arising out of the employment," it refers, in the first place at least, not to the individual's particular service. It follows from that that there may be causes of danger arising to all employees, which causes are not confined to the individual situation, but are general and applicable to the employment as a whole. It may be that that employment is underground, with all the risks attached to underground work. It may be in the air or on the sea, with a special exposure to the dangers relative to such elements; or it may be on the surface of the earth, in surroundings which are those of peril. In all such cases it is quite possible to figure injuries by accident in the course of and arising out of the employment which are totally disconnected with the nature of the employment upon which the workman was generally or for the moment engaged, but which, without any doubt, sprang from the employment in the sense that it was on account of the obligations or conditions thereof, or on that account alone, that he incurred the danger. In short, my view of the statute is that the expression "arising out of the employment" is not confined to the mere "nature of the employment." The expression, in my opinion, applies to the employment as such—to its nature, its conditions, its obligations, and its incidents. If by reason of any of these the workman is brought within the zone of special danger and so injured or killed, it appears to me that the broad words of the statute—"arising out of the employment"—apply. If the peril which he encountered was not an added peril produced by the workman himself, as in Plumb v. Cobden Flour Mills Co., Ltd. (4) and Barnes v. Nunnery Colliery Co., Ltd. (16) in this House, then a case for compensation under the statute appears to arise.

F It is said in the present case that the injury by accident arose, not because of the nature of the employment, which was packing herrings, and if decisions and dicta, such as those above cited, to the effect that the statutory words "the employment" can only be satisfied by "the nature of the employment," this is conclusive. But upon the other hand it is quite plain that it was part of the conditions of the appellant's labour and part of the obligations which she undertook as a servant of the respondent that she should at the time of the accident occupy this particular place of work which turned out to be a place of special danger. Her service there and not anywhere else brought her into the position of being subjected to this peril. It was not a peril which might fall upon the public at large, such as the severity of the weather, as in Warner v. Couchman (3) and Karenmaker v. Corsican (Owners) (17), but it was a peril attached to the particular location in which by the obligation of service the appellant was placed. In my humble opinion, this latter case falls within the Act, upon a sound construction of its terms.

I I am glad to be fortified in this view by a large body of decided cases. In Morgan v. Zenaida (Owners) (18), where a seaman painting the outside of his ship in Mexican waters, and, receiving from his position at work the force both of the direct and reflected rays of the sun, underwent sunstroke, he was held entitled to recover under the Act. In Davies v. Gillespie (19), also a case of sunstroke, liability attached because the workman was placed by the conditions of his work within a zone of special danger, namely, for some hours on a blackened steel deck under the blazing sun of Haiti. In Millar v. Refuge Assurance Co., Ltd. (10) an assurance company's collector, engaged in collecting premiums, was injured on a stair to which he had by the obligations of his service to go; in McNeice v. Singer Sewing Machine Co., Ltd. (15) an accident overtook a salesman who was cycling in the course of his duty in a public street. In both of these cases liability was held to attach to the employer, and for the same reason, viz., that it was part of the obligations of the service that the workman was placed within the zone of special danger. I venture to give my particular adhesion to the opinion delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord KILGOUR in the former of these cases. In Medley v. Faisworth Industrial Society (20), a lightning case, the position in which the man was doing the work and the place he had necessarily to occupy were a position and a place of special danger, and so the Act was held to apply. In Pierce v. Provident Clothing and Supply Co., Ltd. (21), a street accident to a collector on a bicycle, the Scottish case of McNeice v. Singer Sewing Machine Co., Ltd. (15), just referred to, was followed. In Cogle (or Brown) v. John Watson, Ltd. (22) this House, reversing the Second Division of the Court of Session, held that a workman, having been by the conditions of his service placed in a position of danger from extreme chill, causing pneumonia and death, there was liability under the Act. In Martin v. J. Loribond & Sons, Ltd. (8) the same decision was given as in the analogous street cases of McNeice v. Singer Sewing Machine Co., Ltd. (15) and Pierce v. Provident Clothing and Supply Co., Ltd. (21). The cases above cited, nine in number, are in truth all what might be termed "location" cases, and although there is much variety of expression by the learned judges, I think that they form a body of authority in support of the construction of the statute which your Lordships are now sanctioning. In each and all it was because of the nature, conditions, obligations, or incidents of the employment that the workman was brought within the zone of special danger, that injury by accident was pronounced to have arisen out of the employment. In conclusion, I desire to say that the case of Guthrie v. Kinghorn (5) is inconsistent with these decisions and with the present judgment and cannot be supported.

LORD PARMOOR [after stating the facts]: The question of law to be determined is whether upon the facts it was competent for the sheriff-substitute to find that the injuries sustained by the appellant were caused by accident arising out of her employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. The Second Division of the Court of Session have answered this question in the negative, and it is against this decision that the appeal is brought before your Lordships.

Apart from authority it appears to me to be reasonably clear, and in accordance with the ordinary natural meaning of the language of the statute to hold, that, if the conditions of his employment oblige a workman to work in a particular building or position which exposes him at the time and on the occasion of the accident to the injury for which compensation is claimed, then, although the accident is not consequent on and has no causal relation to the work on which the workman is employed, the accident arises out of his employment, as incident, not to the character of the work, but to the dangers and risks of the particular building or position in which by the condition of his employment he is obliged to work. The Workmen's Compensation Act ennotes no distinction between such dangers and risks, and dangers and risks incident to the plant required in the employment, or to the particular machine at which the workman may be engaged at the time of the accident. In either case the workman is subject to an accident which arises out of his employment. Counsel for the respondent suggested a distinction between inherent defects in a building and wreckage caused by the outside carelessness of some third party. This consideration appears to me to have no weight under the insurance principle of the Workmen's Compensation Act, in which compensation is not dependent in any way on the conduct or negligence of the employer. It was further argued that all mankind were subject to the risk of a falling wall in the proximity of new buildings, and that this consideration negatived the suggestion that the accident arose out of the employment, although the sheriff-substitute had found that the appellant was obliged, under the conditions of her employment, to work in this particular shed, which was wrecked by the fall of an adjoining wall. I am unable to assent to this argument. The fact that the risk may be common to all mankind does not disentitle a workman to compensation, if in the particular case it arises out of the employment. Any stranger walking along a road in a mine may be exposed to the risk of an accidental fall of coal, but this does not affect the claim of a miner who in the course of his duty, or to obtain access to his work, is injured by such fall. It is, no doubt, not sufficient merely to allege that the accident could not have happened if the appellant had not been in the particular shed, but this is not the case made on behalf of the respondent, and would be inconsistent with the findings of fact by the sheriff-substitute.

A large number of cases were cited to your Lordships during the argument, but it is not necessary to refer to them after the exhaustive review of them by Lord HALDANE, and I propose only to refer to the cases on which the Lord Justice-Clerk relies in support of his judgment. In Craske v. Wigan (1) it was held that it was not enough for the applicant to say: "The accident would not have happened if I had not been engaged in that employment or if I had not been in that particular place." I do not think that the present appeal necessitates any departure from this principle. The Master of the Rolls then adds that the applicant must go further and say: "The accident arose because of something I was doing in the course of my employment, or because I was exposed by the nature of my employment to some peculiar danger." The words "nature of the employment" do not occur in this part of the statute, but it is unnecessary to raise any matter of mere verbal criticism. In my opinion, if the conditions of the workman's employment oblige him to work in a particular building and thereby expose him to the risk of the accident which has happened, this may be described as a peculiar danger to which from the nature of the employment the workman is exposed. I think, however, that it is preferable to adopt the actual words of the statute in testing their applicability to the facts of a particular case. In Plumb v. Cobden Flour Mills Co., Ltd. (4), decided in this House, LORD DUNEDIN says ([1914] A.C. at p. 68):

"A risk is not incidental to the employment when either it is not due to the nature of the employment, or when it is an added peril due to the conduct of the servant himself. . . . Illustrations of the first proposition will be found in all the cases where the risk has been found to be a risk common to all mankind and not accentuated by the incidents of the employment."

A risk may be accentuated by the incidents of the employment when the conditions of employment oblige the work to be carried on in a particular building which exposes the workman to the risk of the accident which in fact has occurred. An example of the application of this principle is found in Andrew v. Pailsworth Industrial Society (20), which is approved in the opinion of LORD DUNEDIN. COLLINS, M.R., says ([1904] 2 K.B. at pp. 34, 35):

"Though [the accident] may not be connected with, or have any relation to the work a man is doing, yet, if, in point of fact, the position in which the man was doing the work, and the place he must necessarily occupy while doing the work, are a position and place of danger which caused the accident, it may fairly be said that it arose out of the employment, not because of the work, but because of the position":

see Martin v. J. Lovibond & Sons, Ltd. (8). The only other case decided in this House to which the Lord Justice-Clerk refers is Trin Joint District School Board of Management v. Kelly (21), but this is not a case which can be quoted to support the contention of the respondent. In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed, with costs.

Water—Diversion of stream—Liability for overflow—Duty to provide substituted channel sufficient to meet all demands.

It is the duty of anyone who interferes with the course of a stream to see that the works which he substitutes for the channel provided by nature are adequate to carry off the water brought down even by extraordinary rainfall, and so to secure all persons lower down the stream from all danger. The responsibility to provide a substituted channel is not limited to providing a channel sufficient to meet all demands which may reasonably be anticipated or even all demands (in excess of the ordinary) short of an act of God. There must be provided a substituted channel which will be equally efficient happen what will. Where a stream has been dammed or diverted damage from a wholly unprecedented flood results, not from the act of God, but from the act of man in that he failed to provide a channel sufficient to meet the contingency of the act of God. But for the act of man there would have been no damage from the act of God.

A Appeals from the orders of the First Division of the Court of Session affirming by a majority decisions of the Lord Ordinary (LORD DEWAR).

The facts appear in the opinion of the LORD CHANCELLOR.

Constable, K.C., and Charles H. Brown (both of the Scottish Bar) for the appellants.

B Clyde, K.C. (Lord Advocate and Dean of Faculty), W. Watson, K.C., and Douglas Jamieson (all of the Scottish Bar) for the respondents, the Caledonian Railway Co.

H. P. Macmillan, K.C., and Douglas Jamieson (both of the Scottish Bar) for the respondents, the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.

The House took time for consideration.

C July 23, 1917. The following opinions were read.

D LORD FINLAY, L.C.—The two actions which form the subject of these appeals were brought by the Caledonian Railway Co. and by the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. respectively against the corporation of Greenock, to recover damages for injury to the property of the railway companies by flooding said to have been occasioned by works carried out by the corporation. The Lord Ordinary (LORD DEWAR) decided in favour of the pursuers in both cases. The case was argued on appeal before the First Division of the Inner House, and it was directed that minutes of debate should be prepared in order that the opinion of all the judges might be obtained. That opinion by a majority in each case—seven to six in the case of the Caledonian Railway Co. and ten to three in the case of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.,—was in favour of the Lord Ordinary's views, and the Inner House, in conformity with the opinion of the majority of consulted judges, affirmed the decision of the Lord Ordinary. From that decision the corporation have appealed to your Lordships' House. The result of the appeal, in my opinion, depends mainly upon questions of fact.

F The case for the respondents was that the damage to the railway companies' property in Greenock was caused by a large volume of water which found its way down Inverkip Road (and its continuation, Inverkip Street) on Aug. 5, 1912, owing to the works constructed by the corporation in and about the channel of the West Burn obstructing its flow. Inverkip Road (by which name for convenience I shall refer to Inverkip Road proper and its continuation, Inverkip Street) runs in a direction east by north through the town of Greenock, crossing on bridges first the Glasgow and South-Western Railway, and, a little further down, the Caledonian Railway. The road comes down from the hills lying to the south-west of the town, and there is a considerable fall even after the road has entered the burgh, with a substantially continuous gradient, the level at the West Greenock station of the Caledonian Railway Co. being 20 ft. lower than at the Lady Alice Park alongside which the road passes soon after entering the burgh. The West Burn runs alongside the road above the Lady Alice Park, and brings down the drainage from an area of some 600 or 800 acres, and is liable to come down in flood in wet weather. The Lord Ordinary describes the West Burn in its natural state and as altered by the works of the corporation in the following passage of his judgment: The West Burn comes from hilly ground lying to the south-west of Greenock and enters the town at the park called the "Lady Alice Park," about 800 yards south-west of the railway station. Until a few years ago it flowed through this park for a distance of about 400 yards in a little valley. The channel of the stream was considerably below the surrounding ground which drained into it, and in particular was below the level of Inverkip Road, which lay on its north bank. In the year 1908 this little valley was presented to the town of Greenock, and the defenders, with a view to effecting a city improvement, and forming a playground for children, altered the natural channel of the West Burn and the contour of the ground. They constructed a culvert and enclosed the West Burn in it, and raised the level by depositing material on the top of the culvert. In this way a pleasure ground has been formed, but the valley has been obliterated and the burn buried. The surface of the park now slopes down to Inverkip Road, which has become the lowest level, and is the only channel for surface water formerly drained into the West Burn and for any overflow which may come from the burn before it reaches the mouth of the culvert. In addition to altering the levels in this way the defenders constructed certain works at the mouth of the culvert, which had the effect of seriously obstructing the free flow of water. These works consisted of a concrete paddling pond placed near the mouth of the culvert and constructed in such a manner that the concrete bottom of the pond is 1 ft. 7 in. higher than the original bed of the burn. At the bottom end there is a concrete curb or weir, and in the mouth of the culvert there is an iron grating to prevent children falling into the culvert. In the mouth of the culvert there are also a couple of large iron pipes which discharge surplus water from two of the corporation's reservoirs. At the top end of the paddling pond there is a concrete dam placed across the stream, with a footpath on the top, to give access from Inverkip Road to Brackelton Street, and an opening underneath—8 ft. wide by 4 ft. 5 in. high—for the passage of the burn. The footway on the top of the dam and the cope wall of the paddling pond are both above the level of Inverkip Road. It is admitted that these works obstruct about half the flow of water which would otherwise go down the culvert. That is not of importance except in times of high flood. But the rainfall in Greenock is heavy, and the West Burn is frequently in high flood. It drains an area variously estimated at from 600 to 800 acres of hill ground, and running transversely across this area there are two canals or "cuts" which connect some of the corporation reservoirs, and one of these cuts discharges surplus water into the West Burn. Like all hill burns it rises rapidly in heavy rain, but before the defenders altered the levels and constructed their works it had never caused any damage. Since the alterations were made, however, it has twice overflowed on to Inverkip Road at the mouth of the culvert and damaged property in the town—once in December, 1909, and again on the present occasion.

Before the works carried out by the corporation, the West Burn had a deep and capacious channel down which all water passed freely at a level much lower than that of Inverkip Road. The works of the corporation filled up the channel altogether, in order to form the Lady Alice Park, and substituted for the channel a culvert below the surface of the park, which was raised to a height above Inverkip Road. The result was that if the culvert proved insufficient to carry off flood water, it would overflow into Inverkip Road, which would be thus converted into the bed of a stream, down which the water would rush in the direction of the two railways. Lady Alice Park is about 400 yards long, and at its lower end the water emerges from the culvert constructed by the corporation into the open and deep channel of the West Burn, and runs down it for a distance of about 200 ft. past Leslie's Garage, which is on the left bank of the channel. The water is then conducted into a culvert crossing under the Glasgow and South-Western Railway and the Inverkip Road, whence it passes mainly by culverts to the sea.

On the forenoon of Aug. 5, 1912, very heavy rain came on in the Greenock district, which resulted in the damage forming the subject of these actions. Everything turns on the sequence of events, which appears to me to have been as follows: 10.45 the rain began; 10.50 the rain became very heavy; 11.15 an overflow of water coming down the West Burn took place from the paddling pond into the Inverkip Road; 11.20 the water pouring down Inverkip Road reached Leslie's Garage; 11.40 the flood swept Leslie's Garage buildings, with their contents, motors, &c., into the channel of the West Burn, and at 11.45 it swept away the wall of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway; 12.10 the retaining wall of the Caledonian Railway Co. at the West Station fell owing to the pressure of the water which had accumulated behind it. The Lord Ordinary found that the damage was done by the water which was diverted into the Inverkip Road by the works of the corporation at Lady Alice Park. He found that the overflow from the paddling pond began at 11.15, and that this overflow, coming down the Inverkip Road, caused

A the fall of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway wall at 11.45 and the fall of the Caledonian Railway Co.'s at 12.10. The Lord President, in an elaborate judgment, dissented from the conclusion of the Lord Ordinary in point of fact, and held that the fall of the railway walls occurred before the overflow from the paddling pond. If so, the inference is, of course, irresistible that the fall of these walls was not caused by that overflow: ante hoc ergo non propter hoc. The Lord President found that the retaining wall of the Caledonian Railway Co. gave way about ten minutes past twelve o'clock, and that the overflow of the burn and paddling pond occurred at about a quarter-past twelve. He referred especially to the evidence of Inglis, a witness for the pursuers, and said that the Lord Ordinary failed to observe that Inglis really meant a quarter-past twelve when he said that a quarter-past eleven was the time when he observed the burn overflowing from the paddling pond. This witness stated in his evidence that he saw the overflow at 11.15 from the higher ground in a market garden situate at the corner formed by the junction of Bow Road and Inverkip Road, just opposite the paddling pond. When the rain came on he took shelter in a greenhouse for a time, and went up to the higher ground in the market garden after the rain had been falling for about half an hour. As the rain began at 10.45 or thereabouts this points to about 11.15 as the time when Inglis went up to the higher ground in the garden, and 11.15 is the time he specifies in his evidence. The passage to which the Lord President refers as showing that Inglis meant 12.15 when he said 11.15 appears to me clearly to relate to a subsequent occasion altogether when he left the market garden "at the back of twelve," crossed the Bow Road, and went up through the cemetery and then down through its main gate. Taking Inglis' evidence as a whole, I have no hesitation in accepting the Lord Ordinary's understanding of his evidence as correct. Inglis' evidence so understood is consistent with the effect of other evidence in the case as a whole, and is particularly corroborated by the witnesses Smillie and Sheridan. When the pond overflowed the flood rushed down Inverkip Road and reached Leslie's Garage, pouring into the yard through the upper gateway. The men who were there described the exertions which they made to stem the flood, exertions which would probably fill up some fifteen or twenty minutes of time and bring us up to 11.40 or thereabouts—the probable time of the fall of the garage. This time is arrived at by the fact that the Glasgow and South-Western signalman, Robert Handley, fixes 11.50 as the time when he saw the flood and débris pouring along the line of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway, which they had reached through the breach in the railway wall. Reckoning back from 11.50, the hour fixed by the signalman, it appears to be probable that the Lord Ordinary was right in saying that the overflow from the pond converting the Inverkip Road into a torrent took place at about 11.15. The evidence, taken as a whole, seems to point to this conclusion, and the opinion of the judge who heard and saw the witnesses is, of course, entitled to great weight on a point of this kind.

The evidence appears to leave no doubt that the flood coming down the road from the overflow of the pond was the cause of the damage to the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co. The great volume of water which found its way into the yard of the garage at and after 11.20 cannot well have come from any other source. At about 11.40 it swept the garage buildings and their contents, including two motors, into the bed of the stream, and the flood impelled this mass of solid material against the railway wall, which collapsed. As regards the damage done to the wall of the Caledonian Railway Co., which is situate further down the Inverkip Road, it was strongly contended for the corporation that after the collapse of the garage buildings at 11.40 the flood proceeding from the overflow at the paddling pond would rush through the garage yard into the bed of the stream, and when the wall fell, down the line of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway, so that any contribution from the West Burn to the fall of the Caledonian Railway wall would from that time have been impossible. I do not think that this is correct in point of fact. Though the gate at the upper end of the garage yard was open, the fence remained between the yard and the road, and the lower gate was closed. This would be quite enough to ensure that a great part of the flood would continue in its course down the Inverkip Road and would not be diverted into the garage yard. The West Greenock station of the Caledonian Railway Co. is situated in the angle formed by the junction of Roxburgh Street with Inverkip Road, and at the junction there is an open space spoken of in the evidence as the Railway Square. Very soon after the rainfall began water began to gather in this square, pouring into it from the adjacent streets, and began to accumulate behind a retaining wall of the railway company forming part of the station buildings. This wall ultimately collapsed, owing to the pressure of the water upon it, and the action is brought by the Caledonian Railway Co. on the allegation that its fall was caused or materially contributed to by the flood from the West Burn, which, after the overflow from the paddling pond, found its way down Inverkip Road into the square, and thence upon the railway premises. It was contended by the corporation that the damage to this wall was done entirely by water from other sources and that their works were in no way responsible for what happened.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that in point of fact the flood coming down Inverkip Road caused by the diversion into this road of the water which, but for the corporation's works, would have found its way to the sea by the open channel, substantially contributed to the disaster. As soon as it is established that the overflow from the paddling pond preceded the fall of the retaining wall by nearly an hour, it is almost impossible to suppose that the great volume of water which from this source would find its way into the square both before and after the fall of the garage would not contribute substantially to what followed. It would require a very clear case upon the evidence to justify a reversal of the finding of fact by the Lord Ordinary, before whom the case was tried, and, in my opinion, the effect of the evidence as a whole is to show that the Lord Ordinary was right. [His LORDSHIP reviewed the evidence given by certain of the witnesses and continued:] All this evidence goes to show that the greatest volume of water which came down to the Caledonian Railway Square was from the Inverkip Road, and that it started coming down from that direction with suddenness at some time between eleven and twelve. It appears to me that the reasonable inference is that this flood coming down the Inverkip Road proceeded from the overflow of the burn from the paddling pond caused by the corporation's works there. When once it is established that this very considerable volume of water came down the Inverkip Road, beginning at 11.15, it appears to me only reasonable to conclude that it substantially contributed to the pressure of the water upon the retaining wall of the Caledonian Railway Co. and its consequent collapse, and it appears to me to have been the main, if not the only, cause of the fall of the garage and the consequent destruction of the wall of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway.

It remains to consider the questions of law raised on behalf of the appellants. The question of the liability incurred by any person who interferes with a natural watercourse was considered in the Court of Session in Kerr v. Earl of Orkney (1). In that case a dam had been constructed on a stream for the purpose of collecting water, and Lord Justice Clerk HOPE makes the following observations as to the extent of the liability for damage occasioned by the escape of such water (20 Dunl. Ct. of Sess.) at p. 302):

"Although we did not require any answer from the respondent upon the general point of Lord Orkney's liability for the consequences of his dam bursting from a violent fall of rain, yet I think it right to state the general principle on which the view of the court is founded. That principle is—that if a person chooses upon a stream to make a great operation for collecting and damming up the water, for whatever purpose, he is bound, as the necessary condition of such an operation, to accomplish his object in such a way as to protect all persons lower down the stream from all danger. He must secure them against danger. It is not sufficient that he took all the pains which were thought at the time necessary and sufficient. They were exposed to no danger

A before the operation. He creates the danger, and he must secure them against danger, so as to make them as safe, notwithstanding his dam, as they were before. It is no defence in such a case to allege the dam would have stood against all ordinary rains—it gave way in an extraordinary and unprecedented fall of rain which could not be expected. The dam must be made perfect against all extraordinary falls of rain—else the protection is not afforded against the operation which the party must accomplish. An extraordinary fall of rain is a matter which, in our climate, cannot be called a damnum fatale—supposing the doctrine so denoted by that term to be applicable, generally speaking, to a dam for collecting water. And the experience of the last fifteen years has shown that the increased drainage of the country brings down in heavy rains the whole water in a very short space of time, and therefore in floods of a weight and power and force of water quite unknown in former times. But against such a state of things the party forming such dams must completely provide so as to secure safety to those lower down the stream. When an operation is made which involves great risk to the safety of life and property, the condition on which alone that can be allowed which causes such risk is complete protection. A dam that gives way in a night's rain is not such as the maker was bound to erect. The fact that it gives way is a proof that his obligation was not fulfilled, and that the protection was not afforded which he was bound to provide. What shall be considered a damnum fatale in such a case I need not inquire, but of this I am very clear, that a great fall of rain and consequent accumulation and weight of water is not a damnum fatale which exempts the proprietor from liability for the failure of his operation, for it is against such accumulation and weight of water that he is bound to provide."

In my opinion, the Lord Justice Clerk in that passage correctly stated the law of Scotland, and it received approval in your Lordships' House when the Earl of Orkney's Case (1) came under consideration in Tennent v. Earl of Glasgow (2). In that case the defender had substituted a wall for a hedge as a defence for his property. A stream burst its banks at a point above the wall, and the water descending was damned up by the wall, which after a time gave way and considerable damage was done by the accumulated water to the lands of an inferior inheritor. In giving judgment LORD WESTBURY says (2 Macph. (Ct. of Sess.) (H.L.) at p. 26 :

"This case differs very much from those which have been cited and relied on at the Bar. If anything be done by an individual which interferes with natural occurrences, such as, for example, in Lord Orkney's Case (1), throwing a dam across the course of a stream, it is undoubtedly the duty of that person so to construct the work as to provide in an efficient manner, not only against usual occurrences and ordinary state of things, but also to provide against things which are unusual and extraordinary. And therefore the decision of the court in the Earl of Orkney's Case (1), where a dam gave way, was properly referable to that circumstance."

LORD CHELMSFORD says (ibid. at p. 28) :

"This case is not at all like the case of Lord Orkney (1)—that is the case with respect to the dam—because there, as I have already intimated, the stream before the erection of the dam flowed harmlessly to the pursuer's mill. Lord Orkney erected a dam, by which he obstructed and headed up the course of the water. He was bound, therefore, under those circumstances—interfering with the stream and with another person's rights over the stream—to provide against every contingency. And although it was an extraordinary flood in that case which occasioned the bursting of the dam, it was one which he ought to have provided against. He ought to have made the dam capable of resisting any force which might be directed against it."

These authorities justify the view of the law propounded by PROFESSOR RANKINE A in his work on the LAW OF LAND OWNERSHIP IN SCOTLAND (4th Edn.), p. 376:

"The sound view seems to be that even in the case of an unprecedented disaster the person who constructs an opus manufactum on the course of a stream or diverts its flow will be liable in damages provided the injured proprietor can show (i) that the opus has not been fortified by prescription and (ii) that but for it the phenomena would have passed him scathless." B

This passage, in my opinion, expresses the true view of the law applicable to this case.

The appellants contend that they are not responsible, as the injury to the wall was in the nature of damnum fatale. What amounts to damnum fatale? Its definition is given by LORD WESTBURY in Tennent v. Earl of Glasgow (2) (2 Macph. C (Ct. of Sess.) (H.L.) at pp. 26, 27):

"Under these circumstances, my Lords, what has occurred is one of those things which do not involve any legal liability—what are denominated in the law of Scotland damnum fatale occurrences—circumstances which no human foresight can provide against, and of which human prudence is not bound to recognise the possibility, and which when they do occur, therefore, are calamities which do not involve the obligation of paying for the consequences that may result from them." D

LORD CECIL expressed the same idea in a picturesque phrase used by him in Samuel v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Rail. Co. (3), when he said (13 Dunl. (Ct. of Sess.) at p. 314):

"I think he is bound to provide against the ordinary operations of nature, but not against her miracles." E

In my opinion, the appellants have entirely failed to establish any defence on this ground. It is true that the flood was of extraordinary violence, but floods of extraordinary violence must be anticipated as likely to take place from time to time. It is the duty of anyone who interferes with the course of a stream to see that the works which he substitutes for the channel provided by nature are adequate to carry off the water brought down even by extraordinary rainfall, and if damage results from the deficiency of the substitute which he has provided for the natural channel, he will be liable. Such damage is not in the nature of damnum fatale, but is the direct result of the obstruction of a natural water course by the defenders' works followed by heavy rain. F

Reliance was placed by the appellants upon Nichols v. Marsland (4). In that case it was decided that if the escape of water from a reservoir was due to the act of God, the person maintaining the reservoir was not liable. As MELLISH, L.J., put it (2 Ex.D. at p. 5): G

"If, indeed, the damages were occasioned by the act of the party without more—as where a man accumulated water on his own land, but owing to the peculiar nature or condition of the soil the water escapes and does damage to his neighbour, the case of Rylands v. Fletcher (5) establishes that he must be held liable." H

The lord justice then goes on to decide that if the bursting of the reservoir was due to the act of God the liability to pay damages does not arise. Nichols v. Marsland (4) had been tried by a jury, and the finding of the jury is thus stated by MELLISH, L.J., (ibid. at pp. 5, 6): I

"The remaining question is, did the defendant make out that the escape of water was owing to the act of God? Now the jury have distinctly found not only that there was no negligence in the construction or the maintenance of the reservoirs, but that the flood was so great that it could not reasonably have been anticipated, although, if it had been anticipated, the effect might have been prevented; and this seems to us in substance a finding that the

A escape of the water was owing to the act of God. However great the flood had been, if it had not been greater than floods that had happened before and might be expected to occur again, the defendant might not have made out that she was free from fault, but we think she ought not to be held liable because she did not prevent the effect of an extraordinary act of nature which she could not anticipate."

B Two observations arise upon this case of Nichols v. Marsland (4). The first is that the case is dealt with in the argument and judgments with reference merely to the accumulation of water in a reservoir. There is no reference to the fact that the course of a natural stream had been interfered with. The operations which had in fact been carried out are described as follows (L.R. 10 Exch. at p. 256):

C "A natural stream called Bagbrook, which rose in higher lands, ran through the defendant's grounds, and after leaving them flowed under the four county bridges in question. After entering the defendant's grounds the stream was diverted and dammed up by an artificial embankment into a pool of three acres in area, called 'the upper pool,' from which it escapes over a weir in the embankment, and was again similarly dammed up by an artificial embankment
D into the 'middle pool,' which was between one and two acres in area. Escaping over a weir in the embankment, it was again dammed up into the 'lower pool,' which was between eight and nine acres in area, and from which the stream escaped into its natural and original course."

This decision, having reference merely to the storage of water as in Rylands v. Fletcher (5), does not affect the question of liability for interference with the course of a natural stream as laid down in the authorities cited above. Secondly, the jury had found that the damage was occasioned by the act of God, and there is this note (2 Ex.D. at p. 6):

E "The question whether the rule should be made absolute for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence, was reserved for future discussion if the plaintiff should desire it."

F It does not appear that this question was ever again brought up for discussion in the Exchequer Chamber.

In the case now under appeal the Lord Ordinary found, and, in my opinion, rightly found, that the flood could not be regarded as in the nature of damnum fatale, and that the appellants in constructing the culvert ought to have foreseen
G the possibility of such an occurrence and to have provided against it. In my opinion, both the appeals fail upon all points, and should be dismissed with costs.

LORD DUNEDIN.—I concur. The Lord Chancellor has gone so fully into the evidence, and I am so entirely in accordance with the view he has taken of the events of the morning of Aug. 5, 1912, that I cannot think of inflicting on your
H Lordships what would only be a repetition of what he has said. I agree with the Lord Ordinary and disagree with the Lord President as to the time at which the overflow at the pond took place. As to the appellants being in fact responsible for the alteration of the bed of the stream, which made what happened possible, there is no dispute. The only question that remains is whether the responsibility in fact entails a responsibility in law.

I I think I am making an accurate statement when I say that Kerr v. Earl of Orkney (1) has been since its date considered by Scottish lawyers to have been well decided, and it will from henceforth enjoy the approval of the noble Lord on the Woolsack, and I believe of the other noble Lords who have taken part in this appeal. Leading counsel for the appellants, in his address, which was equally admirable for its force and its moderation, felt that he was pressed by that case and argued that though the decision itself was right, the dicta in it must be regarded as modified by what had since been decided, and notably by Nichols v. Marsland (4) and Fletcher v. Smith (6). Nichols v. Marsland (4) was, as his Lordship has pointed out, decided upon the footing of the verdict of the jury, which, as construed by the court, amounted to a direct finding that the occurrence in question was an act of God, which is the exact equivalent to the expression used in the Scottish cases, damnum fatale. Lord Justice Clerk Hope, in Kerr v. Earl of Orkney (1), expressly saved the case of damnum fatale, adding that whatever might be a damnum fatale, an extraordinary fall of rain in the climate of Scotland could not be so considered. But, further, what I think makes it clear that the doctrine of act of God or damnum fatale, which was what was given effect to in Nichols v. Marsland (4), did not in any way weaken the authority of Kerr v. Earl of Orkney (1) is the way in which that case was considered and treated in a subsequent case in your Lordships' House—namely, Tennent v. Earl of Glasgow (2). In that case the Earl of Glasgow had built a wall along a road where a hedge had been. There was a burn which ran parallel to the road at a distance of about a quarter of a mile. The burn eventually entered beneath the road by a conduit, and an opening had been made in the wall to allow of the burn entering the conduit. There was an extraordinary fall of rain, and the burn burst its banks at a place where there was a bend, invaded the road at a place far above the entrance of the conduit, and formed an accumulation behind the wall, through which it eventually burst and caused the damage complained of. LORD WESTBURY, L.C., said as follows:

"If anything be done by an individual which interferes with natural occurrences, such as, for example, in Lord Orkney's Case (1), throwing a dam across the course of a stream, it is undoubtedly the duty of that individual so to construct the work as to provide in an effectual manner not only against usual occurrences and ordinary states, but also to provide against things which are unusual and extraordinary; and therefore the decision of the court in the Earl of Orkney's Case (1) was properly referable to that circumstance. . . . But there was nothing which the noble defender was bound to guard against in the building of a wall along the public road. . . . The wall was not erected for the purpose of interfering with anything like that which has been called at the Bar the course of nature. . . . Under the circumstances what has occurred is one of those things which do not involve any legal liability—which are denominated in the law of Scotland damnum fatale occurrences—circumstances which no human foresight can provide against, and of which human prudence is not bound to recognise the possibility, and which when they do occur, therefore, are calamities that do not involve the obligation of paying for the consequences that may result from them."

In an earlier part of his judgment he had said:

"It might have been a very material thing in this case if the injury, or the wrong I should rather call it, sustained by the appellant could have been shown to be caused by a state of circumstances directly occasioned by the building of the wall by the noble defender over the conduit and along the parish road, because it is clear that the natural course of the stream was down the parish road and that the conduit provided a means of carrying the water beneath the parish road."

It is clear that a case decided by the Inner House of the Court of Session, and afterwards approved by your Lordships' House in another Scottish case, cannot as authority be overruled or modified by a decision of the English Exchequer Chamber. But the truth is that, once it is recognised that Nichols v. Marsland (4) proceeded on the verdict of the jury, there is no inconsistency between that case and Kerr v. Earl of Orkney (1).

As regards Fletcher v. Smith (6) there was again a finding of the jury that precludes any effect of it as a decision against Kerr v. Earl of Orkney (1) for the jury found that the substituted watercourse was not as efficient as the old. The appellants, however, pinned their faith to the preference expressed by LORD

A PENZANCE (though he expressly declined to give a positive opinion on the matter) for the second as opposed to the third of the questions he put. These questions were :

B "Secondly, were the defendants bound, as they were making a new and artificial watercourse, to construct it in such a manner that it would be capable of carrying off the water that might flow into it from all such floods and rainfalls as might reasonably be anticipated to happen in that locality? Or, thirdly, were they bound to make provision for any such quantities of water as might possibly be discharged into it from any mere rainfall however unusual and however contrary to present experience?"

C The second proposition, as contrasted with the first, is really of no assistance to the appellants unless it is possible to extract from the phrases used a definition of what is and what is not, a damnum fatale. The appellants argue that, applying LORD PENZANCE's test, if they can show that this rainfall was much in excess of what had been previously observed in Greenock, that is enough. I do not think that you can rightly confine your view to Greenock alone. No one can say that such rainfall was unprecedented in Scotland; and I think the appellants were bound to consider that some day Greenock might be subjected to the same rainfall as other places in Scotland had been subjected to. With deference to LORD D D PENZANCE, I think that there is no clear-cut choice in law between his two propositions; but that it always comes to a question of fact whether such and such an occurrence was a damnum fatale: and I hold a clear opinion that this flood was not. I agree with the Lord Chancellor that the law is accurately stated by E PROFESSOR RANKINE in his book. I may perhaps add that the expression "fortified by prescription" does not, I think, mean that the work is protected by the actual prescription statutes, but that by analogy (as such analogy has been applied in the case of servitudes) the existence of a state of things for the period of the long prescription may serve to prevent any person alleging that another state of things was the true state of nature. The appeal, in my judgment, should be dismissed.

F LORD SHAW.—I concur. In the view taken by that very careful and sagacious judge, LORD DEWAR (Lord Ordinary), there is no refinement of fact about the case. He says :

G "I think it is out of the question for them (the corporation) to argue that they were entitled to bury the burn, which from time immemorial had carried flood waters safely to the sea, and to alter the levels so that the public highway, leading on a descending gradient into the town, became the only means by which these flood waters could escape."

As to whether this was the actual state of the facts, I express my opinion in the affirmative. I agree with the analysis of, and conclusions upon, the evidence made by the learned Lord Ordinary and by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. H This being as stated, the law of the case appears to be in no way doubtful. I have never known the law of Scotland, as stated in the judgment of the Lord Justice Clerk HORE in the Earl of Orkney's Case (1), to be questioned. On the contrary, it has been, since its date, accepted as sound. And I think it right to add, being in this fortified by the opinion of the noble and learned Lord Chancellor, that I know of no decided authority for the proposition that there is a difference I on this topic between the law of England and that of Scotland. A person making an operation for collecting and damming up the water of a stream must so work as to make proprietors or occupants on a lower level as secure against injury as they would have been had nature not been interfered with. And this is so, although the water accumulated suddenly, and the fall was extraordinary or even unprecedented in quantity. These are the general propositions of the law. While, if any help as to Scottish climatic conditions might be sought, one would get that also from the observation made by Lord Justice Clerk HORE and, by the way, plainly applicable in the present case—who said :

"An extraordinary fall of rain . . . in our climate, cannot be called a damnum fatale—supposing the doctrine so denoted by that term to be applicable, generally speaking, to a dam for collecting water."

No doubt whatsoever is thrown upon these doctrines by Nichols v. Marsland (4). A perusal of the judgments and procedure therein shows that it was held by a jury's finding that the disaster did as a matter of fact occur by a damnum fatale. I cannot, I confess, view the case as wholly satisfactory; but its conclusion was reached undoubtedly and solely by the road of settled fact—an affirmation of damnum fatale. Such an affirmation has not been made in the present case, and, in my opinion, on its merits as well as on the guide to a proper view thereof as expressed in the outstanding authority of Kerr v. Earl of Orkney (1), which I have cited, such an affirmation could not be made. These occurrences arose from a heavy, it may be an extraordinary and it may be an unprecedented, spate. That spate would have harmlessly passed away but for the appellants' operations. These operations, however, converted them into sources of harm and damage, and the appellants are thus answerable therefor. In the words of LORD CHELMSFORD in Tennent v. Earl of Glasgow (2) (2 Macph. (Ct. of Sess.) (H.L.) at p. 28)—a case which in substance entirely approved of the principle of Kerr v. Earl of Orkney (1):

"He was bound, therefore, under these circumstances—interfering with the stream and with another person's right over the stream—to provide against every contingency. And although it was an extraordinary flood in that case which occasioned the bursting of the dam, it was one which he ought to have provided against."

It is accordingly quite unnecessary to go into the doctrine of damnum fatale in general. I am not entirely satisfied that that expression, or the equivalent expression "the act of God," will ever be capable of complete, exact, and unassailable definition. The nearest approach which the law has made to that point is in the judgment of LORD WESTBURY, L.C., in Tennent v. Earl of Glasgow (2). Further, I may be allowed to express the doubt whether expressions such as those used by LORD COCKBURN in Samuel v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Rail. Co. (3) (13 Dunl. (Ct. of Sess.) at p. 314) as to nature's "miracles" do anything to clarify, or, indeed, whether they do not confuse, the issue. And I am quite clear that when in Potter v. Hamilton and Strathaven Rail. Co. (7) LORD ARDMILLAN supplemented his citation from LORD WESTBURY's judgment in Tennent's Case (2) by the observation (3 Macph. (Ct. of Sess.) at p. 86):

"A person who makes a new work is bound to protect those on a lower level from extraordinary as well as ordinary accumulations of water, provided they be not such as to amount to an unprecedented event, so improbable and unnatural as could not have been reasonably anticipated," such a gloss is not warranted by law. Its effect might be to whittle away and undermine an affirmation of the law which, without it, would be, as it was meant to be and is, broad and firm.

LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—I agree. With regard to the facts I cannot find any valid reason for dissenting from the findings of the Lord Ordinary, and Kerr v. Earl of Orkney (1), approved by this House in Tennent v. Earl of Glasgow (2), is undoubtedly the governing authority. I do not understand that the Lord Justice Clerk in the former case intended to decide that the Scottish doctrine of damnum fatale could never have any application in cases such as that with which he was dealing, but merely that the facts before him disclosed no such damnum. If this be so, Kerr v. Earl of Orkney (1) is not in conflict with the English authorities. Rylands v. Fletcher (5) saved the question whether the act of God might not have afforded a defence, and this question was answered in the affirmative in Nichols v. Marsland (4) in which the act of God had been established by the finding of the jury, though I have some doubt whether such finding was

A correct. With regard to Fletcher v. Smith (6) it decides nothing, but I think the House was inclined to accept the view of the law which had been taken in Nichols v. Marsland (4), though it is true that LORD PENZANCE'S alternatives were not very clearly stated.

B LORD WRENBURY referred to the facts and continued: Numerous cases have been cited, beginning in England with Rylands v. Fletcher (5) and in Scotland with Samuel v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Rail. Co. (3) and Kerr v. Earl of Orkney (1). But in none of these was the question one as to liability for the consequences resulting from works in alveo fluminis whereby the natural alveus was filled up and the flow of water under the force of gravity thrown into a new channel at a new and higher level. The effect of the corporation's works was that, except in
C so far as their culvert sufficed to take and took water coming from the westward, the Inverkip Road was substituted for the V of the valley, and became the channel by which all that water had to be drained away. In such a case the corporation is responsible, I conceive, for resultant damage howsoever arising. The responsibility to provide a substituted channel is not limited to providing a channel sufficient to meet all demands which might reasonably be anticipated, or even all
D demands (in excess of the ordinary) short of the act of God. The corporation must provide a substituted channel which will be equally efficient happen what will. Assuming an act of God, such as a flood, wholly unprecedented, the damage in such a case results not from the act of God, but from the act of man in that he failed to provide (as there was before) a channel sufficient to meet the contingency of the act of God. But for the act of man there would have been no damage from E the act of God. The case is not that of a man who has brought a wild beast upon his land and has effectually chained him and the chain has been broken by an act of God. That was Nichols v. Marsland (4). It is a case in which the act of God—if there was one here—brought the wild beast, and but for the act of man there was a safe exit for the wild beast, and he would have gone away and there would have been no injury done. The act of man consisted in closing the exit,
F which, had it remained, would have rendered the advent of the wild beast harmless. To construct a reservoir upon a man's own land is a lawful act. To close or divert the natural line of flow of a stream so as to render it less efficient is not. It has never been held that in such a case there is not liability.

Upon the facts in the Glasgow and South-Western case I do not add anything. I am satisfied that, whether their wall fell before or after the overflow of the pond,
G the damage resulted from the fact that the corporation had made the Inverkip Road a sort of substituted alveus fluminis, and that the wreckage of the garage, the consequent blocking of the Glasgow and South-Western culvert, and the resultant fall of the wall, are due to that state of things. Upon the Caledonian case I have felt much more difficulty. When the Glasgow and South-Western wall fell at 11.40 or 11.45 there was opened to the flood a new channel of ample capacity and
H at a much lower level—viz., the Glasgow and South-Western tunnel down to the Princes Pier. There was, I think, upon the evidence, very considerable means of access from the Inverkip Road to that new channel. The respondents have an arduous task to maintain that the fall of the Caledonian wall some half-hour later, at 12.10, was due to water coming from the westward down the Inverkip Road and not flood water of which there was plenty reaching the Station Square from
I other directions. But as your Lordships are satisfied that the evidence is sufficient to support the Caledonian case, I do not take it upon myself to differ from your Lordships' conclusion.

Originating Summons to determine whether certain trustees had power under a will to appoint the Public Trustee a sole trustee in their place or in the alternative if they had not the power, that the court should appoint the Public Trustee sole trustee thereof.

The testator, who died many years before the Public Trustee Act, 1906, by his will gave his residuary estate to his wife and certain other persons whom he appointed executors thereof. The trusts of the will are immaterial, but it contained an express power for his wife during her widowhood and in case of her remarriage for her and the surviving or continuing trustees or trustee, or for the last retiring trustees or trustee to appoint new trustees thereof, and the testator provided that upon such appointment the number of trustees might be augmented or reduced so that the number should not be raised above four or reduced below three. The widow died in 1915, and the two surviving trustees were anxious to retire and appoint the Public Trustee in their place. The Public Trustee was willing to act if he could be validly appointed a sole trustee and the beneficiaries desired that he should be appointed. The question turned on the meaning of s. 5 (1) of the Public Trustee Act, 1906, taken in conjunction with ss. 10 and 25 of Trustee Act, 1893, and what was the effect thereof, and the summons stood over to allow the Public Trustee to be added as a party to argue the question.

By s. 10 of the Trustee Act, 1893 [see now s. 36 of Trustee Act, 1925]:

"(1) Where a trustee, either original or substituted, and whether appointed by a court or otherwise, . . . desires to be discharged from all or any of the trusts or powers reposed in or conferred on him, . . . then the person or persons nominated for the purpose of appointing new trustees by the instrument, if any, creating the trust . . . may, by writing, appoint another person or other

- A persons to be a trustee or trustees in the place of the trustee . . . desiring to be discharged. (2) On the appointment of a new trustee for the whole or any part of trust property: (a) The number of trustees may be increased, and . . . (c) it shall not be obligatory to appoint more than one new trustee where only one trustee was originally appointed, or to fill up the original number of trustees where more than two trustees were originally appointed; but, except
- B where only one trustee was originally appointed, a trustee shall not be discharged under this section from his trust unless there will be at least two trustees to perform the trust. . . . (3) Every new trustee so appointed as well before as after all the trust property becomes by law, or by assurance or otherwise, vested in him, shall have the same powers, authorities, and discretions, and may in all respects act as if he had been originally appointed a trustee by the instrument, if any, creating the trust. (4) The provisions of
- C this section relative to a trustee who is dead include the case of a person nominated trustee in a will but dying before the testator, and those relative to a continuing trustee, including a refusing or retiring trustee, if willing to act in the execution of the provisions of this section. (5) This section applies only if and as far as a contrary intention is not expressed in the instrument, if any, creating the trust, and shall have effect subject to the terms of that instrument and to any provisions therein contained. (6) This section applies to trusts
- D created either before or after the commencement of this Act."

By s. 25 of the Trustee Act, 1893 [see now s. 41 of the Trustee Act, 1925] :

- E "(1) The High Court may, whenever it is expedient to appoint a new trustee or new trustees, and it is found inexpedient, difficult, or impracticable so to do without the assistance of the court, make an order for the appointment of a new trustee or new trustees either in substitution for or in addition to any existing trustee or trustees, or although there is no existing trustee. In particular, and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provision,
- F the court may make an order for the appointment of a new trustee in substitution for a trustee who is convicted of felony or is a bankrupt. (2) An order under this section, and any consequential vesting order or conveyance, shall not operate further or otherwise as a discharge to any former or continuing trustee than an appointment of new trustees under any power for that purpose contained in any instrument would have operated. (3) Nothing in this section shall give power to appoint an executor or administrator."
- G

By s. 5 of the Public Trustee Act, 1906 :

- H "(1) The Public Trustee may by that name or any other sufficient description be appointed to be trustee of any will or settlement or other instrument creating a trust or to perform any trust or duty belonging to a class which he is authorised by the rules made under this Act to accept and may be so appointed whether the will or settlement or instrument creating the trust or duty was made or came into operation before or after the passing of this Act and either as an original or as a new trustee or as an additional trustee in the same cases and in the same manner and by the same persons or court as if he were a private trustee with this addition that though the trustees originally
- I appointed were two or more the public trustee may be appointed sole trustee. (2) Where the public trustee has been appointed a trustee of any trust a co-trustee may retire from the trust under and in accordance with s. 11 of the Trustee Act, 1893, notwithstanding that there are not more than two trustees and without such consents as are required by that section. (3) The Public Trustee shall not be so appointed either as a new or additional trustee where the will, settlement, or other instrument creating the trust or duty contains a direction to the contrary unless the court otherwise order."

The originating summons was taken out both under Ord. 55, r. 3, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, and under ss. 25, 35, and 36 of the Trustee Act, 1906. A

Cur. adv. vult.

SARGANT, J.—This summons raises the important question whether persons having the statutory power of appointing new trustees of a will can appoint the Public Trustee as the sole trustee of the will notwithstanding that the will contains a provision that upon any appointment of new trustees the number is not to be reduced below three. In Re Leslie's Hassop Estates (1) EVE, J., has expressed a clear opinion in favour of such an appointment. But the actual decision in that case was merely that the court could make such an appointment, and the relevant statutory provisions are not precisely the same in the case of an appointment by the court as in the case of individual appointors. Here the persons proposing to make the appointment are the retiring trustees themselves, and, inasmuch as both they and the beneficiaries under the settlement are desirous that the appointment should be made, there has been some difficulty in securing an effective argument against the proposed appointment. But by arrangement the Public Trustee has been served with the summons, and counsel on his behalf has assisted me by pointing out very effectively such objections as there are to the appointment. Though I have not been convinced by his arguments, yet, out of respect to them and because of the general importance of the question, I have thought it well to put the reasons for my judgment into writing. B

Counsel's objections were two in number. The first was that on its true construction s. 5 of the Public Trustee Act merely brings the Public Trustee within the scope of the statutory power contained in s. 10 of the Trustee Act and enables his appointment under that section: that accordingly any such appointment of the Public Trustee is subject to all the restrictions of s. 10, including those in sub-s. (2) (c) and sub-s. (5), and that in the present case these last restrictions clearly prohibit the appointment now proposed. I am, however, of opinion that the first link in this chain of reasoning is defective. It seems to me that s. 5 of the Public Trustee Act, 1906, is not merely by way of addition to the statutory power, but is a positive and independent enactment enabling the appointment of the Public Trustee on every occasion on which a private trustee could be appointed. For instance, after as well as before s. 5 of the Trustee Act, 1893, or its legislative predecessors such as s. 31 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 5 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882, and s. 6 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892, there are cases in which the power of appointing new trustees rests entirely on the provisions of the will or settlement in question and is wholly independent of any statutory power, and the language of s. 5 of the Public Trustee Act, 1906, obviously allows the appointment of the Public Trustee in these cases as well as in the cases governed by the general legislation. It is true that the occasion of appointment, the manner of appointment, and the persons appointing are to be the same in the case of the Public Trustee as in the case of any other trustee. But this was in the main necessary to prevent conflict of overlapping, and in any case the use of referential words of this kind is sufficiently explicable by reasons of convenience, and is not of itself enough to convert into a mere modification or extension of the statutory power that which is on the face of it a power separate from and independent of the statute. Indeed, though it may not be necessary to go so far in this particular case, I am inclined to adopt the broad general view suggested by counsel for the applicants that (subject, of course, to the restrictions imposed by sub-ss. (3) and (4)) sub-s. (1) enables the Public Trustee to be appointed in all cases of appointment as the sole trustee, and sub-s. (2) enables the Public Trustee to be left in all cases of retirement as the sole trustee. On this view of the effect of s. 5 of the Public Trustee Act, 1906, it is unnecessary for me to consider whether the terms of sub-s. (1) of C

A that section are in themselves sufficient to override in this respect the provisions of sub-s. (5) of s. 10 of the Trustee Act, 1833. But in saying this I must not be understood as in any way dissenting from the view expressed by EVE, J., that they are sufficient.

B Counsel's second objection was the more obvious one that the provision in the settlement that the number of trustees is not to be reduced below three is a direction to the contrary within the meaning of sub-s. (3) of s. 5. It is, however, to be observed that the direction to the contrary which is dealt with by the subsection is primarily, at all events, a direction entirely prohibiting the appointment of the Public Trustee, and has no special reference at all to his appointment as a sole trustee. The language is very different from that of sub-s. (5) of s. 10 of the Trustee Act. Here it is admitted that, apart from the question of number, there is nothing whatever to prevent the appointment of the Public Trustee as one of the trustees of the will. And even if the provision in the will is to be deemed a direction that the Public Trustee, like any other trustee, is to be one of not less than three (which I very much doubt, having regard to the entirely new constitution and position of the statutory corporation constituted by the Public Trustee Act), I am of opinion that this direction is surmounted by the concluding words of sub-s. (1) of s. 5 of the Act, and is not a direction to the contrary within the true meaning of sub-s. (5) of the section. Accordingly I propose to declare that on the true construction of the will, and in the events which have happened, the applicants have power to appoint the Public Trustee sole trustee of the will in their place. The costs of adding the Public Trustee and of the adjournment into court as between solicitor and client are to be paid by the Public Trustee, and the rest of the costs of the summons as between solicitor and client are to be paid out of the trust estate.

Appeal by defendant and cross-appeal by plaintiff from orders made by BAILHACHE, J., in an action tried by him with a common jury.

The plaintiff was a taxicab driver and the defendant was a sergeant of the Metropolitan Police. On Aug. 5, 1916, between 8 and 8.15 p.m., the plaintiff, who had just taken out a taxicab at Shepherd's Bush, was engaged by a Lieutenant Tait to drive him and his wife to Uxbridge, the fare being agreed beforehand at 17s. 6d. The engine was not pulling well, and three times on the way to Uxbridge the plaintiff had to stop and descend from the cab and make some adjustment. In consequence they arrived at Uxbridge later than had been anticipated. Lieutenant Tait, who had to rejoin his regiment at Denham, was afraid that he had missed at Uxbridge the train to Denham, and he asked the plaintiff to drive on from Uxbridge to the camp at Denham, three miles further on. The plaintiff declined to go on to Denham. An altercation arose. Lieutenant Tait appealed to a policeman, and the policeman called the defendant. The sergeant considered that the plaintiff was the worse for drink, and took him to the police station. The plaintiff arrived at the station about 9.20 p.m. The divisional surgeon was sent for, and he arrived about 9.40 p.m. He applied to the plaintiff the usual tests for drunkenness, and then signed his report, which stated that the plaintiff "smells of drink, but is not drunk." The defendant signed the charge sheet, and the sergeant on duty at the station accepted the charge. Later that night the plaintiff's employer came to the police station and bailed out the plaintiff. The plaintiff subsequently appeared before the magistrates, when the charge against him was dismissed. Thereupon the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution. The action came on before BAILHACHE, J., and a common jury. The learned judge left the following questions to the jury: (i) Did the defendant honestly believe at the time he arrested the plaintiff that the plaintiff was drunk?—Answer: Yes. (ii) Did the defendant honestly believe at the time he signed the charge sheet that the plaintiff was drunk?—Answer: No. (iii) Damages (if any) for false imprisonment.—Answer: Four guineas. (iv) Damages (if any) for malicious prosecution.—Answer: Twenty guineas. Upon those findings his Lordship entered judgment for the defendant on the charge of false imprisonment and for the plaintiff on the charge of malicious prosecution with the damages assessed by the jury. The defendant applied for judgment or a new trial on appeal from the verdict and judgment as to the malicious prosecution. The plaintiff cross-appealed against that part of the verdict and judgment which ordered that judgment should be entered for the defendant on the issue of false imprisonment. D

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 6, 1917. The following judgments were read.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—This action was brought to recover damages for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution, and was tried before BAILHACHE, J., and

A a common jury. He left certain questions to the jury, and, having regard to their answers, he directed judgment for the defendant upon the claim for false imprisonment and for the plaintiff for £21 damages upon the claim for malicious prosecution. Each side appeals. The plaintiff contends that on the claim for false imprisonment judgment should be entered for him for £4 4s., being the amount of damages provisionally assessed by the jury. The defendant contends that upon the claim B for malicious prosecution judgment should be entered for him as well as upon the claim for false imprisonment.

[His Lordship stated the facts as above set forth, and continued:] The plaintiff's evidence was that he was a teetotaller from the previous February until the evening in question, when before starting he had only drunk a portion of some elder wine with which he had been supplied, as the house had no "tonic water," C for which he had called. With reference to the defendant's appeal against the judgment for malicious prosecution it will be observed that the form of the second question put to the jury is ambiguous. It is open to the interpretation that the jury were asked whether the defendant believed at the time when he signed the charge sheet that the plaintiff was then drunk, not whether he then believed that he was drunk when he was arrested, and the way in which the case was conducted at D the trial gives support to the belief that this was the sense and meaning in which the jury understood it. But it is not necessary to pursue this matter further, as there is a fatal objection to the plaintiff's recovering on the ground of malicious prosecution, and that is that there is no evidence anywhere of any malice. The parties were entire strangers until, after complaint had been made to the police by a member of the public, the defendant, in the execution of what he conceived E to be his duty, arrested and charged the plaintiff.

Two ingredients essential to support an action for malicious prosecution are malice and an absence of reasonable and probable cause. The jury must find that the defendant acted maliciously. Here, although the defendant by his counsel insisted that malice was necessary, not only was the question of the defendant's acting maliciously never left to the jury, but there was an entire absence of any F evidence of malice to go to the jury. It was decided by the Court of Appeal in Bradshaw v. Waterlow & Sons, Ltd. (1) that the question whether the defendant honestly believed in the charge which he made ought not to be left to the jury unless there was some evidence of the absence of that belief. In this case there was not any such evidence. Again, the judge is to determine whether there is reasonable and probable cause or not. In this case there is no evidence whatever G of the want of reasonable and probable cause. For these reasons I am of opinion that on the claim for malicious prosecution the judgment should be reversed and judgment entered for the defendant.

[The cross-appeal of the plaintiff on the claim for false imprisonment was based on the provisions of s. 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and that matter has been H rendered obsolete by s. 6 (3) (a) of the Road Traffic Act, 1960, and does not call for report.]

BANKES, L.J.—In these cross-appeals the defendant claims to have judgment entered for him upon the issue of malicious prosecution upon the ground that there was no evidence of want of reasonable and probable cause or of malice; and the plaintiff claims to have judgment entered for him upon the issue of false imprisonment upon the ground that there was no evidence justifying or excusing his arrest. I

The defendant's appeal raises a simple question upon which I entertain no doubt. At the trial the learned judge intimated that the question he intended to leave to the jury was: "Did the defendant honestly believe at the time he arrested the plaintiff that the plaintiff was drunk?" At the instance of the plaintiff's counsel the judge was persuaded to put a second question—namely,

"Did the defendant honestly believe at the time he signed the charge sheet that the plaintiff was drunk?"

This question, in order to be relevant, must have reference to the state of the defendant's belief at the time he signed the charge sheet as to the plaintiff's condition at the time he was arrested. The question to be quite clear should have been: "Did the defendant still honestly believe at the time he signed the charge sheet that the plaintiff was drunk at the time when he was arrested?" The jury answered the first question in the affirmative and the second in the negative. I have very little doubt that the jury misunderstood the second question, in spite of the learned judge's observations to them on the point; but, whether that is so or not, I am of opinion that there was no evidence upon which the jury could find the second question in the plaintiff's favour if the question was properly understood. The defendant throughout stoutly maintained that, at the time he arrested the plaintiff, he believed that he was drunk, and the jury accepted his statement. There is practically no dispute that the plaintiff was not drunk at the time he was charged. But, in my opinion, there is nothing in that fact which, under the circumstances, would justify a conclusion that the defendant had either changed his mind or had any reason to change his mind as to the plaintiff's condition at the time he was arrested. Under these circumstances I think that there was no evidence to support the second finding of the jury upon the assumption that they understood the question. The defendant is, therefore, entitled to succeed on his appeal and to have judgment upon the issue of malicious prosecution entered for him.

[His LORDSHIP then dealt with the plaintiff's appeal.]

WARRINGTON, L.J., in giving judgment, said that at the trial it was admitted that the plaintiff was not in fact drunk. At the close of the defendant's case it was submitted that there was no evidence of malice. The learned judge, however, determined to leave the case to the jury. The questions put to the jury were (i) Did the defendant honestly believe at the time he arrested the plaintiff that the plaintiff was drunk? (ii) Did the defendant honestly believe at the time he signed the charge sheet that the plaintiff was drunk? (iii) Damages, if any, for false imprisonment; and (iv) damages, if any, for malicious prosecution. The jury answered the first question in the affirmative, the second in the negative, and assessed the damages for malicious prosecution at £21. His LORDSHIP continued: I am of opinion, after careful consideration of the evidence, that there was no evidence on which the second finding of the jury could properly have been arrived at. They have found that the defendant honestly believed at the time of the arrest that the man was drunk. The only material circumstance that had happened since that time was the examination by the doctor, and there is no evidence to show that this had induced the defendant to change his mind. On the contrary, he swore both before the magistrates and at the trial that on each occasion he still believed in the truth of the charge. I think it was necessary to produce some evidence not only that there were reasons for a change of belief but that such change had actually taken place, and of this there was none. On this ground, therefore, I think judgment ought to have been, and ought now to be, entered for the defendant on the claim for damages for malicious prosecution.

Defendant's appeal allowed.

Street—Private street works—Expenses—Apportionment—Objection—Exemption under agreement with local authority—Objection that premises should be excluded from apportionment—Objection that apportionment incorrect “in respect of matter of fact”—Right of frontager to raise objection in proceedings to recover expenses—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict., c. 57), s. 7 (e), (f), s. 8 (2).

An objection by a frontager that he is exempt from liability for expenses provisionally apportioned of private street works by reason of an agreement with the local authority is, if not an objection that the premises ought to be excluded from the apportionment within para. (e) of s. 7 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892 [now s. 177 (1) (e) of the Highways Act, 1959], at any rate an objection that the apportionment is incorrect “in respect of a matter of fact” within para. (f) of s. 7 of the Act of 1892 [now para. (f) of s. 177 (1) of the Act of 1959]. Accordingly, by virtue of s. 8 (2) of the Act of 1892 [now s. 186 of the Highways Act, 1959], such an objection must be made in the manner provided by s. 7 of the Act of 1892 [now s. 177 (1) of the Act of 1959], and cannot be raised by the frontager in proceedings against him to recover the expenses.

Notes. The Private Street Works Act, 1892, was repealed by the Highways Act, 1959, which came into force on Jan. 1, 1960. The provisions of s. 7 of the Act of 1892 are contained in s. 177 of the Act of 1959; s. 8 (2) of the Act of 1892 is replaced by s. 186 of the Act of 1959.

Originating Summons taken out by the Porthcawl Urban District Council against M. C. Brogden and L. E. Brogden for (i) a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to a charge upon the Esplanade Hotel and a piece of building land, both abutting upon St. Mary's Street, Porthcawl, for a sum of £180 10s. 10d., alleged to be a final apportionment for the expense of certain improvements under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and (ii) an account of the principal, interest, and costs due to the plaintiffs, and that the charge might be enforced by sale.

By a conveyance dated Sept. 19, 1904, made between the defendant M. C. Brogden and certain other then owners of property fronting on the sea at Porthcawl and the Porthcawl Urban District Council, it was recited that the council, being desirous of having the hereditaments thereafter conveyed dedicated to the public use and of executing certain works of improvement thereon, had applied "to the owners" to convey the same to them for that purpose, which they had agreed to do upon and subject to performance by the council of the covenants, conditions, and agreements therein contained; and in consideration of the premises and the covenants, conditions and agreements therein contained and on the part of the council to be observed and performed, there was conveyed to the council a piece of land called the Esplanade, bounded on the north by other lands of some of the parties to the conveyance. The council covenanted to lay out the land conveyed for "a public highway, esplanade, and promenade, and for that purpose to make suitable roads, footpaths and works," and expend certain sums in so doing within a certain time; and it was agreed that the Esplanade Hotel and certain other therein specified buildings "and all other lands of the said M. C. Brogden which are not at present occupied with buildings, and which abut on the esplanade, shall be free and exempt from all charges in respect of the said works or any works under the Public Health Act, 1875, or under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, or any other similar Act for the time being in force." In 1911 the council, under the powers conferred on them by s. 6 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, passed a resolution requiring a street called St. Mary's Street, which ran north from and at right-angles to the esplanade, to be drained, levelled, paved, and completed. By a later resolution the estimates, with a provisional apportionment thereof among the premises liable to be charged therewith, were approved. The Esplanade Hotel, owned by the defendants, was at the corner of this street, and the esplanade and certain premises thereof abutted on the side of the street. The resolution providing for the apportionment was advertised and posted in accordance with the Act of 1892, and a copy embodying a notice of provisional apportionment was sent to each of the defendants by registered post. The work was carried out at the cost of £650, and in pursuance of s. 12 (1) of the Act of 1892 the surveyor made his final apportionment, and the amount therein apportioned in respect of the defendants' property was £180 10s. 10d. The defendants received notice of this, but gave no objection thereto as required by s. 7 of the Act, and sent no notice of objection to the final apportionment. The defendants contended that they had contracted themselves out of liability for the charge under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, by the conveyance of Sept. 19, 1904.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 23, 1917. SARGANT, J.—The defence to the plaintiffs' claim is that the defendants have contracted out of their liability by the conveyance of 1904. To that defence the plaintiffs have two replies—namely, (i) that, on the true construction of the deed, notwithstanding the wide words used in the operative part of the deed, there is no contracting out in respect of the liability for charges of the defence was good on the construction of the deed, the defendants have omitted to make that defence in time, and have allowed matters to go on for such a period without objection that their right to set it up is gone. The deed was entered into at a time when the defendants or their predecessors in title were making over to the council a large amount of frontage on the seashore upon certain terms as to

A that and the making up of the frontage given over as an esplanade, and the words of the exemption relied on by the defendants seem to me in themselves, without reference to the rest of the document and without any cutting down by the context, to be sufficient to include the charges now in question. [His Lordship stated his reasons for this opinion, but held, on the construction of the whole deed, that the words of exemption were controlled by the context (see Hawkins v. Gathercole (2)), and that the defence on the deed failed.]

B That really disposes of the question of liability between the parties, but, as the second point has been argued, I will express my opinion upon it. By the Private Street Works Act, 1892, provision is made for the apportionment on the various owners of property fronting on a street which is about to be made up of the expense of making it up. Section 7 provides that during a certain period—namely, one month from the publication of the resolution referred to in s. 6—"any owner of any premises shown in a provisional apportionment as liable to be charged with any part of the expenses of executing the works may, by written notice served on the urban authority, object to the proposals of the urban authority" on any of several grounds. One of these grounds is "(e) That any premises ought to be excluded from or inserted in the provisional apportionment," and another ground is "(f) That the provisional apportionment is incorrect in respect of some matter of fact to be specified in the objection," and so on. Then, by s. 8 (2), after the time for making these objections has expired, and when the district authority comes to enforce the charge under the Act, it is provided as follows: "No objection which could be made under this Act shall be otherwise made or allowed in any court proceeding or manner whatsoever"—these words being the very widest words which could be used to prevent persons from taking an objection, before this court or any other court, which they might have properly taken against the apportionment under s. 7 of the Act.

C Counsel for the defendants contended that although the owners had been settled on the list, and although they had not objected, if they had made any objection that would not have been an objection to the apportionment, but only an objection as to the persons who were liable in respect of the particular apportioned amount. I think that to adopt such a construction would be to read the scheme of the Act too narrowly. In my judgment, the scheme of the Act was to have an apportionment of the liability of particular named persons published or ascertained by the local authority, and that from that time forward—or, at any rate, from the time when the opportunity of objecting to that apportionment had passed by—the apportionment should be conclusive, so that all persons concerned should know what their position was. To my mind it is an essential part of that construction, not only that the apportioned amount should be ascertained, but that the persons liable for that amount should be ascertained; and, although it may possibly be that an objection as to the person liable is not an objection under head (e) of s. 7—namely, "that any premises ought to be excluded from or inserted in the provisional apportionment"—nevertheless it does seem to me that an objection as to the person liable does fall under head (f) which is "that the provisional apportionment is incorrect in respect of some matter of fact." If the provisional apportionment finds that a particular sum is due from X, as the owner of the property, it appears to me that the finding that X is liable is a finding of fact, and if Z and not X is the owner of the property an objection founded upon that incorrect finding is an objection that the provisional apportionment was incorrect in respect of a matter of fact.

I I should have come to that conclusion on this legislation if there had been no authority in respect of it, but the point seems to have been decided by BRAY, J., in Wallasey U.D.C. v. W. H. Walker & Co. (1). There a person had been settled as liable for an apportioned amount on the ground that he owned a wall which abutted on the road or street to be made up. As a matter of fact he did not own the wall, but he did not object until he was sued, when he raised the objection not that the apportionment was incorrect quā amount or quā the premises in respect of which it was ascertained, but that it was wrong in finding that he, and not somebody else, was the owner of the property. It was held that his objection was one which he might have raised under s. 7 of the Act, and that he was precluded from raising it when the matter came into court. I cannot see any difference in substance between that case and the one before me. Here the defendants are not saying that they are not the owners, but they are saying that a special bargain was made with them under which they are not liable, as otherwise they would have been, for the amount apportioned in respect of their property. If they are right in that contention, the result, if their objection had been taken in time, ought to have been that no amount was apportionable against them as owners of the property. I cannot see how that is less a question of fact than a question whether a person was or was not the owner of the property. In my judgment, therefore, the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief claimed by their summons. Their taxed costs must be added to their charge, and there will be liberty to apply.

Declaration and order accordingly.

By a contract made in September, 1915, for the sale of 4,000 tons of flour to be shipped from the United States to Greece not later than Nov. 7, 1915, it was provided that each shipment should be deemed a separate contract, and that payment should be by "confirmed bankers' credit." On Oct. 16, 1915, the buyer opened a bankers' credit in favour of the sellers which was not a "confirmed" credit, and the sellers with notice of this fact made certain shipments under the contract for which they were paid by means of the credit, and they obtained from the buyer an extension of time to Nov. 30, 1915, for shipment of the balance of the contract goods. Subsequently, the sellers purported to cancel the contract without giving any notice to the buyer on the ground that the credit was not in accordance with the terms of the contract.

Held: the fact that for a time the sellers had waived the breach of the condition providing for a confirmed credit did not prevent them at a later stage from requiring the performance of that condition, but as they had previously waived the breach, they were not entitled to cancel the contract without giving the buyer reasonable notice of their intention to cancel so as to enable him to provide a confirmed credit.

D Appeal by the sellers from an order made by BATHACHE, J., on a Special Case stated by arbitrators.

By an agreement dated Sept. 27, 1915, the sellers sold to the buyer 4,000 tons of flour, to be dispatched from Atlantic ports to Greece per steamer or steamers as per bill or bills of lading dated or to be dated not later than Nov. 7, 1915. Each shipment was to be deemed a separate contract. The contract contained also the following stipulations:

E "Cash against documents in New York. Payment by confirmed bankers' credit. Buyers to guarantee arrangement for shipment with British envoy at Athens. War risk insurance to be effected by buyers."

On Oct. 16, 1915, the National Bank of Commerce of New York by letter informed the sellers that a credit had been opened in their favour for about 270,000 dollars in respect of the shipment of 4,000 tons shipped up to Nov. 7, 1915. The letter contained no guarantee as to the period for which the credit was to remain in force. On or about Oct. 21 to 30 the sellers made shipments of flour in accordance with the contract, for which they were duly paid by the New York bank in exchange for shipping documents. On Oct. 27 the sellers took exception to the credit on the ground that it was not irrevocable. About Nov. 15 the sellers requested the buyer to extend the time for the shipment of the balance of the flour to Nov. 30, and to this the buyer agreed. On Nov. 25 the New York bank informed the sellers that they did not assume any responsibility for the continuance of the credit and it could not therefore be construed as a confirmed credit, and on Dec. 13 the bank advised the sellers that the credit of Oct. 15 had been cancelled. The sellers then cancelled the balance of the contract on the ground that the credit opened at New York was not in accordance with the contract. The buyer refused to accept the cancellation of the balance of the contract, and the dispute was referred to arbitration.

I Before the arbitrators the sellers contended (inter alia) that the buyer had failed to comply with the conditions of the contract as he had failed to open a credit at New York which was to be irrevocable until Nov. 15, 1915, under which the sellers should be assured that they would receive cash in New York against presentation at any time up to that date of the shipping documents. That the fact that the sellers had made one shipment without insisting upon this condition did not release the buyer with regard to subsequent shipments, especially having regard to the term that "each shipment shall be deemed a separate contract." The buyer contended (a) that the contract was clear and the sellers must justify their failure to fulfil it; (b) that the statement that the credit opened by the buyer was not a confirmed credit was not established, but that the credit was fully satisfactory; and (c) that in any case the sellers had accepted it as satisfactory, and, having made a shipment under it, had waived any possible objection to it, and were not in a position to repudiate their obligation to ship the balance of the flour, or could not do so without giving due notice to the buyer so as to enable him to remove any valid objection and furnish such a credit as would satisfy them. The arbitrators awarded that the sellers were in default in not shipping the balance of the flour, and should pay a certain sum of damages for their default, and they stated a Special Case for the opinion of the court. A

The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the above facts there was evidence upon which the arbitrators could properly find that the sellers had waived the term in the contract that payment should be by confirmed bankers' credit, and whether their award was correct. BAILHACHE, J., held that the sellers, by waiving for a time the breach of the buyer as to the confirmed bankers' credit, were not bound to act upon the unconfirmed credit up to the end of the shipments, but that they could not cancel the balance of the shipments without giving the buyer reasonable notice of their intention to cancel. He therefore confirmed the award. The sellers appealed. There was no evidence before BAILHACHE, J., that a cablegram dispatched by the sellers to their London house on Oct. 27 (after some shipments had been made) had been brought to the notice of the buyer, but it was proved in the Court of Appeal that it was so communicated to him. It was agreed by the parties that the Court of Appeal should deal with the new facts without sending the case back to the arbitrators. B

VISCOUNT READING, C.J., after stating the facts, continued: The question put to the court by the arbitrators is "whether or not upon the above findings of fact"—to which must now be added "coupled with our findings of fact"—"there was any evidence upon which the arbitrators could properly find that the sellers had waived the term in the contract that payment should be by confirmed bankers' credit." It was, therefore, admitted that there was in fact no confirmed bankers' credit, but it was contended by the buyer that there had been a waiver of that condition of the contract. In answer to that the sellers answered that there had been no such waiver, and, if there had been a waiver that they were entitled at any time after such waiver to insist upon the condition being performed. The buyer replied that no doubt the sellers could insist upon the performance of the condition, but that, having waived its performance up to a certain date, they must give reasonable notice to the buyer of their intention to insist upon its performance in the future so as to allow him an opportunity of putting the credit right. BAILHACHE, J., held that the sellers must be taken to have waived the performance of the condition, that the buyer was entitled to reasonable notice, and that such notice had not in fact been given. He, therefore, answered the question in favour of the buyer. E

In my view, the learned judge was right. It is open to a party to a contract to waive a condition in the contract which is inserted for his benefit. If the sellers chose to ship without the protection of a confirmed bankers' credit, they were entitled to do so, and the buyer performed his part of the contract by paying for the goods shipped, though there was no confirmed bankers' credit, inasmuch as that condition had been waived. If at a later stage the sellers wished to avail themselves of the condition precedent, in my opinion there was nothing in the facts to prevent them from demanding the performance of the condition, provided they gave reasonable notice to the buyer that they would not make a further shipment unless there was a confirmed bankers' credit. If they had done that and the buyer had then failed to comply with the condition, he would have been in default, and the sellers would have been entitled to cancel the contract without being liable to any claim by the buyer for damages. F

The question then arises whether there has been such a notice by the sellers as was necessary to inform the buyer that henceforth he must comply with the G

A condition of the contract. In Bentsen v. Taylor, Sons & Co. (2) (1) BOWEN, L.J., stated the law as to waiver thus ([1893] 2 Q.B. at p. 283):

“Did the defendants by their acts or conduct lead the plaintiff reasonably to suppose that they did not intend to treat the contract for the future as at an end, on account of the failure to perform the condition precedent?”

B If we read sellers for defendants and buyer for plaintiff in that passage, it applies exactly to the present case. The sellers did lead the buyer to think so, and when they intended to change that position they were bound to give reasonable notice of that intention to the buyer so as to enable him to comply with the condition which up to that time they had waived. Re Tyrer & Co. and Hessler & Co. (2) was cited as an authority for the proposition that the moment the sellers chose to avail themselves of the failure by the buyer to perform the condition precedent they could put an end to the contract without giving the buyer an opportunity of remedying the default which had hitherto been waived. That case is not an authority for that proposition. It shows that, where there are stipulated times in a charterparty for payment of the hire of a ship and a power to withdraw the ship if the payment is not made at the stipulated time, the mere fact that there has been default in payment at one or more stipulated times, of which advantage D has not been taken, does not entitle the party in default at a subsequent time to a notice so as to enable him to comply with the condition before the right to withdraw arises. That is a totally different case from the present. I cannot find any authority to support the proposition that, when one party has led another to believe that he may continue in a certain course of conduct without any risk of the contract being cancelled, the first-named party can cancel the contract without E giving any notice to the other so as to enable the latter to comply with the requirement of the contract. It seems to me to follow from the observations of BOWEN, L.J., in Bentsen v. Taylor, Sons & Co. (2) (1) which I have read that there must be reasonable notice given to the buyer before the sellers can take advantage of the failure to provide a confirmed bankers' credit. That is the decision of BAILHACHE, J.

F The question remains whether reasonable notice has in fact been given. We have more material before us than BAILHACHE, J., had when he came to the conclusion that no reasonable notice had been given. I am not prepared to draw the inference of fact that reasonable notice by the sellers had been given before they cancelled the contract. If notice had been given on Oct. 27 and on Nov. 25 the sellers had cancelled the contract, I think that that would have been ample notice G to enable the buyer to provide the confirmed credit in New York. But I cannot find any such notice on the part of the sellers of their intention to insist upon the performance of the condition. [His LORDSHIP referred to the letters and came to the conclusion that the sellers were content to make shipments upon the credit, which they knew was not a confirmed bankers' credit, until they determined to cancel the contract, which they did on Nov. 25 without giving reasonable notice to the buyer of their intention to cancel.] The result is that the decision of BAILHACHE, H J., is right and the appeal must be dismissed.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R., and SCRUTTON, L.J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

LONDON ASSOCIATION FOR PROTECTION OF TRADE AND ANOTHER v. GREENLANDS, LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Buckmaster, L.C., Earl Loreburn, Lord Atkinson and Lord Parker of Waddington), October 21, 22, 25, 26, 29, November 23, December 7, 1915, January 31, 1916]

[Reported [1916] 2 A.C. 15; 85 L.J.K.B. 698; 114 L.T. 434;
32 T.L.R. 281; 60 Sol. Jo. 272]

Libel—Privilege—Qualified privilege—Trade protection society—Information as to trader's credit supplied to member—Need for bona fide belief by informer of truth of information given and of inquirer's legitimate interest—Inquiries made through agent—Agent's privilege—Remuneration of agent.

Having regard to the way in which business is carried on in this country occasions must arise in which it is not only legitimate but necessary for one trader to inquire into the financial circumstances and credit of another. A person asked for information in such circumstances may be said to be under a social duty to communicate it, and it is in the interests of society generally that he should be able to do so without fear of an action for libel. It is, therefore, a principle of law that a person asked for information affecting the credit of another is justified in giving it provided (i) that he bona fide believes in the truth of the information which he gives; (ii) that he bona fide believes that the person making the inquiry has a legitimate interest which justifies it and is not actuated by mere curiosity; and (iii) if Macintosh v. Dun (1), [1908] A.C. 390, is to be considered good law, that he is not actuated by motives of private gain or any other motive excluding the possibility of the communication being made under a sense of social duty. In such circumstances the implication of malice arising out of a false statement to the discredit of another is displaced and the communication is privileged. This (per LORD ATKINSON) will be so whether either or both of the beliefs mentioned in (i) and (ii), formed by the person inquired of, be reasonable or not, and whether the inquirer in fact desired the information for the purpose mentioned. It will be sufficient if the person inquired of honestly believed he did so require it.

If a person may himself legitimately inquire as to the credit of another, it must necessarily follow that he is justified in making the inquiry through an agent confidentially employed for that purpose, and if a person asked for information may himself give it, he may give it through an agent whom he employs for that purpose. There is, however, this difference between the two cases. If a confidential agent be employed to make inquiries, he is under a legal duty to communicate the result of his inquiries to his principal, and this duty is the basis of a distinct privilege arising for the protection of the agent out of the relationship between principal and confidential agent. On the other hand, if the person from whom information is asked communicates it through an agent, the privilege of the agent is the privilege of his principal.

Per LORD BUCKMASTER, L.C.: The circumstances which constitute a privileged occasion can themselves never be catalogued and rendered exact. New arrangements of business, even new habits of life, may create unexpected combinations of circumstances which, though they differ from well-known instances of privileged occasion, may none the less fall well within the plain yet flexible language of the definition by PARKE, B., in Teaguel v. Spring (2), 1 Cr.M. & R. at p. 193, that an occasion was privileged when the publication complained of was "fairly made by a person in the discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, or in the conduct of his own affairs, in matters where his interest is concerned." . . . If the inquiry be honestly and prudently made, it is impossible to fix exact limits within which it must be confined. The extended character of trade, the modern combination of many businesses of a different nature under one control, the innumerable and far-reaching branches by which modern enterprise is extended, are all considerations which must be borne in mind in considering how far inquiry as to a new customer can be properly made. At the same time there is the essential need of safeguarding commercial credit against the dissemination of prejudicial rumour.

Per LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON: If a trader is justified in making inquiries through an agent on a proper occasion as to the credit of another, it can make no difference whether the agent receives, or does not receive, a remuneration for his services. Again, if a single trader is justified in making an inquiry through an agent, there is no reason why two or more traders so justified should not combine to pay a common agent to make, on behalf of each as occasion arises, such inquiry as may be necessary. A common agent so paid and making an inquiry at the request of any particular trader would not be the agent for that purpose of all the traders who joined in providing his salary, but only of that particular trader at whose instance the inquiry was made.

Appeal by the defendants in the action from an order of the Court of Appeal, [1913] 3 K.B. 507, directing a new trial of the action.

The facts appear in the opinion of the LORD CHANCELLOR.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., Leslie Scott, K.C., and Heber Hart, K.C., for the appellants.

Dickens, K.C., Clavell Salter, K.C., and Hugh Fraser for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

Jan. 31, 1916. The following opinions were read.

LORD BUCKMASTER, L.C.—This case affords the unedifying spectacle of litigation conducted with such disregard of the rules of procedure that extrication from the resulting tangle has been all but hopeless. The plaintiffs, who are a limited company, instituted proceedings in respect of a libel. They added three defendants to their writ—an unincorporated association known as the London Association for the Protection of Trade, a man called Hadwen, who was the secretary of the association, and a man called Wilmshurst—and sued them all as jointly responsible for the wrong done by the publication of an untruthful report sent by the defendant Hadwen to a Mr. Shand Kydd. The association was unincorporated, and consequently could not be made a defendant to the action in any capacity whatever. As an entity it could neither publish nor authorise the publication of a libel; and this appears to have been recognised before your Lordships' House, as the defendants have consented to strike out the association from the action. Wilmshurst, again, was no member or servant of the association. He supplied them with information at certain prices, and he had not, in fact, published the libel which was the subject of the suit. At the hearing no amendment whatever was attempted of the proceedings; and two judgments, separate in form and different in amount, were entered against Wilmshurst, on the one hand, and the association and Hadwen, on the other, for the one libel, judgment being entered against Wilmshurst, who was found guilty of malice, for £750, and against the other defendants, who were held not to have been malicious, for £1,000; and it certainly appears as though the judgment against Wilmshurst was due to his having published a libel which was not the subject of the suit. In these circumstances the association and Hadwen appealed to the Court of Appeal and served Wilmshurst. They asked for judgment on the grounds that the judgment was wrongly entered, and that the occasion of the publication was privileged, or, alternatively, for a new trial, on the ground that the damages were excessive, and were wrongly found against the separate defendants. The latter relief was accorded to them, and they have appealed to your Lordships' House, asking for the larger measure, which was denied. The argument before your Lordships was entirely directed to the question of privilege, but before this could be decided it became plain that it was necessary to remove the confusion caused by the circumstances to which I have alluded. Accordingly the plaintiffs agreed to strike out the association as defendant, and then, to avoid the result of the remaining defendant, Hadwen, pleading the existence of the judgment of Wilmshurst as a complete defence in any new trial, they asked, at the suggestion of your Lordships, that Wilmshurst might be brought before this House to show cause why the judgment against him should not be set aside. He duly appeared and raised no objection, but as the majority of your Lordships' House are of opinion that the judgment against Hadwen cannot stand, the reason for setting aside the judgment against Wilmshurst is removed, and that judgment may remain.

The principles that regulate an action for defamation of character are well known; nor do I think advantage would arise from any attempt to re-state or recapitulate the conditions which have been so often the subject of consideration in all the courts. There is, indeed, danger of confusion if new words are used to define or explain that which is already well established and clear. In the present case, although much discussion has arisen about many of the authorities in which these principles are encased, there has not, except in Macintosh v. Dun (1), been any real controversy either as to their validity or their meaning. The question here is whether certain words, published under circumstances which I will shortly detail, were published on a privileged occasion. If they were, judgment ought to have been entered for the appellants, since LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., who tried the case, held that against them there was no evidence of malice, and from that decision no appeal has been brought. If they were not, the action must go back to be re-tried.

A privileged occasion such as that said to exist in the present case is an occasion when the publication complained of was—to use the words of PARKE, B., in Toogood v. Spyring (2) (1 Cr.M. & R. at p. 193):

“fairly made by a person in the discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, or in the conduct of his own affairs, in matters where his interest is concerned.”

H The learned judge continues with these important words:

“If fairly warranted by any reasonable occasion or exigency, such communications are protected for the common convenience and welfare of society, and the law has not restricted the right to make them within any narrow limits.”

I do not think that any of the subsequent explanations, or definitions, have made any variation in the principle thus enunciated, nor added anything by way of explanation to this clear exposition of the law. Indeed, the long list of subsequent authorities, to which your Lordships were referred, do nothing but afford illustrations of the different circumstances to which this principle may be applied, and, with the exception of Macintosh v. Dun (1), none of the facts is in close relation to those of the present case. Indeed, the circumstances that constitute a privileged occasion can themselves never be catalogued and rendered exact. New arrangements of business, even new habits of life, may create unexpected combinations of circumstances which, though they differ from well-known instances of privileged occasion, may none the less fall within the plain yet flexible language of the definition to which I have referred. Again, it is, I think, essential to consider every circumstance associated with the origin and publication of the defamatory matter, in order to ascertain whether the necessary conditions are satisfied by which alone protection can be obtained, but in this investigation it is important to keep distinct matter which would be evidence of malice, and matter which would show that the occasion itself was outside the area of protection.

The facts of the present case are these. The London Association for the Protection of Trade is an unincorporate body consisting of about 6,300 members, and regulated by certain rules. Its objects, as defined in the prospectus, are as follows: (i) The making of private inquiries as to the means, respectability, and trustworthiness of individuals and firms. (ii) The collection of debts. (iii) The detection and exposure of swindlers. (iv) The issue of gazettes, containing authentic particulars of bills of sale, county court judgments, bankruptcies, and other preferential securities; also lists of creditors in bankruptcies. (v) To afford gratuitous legal advice to members on all matters connected with their trading operations. (vi) To aid in amending the laws affecting trade and commerce, and to suggest proper remedies for what may appear injurious to traders generally. (vii) To forward a monthly report to members containing information of frauds and attempts at swindling, which may be proceeding at the time. (viii) To keep a register of the names of known swindlers, and also of persons whose addresses are required by members of the association. According to the rules, members are enrolled after their names have been approved by a committee of management. There is no considerable body of evidence as to whether or not this rule is strictly obeyed, but it appears that a firm known as Whitmore's Trading Co., Ltd., were treated as entitled to the rights of a member before, in fact, they had filled up the necessary application form, and consequently before their name could have been submitted to the committee for approval. For the present purpose, the only branch of the association's business to which it is necessary to refer is that associated with the inquiry department. This department is open to all members, whether they be town, country, or foreign members, and whether they have subscribed upon the footing of obtaining all the full benefits of the society, or only subscribe to the gazette. In each case single inquiries are made by the association for 1s. 6d. apiece, or a book of ten prepared inquiry-checks are furnished for 10s. 6d. The operations of the society are very widespread, and in their prospectus they announce that by their affiliation with the Association of Trade Protection Societies of the United Kingdom the members have at their service an organisation extending throughout the whole of the kingdom and to all parts of the world. It is a strict condition of membership that all information supplied is supplied in strict confidence and for the exclusive use of the member who seeks it, and he is bound not to divulge it to any person upon any pretext whatever. This condition is imposed by the application for membership, and by the rules it is provided that any member who divulges any such information shall be deemed ineligible to continue a member, and shall forfeit his subscription. The society does not distribute any profit, nor does it trade with the object of making a profit, but in fact it has a considerable surplus on the year's accounts, and its property consists of assets to the value of upwards of £11,000.

It appears that a Mr. Shand Kydd, who trades at No. 73, Highgate Road, Kentish Town, was a member of the association. He is a designer of wall-paper decorations, and he was anxious to obtain information as to the credit of the respondents, a firm known as Greenlands & Co., Ltd., who carried on business at Hereford as house furnishers and drapers. He, accordingly, applied on Mar. 30, 1910, to the association, asking if Greenlands & Co. were safe for £20 to £30, and also for their length of credit and general information. This application was made upon a form which the association issue for that purpose, and that again contained the statement that the information was given in strict confidence, and was not to

A be divulged. The association had at Hereford an agent of the name of Wilmshurst. He had acted as their agent since 1895, and he carried on business as an accountant and auditor and fire-loss assessor at Broad Street, Hereford. It appears that he furnished information from time to time to the association for a payment of 6d. in respect of each inquiry, but although he had been bankrupt, it was stated by the secretary of the association in evidence, and was not challenged in cross-examination, that the association had never had any reason to doubt the good faith of his answers. In answer to the request of the secretary, he furnished a statement which was slightly altered by the secretary, and by him published to Mr. Shand Kydd. It is this publication that is the subject of the present proceedings, and it is set out in full in the statement of the claim. The grave and essential feature of the libel is this. It states that there are heavy debentures charged on the assets of the company to the amount of £36,100, but that for the credit asked they might be taken as a fair trade risk. This statement was inaccurate in a very material respect. The sum of £36,100 was not in fact charged upon the assets of the company, but two sums of £18,100 and £18,500, the former secured by specific mortgage and the other by mortgage debentures, were charged upon the real and leasehold property which the company owns. The whole of the stock-in-trade of the company, their book debts, their goodwill, and all their floating assets were entirely free from any mortgage whatever, and constituted a large and valuable property. The evidence, which is uncontradicted, establishes that this company was in an exceptionally strong financial position, and had carried on a large and very successful business for some time past. The obvious innuendo, therefore, of the libel, and the actual statement of fact that it made, were both inaccurate, and the only question that arises is whether the circumstances under which it was published constitute a privileged occasion, and thus throw upon the plaintiff the burden of proving that the publication was maliciously made.

In my opinion, they do. A trader is clearly entitled to make inquiries about the commercial credit of a person with whom he proposes to trade. He need not make those inquiries himself. He may constitute an agent to make them on his behalf. He need not inquire of any person of whom he has personal knowledge, or with whom he has had trade relations. If the inquiry be honestly and prudently made, it is impossible to fix exact limits within which the inquiry must be confined. The extended character of trade, the modern combination of many businesses of a different nature under one control, the innumerable and far-reaching branches by which modern enterprise is extended, are all considerations which must be borne in mind in considering how far inquiry as to a new customer can be properly made. This, of course, is not the only consideration; there is at the same time the essential need of safeguarding commercial credit against the most dangerous and insidious of all enemies—the dissemination of prejudicial rumour, the author of which cannot be easily identified, nor its medium readily disclosed.

H The present case is an illustration of both sides of the question. Mr. Shand Kydd was in London, and desired to enter into trade relations with a company in Hereford. It would, I think, have been a perfectly reasonable occasion for inquiries honestly made in Hereford as to the standing of this concern, and those inquiries might have been made on Mr. Shand Kydd's behalf by a proper agent appointed for the purpose, and in such circumstances, whatever considerations might attach to the communication to such agent, his answer to his principal would clearly have been made on a privileged occasion. I cannot help thinking that in these circumstances the fact that Mr. Shand Kydd made the inquiry through the large group of traders who had associated themselves together for the purpose of providing an agent through whom such inquiries were to be made cannot of itself take away the privilege that would have existed if the association had never intervened. It is said, however, that Macintosh v. Dun (1) is a clear expression of opinion that such a means of obtaining knowledge is not permitted. I do not think that Macintosh v. Dun (1) affects the consideration of this case.

beyond showing that in determining what is a privileged occasion, all the circumstances under which the publication is made need to be considered for the purpose of determining whether privilege attaches or no. In that case an association was conducted for profit by certain people, themselves wholly unconnected with trade. They acquired from all sources information about traders, and carried on the business of disseminating this information for reward to the various subscribers to their agency. It was decided that such a communication was not made either in discharge of a public or a private duty, and was not warranted by any reasonable occasion or exigency. That decision leaves untouched the wider question whether groups of people, however large, may not combine together in order to obtain for the benefit of each other the necessary information for carrying on business. They can themselves control, through their committee, the person by whom the inquiries are made and the method by which such inquiries are conducted, and they obviously have an interest in not receiving inaccurate and misleading statements, for no man in trade is desirous to avoid entering into a profitable trade transaction; his only interest is to render himself secure by the disclosure of trustworthy information. To some extent the same thing might be urged on behalf of the defendant in Macintosh v. Dun (1). It may be said that the success of the business of the defendant in that case depended upon his news being accurate. The essential difference lies in this—that, accurate or no, no single one of the persons who inquired through him could possibly influence in any way the means by which his inquiries were set on foot. Nor could he have fairly been regarded as the agent of the person to whom he sold the information he acquired.

There are further circumstances in the present case upon which the respondents place great reliance. The fact that the answers to the inquiries were obtained upon payment of a trivial sum of money; the fact that the information was capable of being corrected by reference to the register of companies, and that this was not done—these facts, it is suggested, show that the method of carrying on business is of such a character that it cannot be to the public good to obtain inquiries by these means. These are some of the circumstances which, I believe, weigh with the noble Lord (LORD LOREBURN) in the opinion which he entertains that this communication in the present case ought not to be protected. I need not say with what uneasiness I find myself unable to accept his view. To my mind, the first of these considerations applies to determining the question whether the publication of the libel by Wilmshurst to Hadwen was made on a privileged occasion, and it is not this libel which is sued on and the latter is relevant only on the question of malice. For these reasons I think that the learned judge, when once he held there was no evidence of malice, should, upon the evidence before him, have dismissed the case.

EARL LOREBURN.—The parties in this case desire a decision upon the evidence as it stands, unsatisfactory though it be, whether or not the occasion on which this libel was published ought to be regarded as privileged.

The law was established long ago in Toogood v. Spryng (2), and its application was illustrated in the case before the Privy Council of Macintosh v. Dun (1). That case is of equal authority with our own decisions, and I think it shows that considerations of public policy must influence a court in deciding these questions of privilege. I agree that the defendant association ought to be struck out of the record, for the reasons already stated. As to the defendant Wilmshurst, it would be necessary to discharge the judgment against him if a judgment against Hadwen were to be entered, for they were sued as joint tortfeasors. But unless it is necessary in order to remove an impediment in the way of proceeding against Hadwen, I am ill-disposed to interfere. For Wilmshurst has not appealed against the judgment, and there is no doubt that he acted maliciously. As regards the defendant Hadwen no malice has been proved. Accordingly, he must succeed if the occasion was privileged, and that depends on one question. In publishing this libel was he acting as agent of the association, or was he merely an agent for Mr.

A Shand Kydd, on whose behalf he made inquiry and to whom he reported? That remits us to the facts, and no question was put to the jury upon this point.

B If this gentleman was the agent of the association to inquire for each member who might invoke his services, then, upon the evidence as it now stands, I do not think the occasion would be privileged. For I think we should look at who and what are the persons to whom and by whom the libellous communication is made, and to the manner in which they conducted themselves, before admitting the privilege claimed. It is right that proper facilities should be given for ascertaining the financial position of traders. But we must remember that private reputation and credit are at stake, and I cannot think that a privilege should be allowed unless there is not merely good faith but also real care to make inquiry only in reliable quarters, and to verify it where practical. The absence of such care may, no

C doubt, be evidence of malice, but it is also relevant on the point whether there is privilege or not, and may, in my judgment, be fatal to the privilege even if malice be disproved. The court has to hold the balance, and, looking at who published the libel, and why, and to whom, and in what circumstances, to say whether it is for the welfare of society that such a communication, honestly made, should be protected by clothing the occasion of the publication with privilege.

D The facts here were imperfectly presented at the trial, and, therefore, I may easily be at fault in coming to a conclusion. I do not think on those facts there was a privileged occasion if Mr. Hadwen is to be regarded as acting in a capacity of agent for the association as a whole. I will not review the facts, but I do not think the methods of this association, consisting as it does of 6,000 persons, are salutary or deserve protection. But if he is to be regarded as confidential agent

E of Mr. Shand Kydd alone when he wrote the libel sued on, then I think the occasion is privileged. And that is the view your Lordships take of his agency on these imperfect materials. It ought to have been left to the jury to say whose agent Mr. Hadwen was. That being so, Hadwen succeeds. I must express my strong feeling that Messrs. Greenlands have been cruelly defamed, and that they may have lost a remedy, to which they were entitled, by a miscarriage at the F hearing more difficult to repair than any I have met with in my former experience. I believe they have acted wisely in seeking a final decision, even on imperfect materials, so as to end this litigation, and though the decision will be adverse to them, they have at least had the satisfaction of amply vindicating their good fame, which has been so unjustly assailed.

G LORD ATKINSON discussed the facts and the course of the trial and continued: In my view, therefore, this verdict and the judgment entered upon it cannot be allowed to stand. They must, I think, be set aside as wholly illegal and improper. It is agreed upon both sides that the association must be struck out from the pleadings. They cannot be sued as a legal entity in the manner in which they have been sued; but it is deemed desirable by all the parties concerned that the

H question should be determined by the House whether or not the judge at the trial should have ruled on the evidence then before him that the occasion upon which the libel complained of was published was a privileged occasion. Accordingly, I proceed to deal with that question.

I I shall not attempt to hazard a new definition, or description of a privileged occasion. I do not think that the statements as to what constitutes a privileged occasion made by PARKE, B., in Toogood v. Spyring (2) (1 Cr.M. & R. at p. 193), by ERLE, C.J., in Whiteley v. Adams (3) (15 C.B.N.S. at p. 414), by LORD CAMPBELL in Harrison v. Bush (4) (5 E. & B. at p. 348), and by LINDLEY, L.J., in Stuart v. Bell ([1891] 2 Q.B. at p. 347) can be improved upon. PARKE, B., speaking of privileged communications, said:

"If fairly warranted by any reasonable occasion or exigency, and honestly made, such communications are protected for the common convenience and welfare of society."

In an earlier portion of the passage, however, he had said that the law considers such a publication as malicious unless it is fairly made by a person in discharge of some public or private duty, whether legal or moral, or in the conduct of his own affairs in matters where his interest is concerned. These are, apparently, the tests by which, in the learned judge's opinion, it may be determined whether a defamatory matter has been published under circumstances which rebut implied malice. In the latter part of the passage he gives the reason why a publication which fulfils these tests is protected, "and that reason is the common convenience and protection of society." But PARKE, B., never meant, I think, to lay it down that implied malice is to be taken to be rebutted where those tests have not been fulfilled, although the common interest and protection of society might be served by the publication of the defamatory matter in question. ERLE, C.J., in Whitley v. Adams (3) laid down what are the tests in these words (15 C.B.N.S. at p. 414):

"If the circumstances bring the judge to the opinion that the communication was made in the discharge of some social or moral duty or on the ground of an interest in the party making or receiving it, then if the words pass in the honest belief on the part of the party writing or uttering them, he is bound to hold that the action fails. . . . Judges who have had to deal with this question have felt great difficulty in defining what kind of social or moral duty or what amount of interest will afford a justification."

That, he said, was clearly a question for the judge to decide. Later on he points out that the law as to privileged communication was much more restricted formerly than in modern times, and says:

"The rule has become gradually more extended upon the principle that it is to the general interest of society that correct information should be obtained as to the character of persons in whom others have an interest."

It was in this connection that the Chief Justice used the words quoted by Lord MACNAGHTEN in McIntosh v. Dun (1) [1908] A.C. at p. 399). In Harrison v. Bush (4) LORD CAMPBELL described what I have styled the "test" to the same effect, but in somewhat different language. He said (5 E. & B. at p. 348):

"A communication made bona fide upon a subject-matter in which the party communicating had an interest or in reference to which he had a duty is privileged if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, although it contains 'defamatory matter.' " . . . In the proposed 'canon' the word 'duty' cannot be confined to duties which can be enforced by indictment, action, or mandamus, but must include moral and social duties of imperfect obligation."

He said nothing whatever about the "general interest of society," because his apparent object was to lay down the "canon" itself and not to justify it by showing its foundation. In Stuart v. Bell (5), LINDLEY, L.J., no doubt used the following words ([1891] 2 Q.B. at p. 346):

"The reason for holding any communication privileged is 'the common convenience and welfare of society' [quoting PARKE, B.'s words], and it is obvious that no definite line can be drawn so as to mark with precision those occasions which are privileged and those which are not."

Further on he approved of and adopted the Chief Justice's statement of the law as to what is necessary to make an occasion privileged. BLACKBURN, J., in Davies v. Snead (6), said (L.R. 5 Q.B. at p. 611) where a person is so situated that it becomes right in the interest of society that he should tell a third person certain facts, then, if he, bona fide, and without malice, does tell them, it is a privileged communication. But this is only another way of saying that where a social or moral duty rests upon a person to tell a thing, and he does tell it, under the circumstances mentioned, it is a privileged communication. In my view, therefore, it is not enough that the judge should be satisfied in any given case that the publication of the defamatory matter is of service to "the common convenience

A and welfare of society," irrespective of the tests so laid down, of which this "common convenience and welfare of society" is the foundation and justification. He must, in addition, be of opinion that these tests have been satisfied before he can rule the occasion privileged. I think this is entirely consistent with the passage in LORD MACNAGHTEN'S judgment in Macintosh v. Dun (1) ([1908] A.C. at p. 399), touching the protection of defamatory communications.

B It was decided as long ago, I think, as Bromage v. Prosser (7), and many times since, that if one person makes an inquiry of another touching the position or character of a third, and the person inquired of makes a reply which he bona fide believes to be true, and also bona fide believes that the inquirer desires the information, not merely to gratify idle curiosity, but for some purpose in which he, the inquirer, has a legitimate interest of his own, the occasion upon which the answer is communicated to him is a privileged occasion. This will be so, I think, whether either or both of the beliefs so formed by the person inquired of be reasonable or not (Clark v. Molyneux (8)), and also whether or not the inquirer, in fact, desired the information for the purpose mentioned. It will be sufficient if the other person honestly believed he does so require it: Waller v. Loch (9). Now, if the person inquired of can himself reply with this protection, it necessarily follows that he can deliver his reply through the mouth of an agent duly accredited by him in that behalf, but if he does so the privilege which the agent's publication will have will be that which his principal would have had if he had replied himself. Nothing less and nothing more, since, presumably, he only gives indirectly the information which he bona fide believes to be true. If the agent should contribute anything from himself, that would alter matters entirely. So likewise may the inquirer make his inquiry through an agent, otherwise no incorporated company or municipal corporation could ever make an inquiry touching the character of a servant they were about to employ, since they can only act through and by agents. But if this latter agent should publish the information he receives by repeating it to his principal, and be sued in respect of that publication, the privilege, if any, protecting him is his own. He must, I think, defend himself on the ground that, being employed as a confidential agent to obtain information for his principal, he was under a legal, moral, or social duty to his principal to repeat truly what he had been informed of.

I suppose the evidence of Hadwen may be taken to amount to a statement that he bona fide believed in the accuracy of the information conveyed by him to Shand Kydd, in reply to the latter's request or inquiry, and also bona fide believed that G Shand Kydd made the inquiry for the purpose of obtaining the information touching a matter in which he had a lawful interest—namely, the conduct of his own trade. It, therefore, becomes necessary, in the first instance, to determine what was the precise relation in which Hadwen stood to Shand Kydd when he repeated this libel to him: (i) Was he the confidential agent employed by Shand Kydd to obtain information in which he (Shand Kydd) was interested in his trade touching the H solvency of a contemplated customer: or (ii) Was the association as a body the confidential agent of Shand Kydd, employed by him for the same purpose, Hadwen being only a servant, aiding his employers, the association, in their work; or (iii) Were the association a body trading for gain in the characters of other people, and ready to sell their wares for money to any customer who might ask for them, their sole motive being pecuniary profit to themselves, Hadwen being, as it were, their I principal shopman, who took the orders of the customers and delivered the goods? If they were this last, then they were in the same position as the defendant in Macintosh v. Dun (1), and the occasion of the publication of the libel sued on would not be privileged. But I do not think the association was in that position. It was not incorporated. It was not a legal partnership, and was not created or worked solely from motives of pecuniary gain. It was formed by men, I think, for the protection in their trade, or business, of each of its members. Neither do I think the association as a body were the agents to make this inquiry. By No. 2 of the rules of the association the business of the association was carried on by the committee of management. But the association, not being either a firm or an incorporated company, I do not see how it could be such an agent. And it would appear to me that the true condition of things was that members associated themselves together to appoint an officer, with certain machinery at his disposal, whom each member was entitled to employ as his own confidential agent, to obtain for him information beneficial to him in the conduct of his own trade or business, the secretary, when requested to obtain the information desired, becoming pro hac vice the confidential agent of the member who asked him to procure it. If that be the true condition of things, as in my opinion it is, then Hadwen was Shand Kydd's confidential agent to obtain this information touching the defendants' position, and, being so, he disclosed it to his principal Shand Kydd, if not in discharge of a legal duty, certainly in discharge of a moral one. The occasion of the publication sued on was therefore, in my opinion, a privileged occasion, and I think the Chief Justice at the trial should have so ruled.

LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON, having referred to the facts and the course of the trial: Having regard to the way in which business is carried on in this country occasions must arise in which it is not only legitimate but necessary for one trader to inquire into the financial circumstances and credit of another. A person asked for information under such circumstances may be said to be under a social duty to communicate it, and it is in the interests of society generally that he should be able to do so without fear of an action for libel. It is, therefore, a principle of law that a person asked for information affecting the credit of another is justified in giving it, provided (i) that he bona fide believes in the truth of the information which he gives; (ii) that he bona fide believes that the person making the inquiry has an interest which justifies it; and (iii) if Macintosh v. Dun (1) is to be considered good law, that he is not actuated by motives of private gain or other motives excluding the possibility of the communication being made under a sense of social duty. Under such circumstances the implication of malice arising out of a false statement to the discredit of another is displaced and the communication is privileged. If a person may himself legitimately inquire as to the credit of another, it must necessarily follow that he is justified in making the inquiry through an agent confidentially employed for that purpose, and if a person asked for information may himself give it, he may give it through an agent whom he employs for that purpose. There is, however, this difference between the two cases. If a confidential agent be employed to make inquiries, he is under a legal duty to communicate the result of his inquiries to his principal, and this duty is the basis of a distinct privilege arising out of the relationship between principal and confidential agent. On the other hand, if the person from whom information is asked communicates it through an agent, the privilege of the agent is the privilege of his principal.

The question, therefore, arises whether Hadwen was in the position of an agent confidentially employed by Shand Kydd to make inquiries on his behalf, or whether Hadwen was in a position either (i) of a person of whom an inquiry is made, or (ii) of the agent of such last mentioned person for the purpose of communicating the information. For the reasons hereinbefore appearing, I do not think he can be held to be the agent of the association for the purpose of making the communication, and there is no evidence that any member of the association (unless it be Shand Kydd himself) made himself responsible in any way for what Hadwen did. Either, therefore, Hadwen was in the position of the person from whom the inquiry was made, or he was the confidential agent of Shand Kydd to make the inquiry and communicate the result. In the former case, there being no malice alleged, your Lordships are bound to assume that he bona fide believed in the truth of the information he gave, and also that he bona fide believed, as, indeed, appears from the form of inquiry made by Shand Kydd, that the latter had a legitimate interest in asking for the information. It is not alleged that Hadwen acted from motives of private gain or from any motive which is inconsistent with his having

A acted under a sense of social duty. To establish this it would be necessary to prove that the association was a mere sham, and that the secretary was carrying on the business of inquiring into and selling information as to the financial position of traders, the members of the association being purchasers of the information, and the real object being to secure subscriptions sufficient to pay the secretary's salary. It appears to me quite impossible for your Lordships to come to this conclusion on the evidence before you, and it follows that, on the supposition that the secretary was in the position of a person from whom inquiry was legitimately made, he was entitled to privilege. On the other hand, if, and this I think is the true inference from the facts, the secretary was in the position of a confidential agent employed by Shand Kydd to make inquiries on his behalf, his report was a fortiori a privileged document, unless in making it he were guilty of actual malice, which was neither alleged nor proved. If a trader is justified in making inquiries through an agent on a proper occasion as to the credit of another, it can make no difference whether the agent receives, or does not receive, a remuneration for his services. Again, if a single trader is justified in making an inquiry through an agent, there is no reason why two or more traders so justified should not combine to pay a common agent to make, on behalf of each as occasion arises, such inquiry as may be necessary. A common agent so paid and making an inquiry at the request of any particular trader would not be the agent for that purpose of all the traders who joined in providing his salary, but only of that particular trader at whose instance the inquiry was made, just as if two persons employ a common chauffeur to drive the motor of each as required, such chauffeur would not be the agent of the one while employed in driving the car of the other. In my opinion, in making the inquiry on which the report was based and the report itself, the true inference is that Hadwen acted as confidential agent of Shand Kydd, and that the report was, therefore, a privileged communication.

D In my opinion, therefore, the proper course will be to allow the appeal and enter judgment for Hadwen and the association. The appellants, having obtained a decision in their favour on the only point they raised upon the appeal, are entitled to their costs here and below.

Appeal by the applicant from a decision of the Divisional Court discharging a rule nisi for a writ of mandamus addressed to the registrar of births, deaths, and marriages for the district of Hammersmith, to show cause why he should not issue a certificate and licence authorising Dr. Mir-Anwaruddin to marry one Violet Louise Ling.

The facts appear in the judgment of SWINFEN EADY, L.J.

The applicant in person.

The Solicitor-General (Sir George Cave, K.C.) and G. A. H. BRANSON, for the respondent, were not called on to argue.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—This is an appeal by the applicant, Dr. Mir-Anwaruddin, from an order of the Divisional Court of the King's Bench Division

A discharging a rule that he had obtained for a mandamus to the superintendent registrar of Hammersmith commanding him to show cause why he should not issue, pursuant to the statutes in that behalf, to the applicant a certificate in the form or to the effect of the certificate set forth in the schedule (B) annexed to the Marriage and Registration Act, 1856, and at the same time a licence authorising the applicant to marry Miss Violet Louise Ling.

B It is provided by the Marriage and Registration Act, 1856 [see now Marriage Act, 1949, s. 32 (2): 28 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 650] s. 9:

C "Every superintendent registrar receiving notice of an intended marriage to be solemnised by licence as aforesaid shall, after the expiration of one whole day next after the day of the entry of such notice in his 'marriage notice book,' issue under his hand, upon the request of the party giving such notice, a certificate in the form or to the effect of the certificate set forth in . . . schedule (B) to this Act annexed, and also a licence to marry, provided that in the meantime no lawful impediment to the issuing of such certificate be shown to the satisfaction of the same superintendent registrar . . ."

D An application was made by the applicant for that certificate and licence, dated Aug. 12, 1916, and in that he gives his name and the lady's name, Violet Louise Ling, and in the column headed "Condition," he describes his condition: "Formerly the husband of Ruby Pauline Hudd from whom he is divorced according to Mohammedan law." Then Miss Ling is described as a spinster; he is twenty-seven, and she is nineteen years of age, both residing at No. 85, Sinclair Road, West Kensington. Then the form says:

E "And I hereby solemnly declare that I believe there is no impediment of kindred or alliance or other lawful hindrance to the said marriage."

F That application having been made to the registrar, the objection was raised that the applicant, the intended husband, is already married. Of course, if that were so, it could not be disputed that the registrar was not bound to give a certificate and licence, because there is a proviso in the section which I have just read that in the meantime there is no lawful impediment to the issuing of that certificate shown.

G The question raised upon this appeal is whether the applicant is now a married man, and, as such, precluded from obtaining a licence and certificate to take another wife in England, his first wife being still living, and the bonds of matrimony not being dissolved. The applicant was born on Dec. 18, 1888, and is of the Mussulman faith—born in, permanently resident in, and domiciled in India, in the province of Madras. On Mar. 18, 1913, he intermarried in England with an Englishwoman, named Ruby Pauline Hudd. That marriage was duly solemnised on that day. Differences afterwards arose between him and his wife. It is not necessary to go through the various proceedings. The wife left him, refused to live with him; he obtained by an application to the City Civil Court at Madras a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, whereby the wife was ordered to return to cohabitation within three months. That order she has not obeyed. An application was then made by the appellant to the Divorce Division of the High Court in England. He presented a petition for divorce on the ground of his wife's alleged adultery. The petition came before BARGRAVE DEANE, J., and was dismissed, the learned judge holding that if there was a subsisting marriage, the Divorce Division of the High Court had no jurisdiction to dissolve it. His order was founded upon
I this, that the domicile of the applicant was in India. The applicant points out that in India there is no jurisdiction in the High Court there to dissolve the marriage, because under the circumstances the jurisdiction of that court does not extend to his case, so that, having regard to the provisions of the Indian Divorce Act (No. 4 of 1869), he is unable to obtain a divorce in India. That Act recites that it is expedient to amend the law relating to divorced persons professing the Christian religion and to confer upon certain courts jurisdiction in matters matrimonial. Then it provides by s. 2:

"This Act shall extend to the whole of British India . . . nothing hereinafter contained shall authorise any court to grant any relief under this Act except in cases where the petitioner professes the Christian religion and resides in India at the time of presenting the petition, or to make decree of dissolution of marriage except in the following cases: (a) Where the marriage shall have been solemnised in India, or (b) where the adultery, rape, or unnatural crime complained of shall have been committed in India, or (c) where the husband has, since the solemnisation of the marriage, changed his profession of Christianity for the profession of some other form of religion."

The applicant says: "There is a limit, therefore, to the jurisdiction of the Indian courts, and, as I am a Mussulman professing the religion of Islam, I do not come within the provisions of the Indian Divorce Court. Therefore, my position is that in England, as I am not domiciled here, there is no jurisdiction in the courts here to dissolve my marriage; in India, where I am domiciled, the jurisdiction conferred on the Indian courts does not extend to my case."

That being so, on Aug. 27, 1915, by a writing under his hand called Talak Nama, he purported to divorce his wife. The writing was signed by him in the presence of two witnesses, and it recites:

"Whereas Ruby Pauline Mir-Anwaruddin, my lawfully wedded wife (the second daughter of Charles Sterling Hudd and Florence Fanny Hudd, of 5, Hambly Mansions, Streatham Common, in the county of London), has of her free will and accord left my protection and lived separately and apart from me since the 3rd day of May, 1913. And whereas the said Ruby Pauline Mir-Anwaruddin has deliberately treated with contempt the decree and order of His Majesty's City Civil Judge at Madras in the Empire of India dated the 15th day of December, 1913, which commanded her to rejoin me and live with me at Madras. And whereas the courts of His Majesty in England have no jurisdiction to try a suit for dissolution of my marriage owing to my being domiciled in the Empire of India, and the courts of His Majesty in the Empire of India have no jurisdiction to dissolve a marriage between parties who do not profess the religion of Christ, I have no alternative but to exercise my privilege as a Mohammedan, which I hereby do by pronouncing Talak in the name of God and His Holy Prophet Mohammed (on whom be peace). Witness my hand this 27th day of August, 1915."

That is the writing of divorce, and the applicant has argued before us that, being a Mohammedan, and being entitled according to the law of his religion and of his domicile to divorce a wife without giving any reason for it, he has exercised that right, that the marriage is thereby dissolved between him and Ruby Pauline Hudd, and that his status is now not that of a married man, but that of an unmarried man capable of contracting, according to English law, another marriage. No question arises on this appeal with regard to the rights which a Mohammedan has of marrying several wives. A Mohammedan is entitled, according to the applicant's evidence, to have four wives, and no question arises as to what his position in India would be with regard to taking further wives. Whatever rights he may have in that respect do not come before us here, and they call for no comment.

The applicant has done this. He has contracted in England with an Englishwoman, according to the form prescribed by law, an English marriage. In doing so the obvious intention of both parties to the contract was to confer upon the lady whom he took to wife the status and position of a married woman. Such a position, the position of a wife, as known to the English law, is the voluntary union of one man with one woman to the exclusion of all others. That has been frequently said to be a Christian marriage. A Mohammedan marriage, using the term "marriage," is something quite different. Ladies taken to wife in the Mohammedan sense do not acquire that status and that position which the sole wife allowed in Christian countries is given and enjoys. The difference between these two positions has been often pointed out. So far back as 1835 Lord

A BROUGHAM in Warrender v. Warrender (1) expressed himself thus (2 Cl. & Fin. at p. 532):

"Marriage is one and the same thing substantially all the Christian world over. Our whole law of marriage assumes this; and it is important to observe, that we regard it as a wholly different thing, a different status from Turkish or other marriages among infidel nations ['infidel' nations there means 'infidel' as distinguished from Christian nations] because we clearly never should recognise the plurality of wives, and consequent validity of second marriages, standing the first, which second marriages the law of those countries authorise and validate. This cannot be put upon any ground except our holding the infidel marriage to be something different from the Christian, and our also holding Christian marriage to be the same everywhere."

C In 1866 Hyde v. Hyde and Wodmansee (2) came before the judge ordinary, LORD PENZANCE, and there he dealt with same subject thus (L.R. 1 P. & D. at p. 133):

"Marriage has been well said to be something more than a contract, either religious or civil. It is an institution. It creates mutual rights and obligations, as all contracts do; but, beyond that, it confers a status. The position or status of husband and wife is a recognised one throughout Christendom; the laws of all Christian nations throw about that status a variety of legal incidents during the lives of the parties, and induce definite rights upon their offspring. What, then, is the nature of this institution as understood in Christendom? Its incidents vary in different countries, but what are its essential elements and invariable features? If it be of common acceptance and existence, it must needs (however varied in different countries in its minor incidents) have some pervading identity and universal basis. I conceive that marriage, as understood in Christendom, may for the purpose be defined as the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others. There are, no doubt, countries peopled by a large section of the human race in which men and women do not live or cohabit together upon these terms—countries in which this institution and status are not known. In such parts the men take to themselves several women, whom they jealously guard from the rest of the world, and whose number is limited only by considerations of material means. But the status of these women in no way resembles that of the Christian 'wife.' "

G I should say, pausing there, that I have already referred to the fact that, according to the Mohammedan faith, the number is not unlimited; it is limited to four; so with regard to a Mohammedan those remarks must be taken with that qualification. LORD PENZANCE continued (ibid. at p. 133):

"In some parts they are slaves, in others perhaps not; in none do they stand, as in Christendom, upon the same level with the man under whose protection they live. There are, no doubt, in these countries laws adapted to this state of things—laws which regulate the duties and define the obligations of men and women standing to each other in these relations. It may be, and probably is, the case that the women there pass by word or name which corresponds to our word 'wife.' But there is no magic in a name; and, if the relation there existing between men and women is not the relation which in Christendom we recognise and intend by the words 'husband' or 'wife,' but another and altogether different relation, the use of a common term to express these two separate relations will not make them one and the same, though it may tend to confuse them to a superficial observer."

I Later still, in Harvey v. Farnie (3) in the Court of Appeal, LUSH, L.J., said (6 P.D. at p. 53):

"Now, as Mr. Fooks has referred to what is called 'marriage' in a country where polygamy is the law, I must take the opportunity also of saying, in accordance with what has fallen from COTTON, L.J., that there is no analogy whatever between the union of a man and a woman in a country where polygamy is allowed, and the union of a man and a woman in a Christian country. Marriage in the contemplation of every Christian community is the union of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others. No such provision is made, no such relation is created, in a country where polygamy is allowed."

In these circumstances the marriage which was celebrated between the applicant and Ruby Hudd on Mar. 18, 1913, has not been dissolved by any court of competent jurisdiction (the applicant says there is none), and it is not a marriage in the Mohammedan sense which can be dissolved in the Mohammedan manner. No question arises that, according to the Mohammedan law, if a member of that persuasion has taken several wives (within the limit allowed) and has entered into a union of that kind with each of those ladies according to his law, he may terminate that union by the writing of divorce, and such a union is so terminated. The applicant has adduced evidence to make it clear that the husband has that right without assigning any reason; where to him, and him alone, it seems good to put her away, in those circumstances he can do it; but it is quite impossible to hold that such a writing of divorce could dissolve a marriage contracted here in England with an Englishwoman the husband being of Mohammedan faith. In fact, the case was put in the House of Lords by LORD BROUGHAM in Warrender v. Warrender (1) in language which I will read. LORD BROUGHAM is pointing out the difference between the nature of the contract which is entered into in a Christian marriage and the jurisdiction of the courts and their power of dealing with the rights of parties thereto, and he says (2 Cl. & Fin. at p. 354):

"Indeed, another consequence would follow from this doctrine of confounding with the nature of the contract that which is only a matter touching the jurisdiction of the courts, and their power of dealing with the rights and duties of the parties to it; if there were a country in which marriage could be dissolved without any judicial proceeding at all, merely by the parties agreeing in pais to separate, every other country ought to sanction a separation had in pais there, and uphold a second marriage contracted after such a separation. It may safely be asserted that so absurd a proposition never could for a moment be entertained."

That is the proposition which the applicant has sought to make good here—by power in pais, by writing under his hand, and without even the concurrence of the wife, without accord between them, at the mere will of the husband, to put her away, and then say that this English marriage is thereby dissolved. In my opinion, it is quite impossible to maintain that argument. The English marriage is still subsisting, and there is a lawful impediment to the applicant taking a second wife, standing the first marriage. I am of opinion that the appeal fails, and should be dismissed.

BANKES, L.J. I agree. According to the appellant's statement, he, on Mar. 18, 1913, contracted a civil marriage with Ruby Pauline Hudd, at the superintendent registrar's office at Wandsworth. The first question that has to be decided is: What kind of marriage was that? And it seems to me that question is answered by a reference to the Act of Parliament under which the marriage took place. It took place under an Act which was one of a series that laid down certain regulations and gave certain facilities for the contracting of Christian marriages, and Christian marriages alone. The distinction between such a marriage and the marriage of a Mohammedan is well indicated by LORD BROUGHAM in the passage which the lord justice has referred to, where he says, referring to a statement that he had made (ibid. at p. 532):

"This cannot be put upon any rational ground except our holding the infidel marriage to be something different from the Christian."

A Later on he says the fallacy of the argument to the contrary, in his opinion, is confounding incidents with essence, and the essence of the two marriages is entirely distinguishable. The essence of the Christian marriage is, if I may adopt the language of LORD PENZANCE in Hyde v. Hyde and Woodmansee (2), where he says the matrimonial law of this country is adapted to the English marriage and it is wholly inapplicable to polygamy (L.R. 1 P. & D. at p. 133):

B "I conceive that marriage as understood in Christendom may for this purpose be defined as the voluntary union for life of one man and one woman to the exclusion of all others."

C Having contracted that particular form of marriage, the applicant, on Aug. 27, 1915, claimed to dissolve it by a writing of divorce, and he claimed to dissolve it because he was a Mussulman, contending that upon his marriage his wife acquired his status, and that, therefore, his law as a Mussulman applied to her, and that law included his right to put her away by a writing of divorce. Of course that law, if it exists, must be proved by evidence; and the evidence which has been brought forward on affidavit, in my opinion, indicates something very different. All that is said is that according to the Mussulman law administered in British courts in India a Mussulman has a right to dissolve his own marriage either by word of mouth or in writing; but no reference is made to what kind of marriage—whether it is his own Mussulman marriage to which the Mussulman law applies—and when the applicant was asked whether he could produce a single instance of this law having been applied to a Christian marriage, he replied in the negative. Therefore it is, in my opinion, sufficient to dispose of this appeal to say that there is no evidence of any personal law applicable to the applicant which gives him the right to put away a wife whom he has married by a Christian marriage by a writing of divorce.

E But I am prepared to go further and adopt the language of LORD BROUGHAM, which has already been referred to in Warrender v. Warrender (1), where he says (2 Cl. & Fin. at p. 534) that the suggestion that the marriage could be dissolved without any judicial proceedings at all, merely by the parties agreeing in pais to separate, would be absurd. It appears to me that the applicant is in this difficulty: Assuming he was to establish, as he says he thinks he has established, that this marriage of his in 1913 was a Mussulman marriage, of course the effect of it, whether it was Mussulman marriage or a Christian marriage, is pointed out by LORD GORELL, P., in Chetti v. Chetti (4), where he says ([1909] P. at p. 87):

G "Ought a foreigner domiciled abroad, who comes to this country and here marries in due form according to English law another person domiciled in England, to be allowed to assert that he carries about with him, while here, the burden of an incapacity imposed by the laws of a foreign domicile to do that which he has done voluntarily and in due form according to the laws of England, or to repudiate his marriage on the ground that he is incapable of doing what he has done, and ought our courts to support such an assertion and repudiation, with the consequent effects on the position of the wife and legitimacy of the child? To my mind the answer should be 'No.' "

H Therefore, whatever the form of marriage contended for by the foreigner domiciled abroad may be, if he chooses to enter into a form of marriage according to the English law, he is bound by it. The applicant suggests that the marriage, after all, was a Mohammedan marriage, and, though he may have been bound by it originally, he was entitled to put it aside by his writing of divorce. What is it he is coming to ask for now? It is exactly the same as he applied for in the first instance. If, according to his contention, that is a Mohammedan marriage, the registrar, in my opinion, was quite right to refuse it, because he acts under a statute which gives him authority to assent to the request of persons who are asking for Christian marriages and no other form of marriage. Therefore, whichever way it is looked at, it is clear to me that this appeal fails, and that the superintendent registrar was right in holding that there was, in the language of the section, a lawful impediment to the marriage which the applicant was anxious to contract.

A. T. LAWRENCE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The short point is whether this court should grant a mandamus compelling the registrar to issue this certificate under the Marriage and Registration Act, 1856. It appears that when that certificate was applied for he was also very properly informed of the previous marriage which had taken place in the year 1913. That marriage had been validly solemnised in the registry office in that year, and the only ground for saying that a new certificate for another marriage could be granted was that the applicant here had himself, by his own writing, purported to dissolve that marriage. I think that that is an even stronger case than the one mentioned by LORD BROUGHAM as absurd in Warrender v. Warrender (1) (2 Cl. & Fin. at p. 534). Here it is not suggested that there was any consent on the part of the woman; it is the man seeking to be, or purporting to be, a judge in his own cause, and dissolving his marriage without any communication with the woman or any consent on her part, affecting her rights as well as his own. I think it is contrary to natural justice that a man should be judge in his own cause and determine his marriage at his own will and pleasure, and that the registrar was perfectly right in refusing to grant another certificate while that marriage was a subsisting marriage and only purported to be affected by this writing of divorcement.

Appeal dismissed.

TINGLEY v. MÜLLER

[COURT OF APPEAL (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Swinfen Eady, Bankes, Warrington and Scrutton, L.J.J., and Bray, J.). March 23, 26, May 11, 1917]

Alien—Enemy—Sale of property in England through agent—Irrevocable power of attorney—Proceeds to be retained in England during war—No need of intercourse with alien—Legality of sale.

On May 20, 1915, during the 1914-18 war between Great Britain and Germany, the defendant, who had been resident for many years, but not naturalised, in England, and wished to proceed to Germany, gave a power of attorney, irrevocable during twelve months, to his solicitor in England enabling him to sell the defendant's house and furniture in England. The defendant, being beyond military age, then obtained a permit from the Foreign Office to enable him to go to Germany, and he travelled from London to Tilbury on May 26, 1915, and embarked for Holland. On June 2, 1915, auctioneers, who had been instructed by the defendant before his departure, purported to sell the premises and furniture to the plaintiff who signed a contract for purchase and paid a deposit. The solicitor was instructed by the Custodian of Enemy Property to retain the proceeds of the sale until after the end of the war. On a claim by the plaintiff that the contract was illegal and void by reason of the defendant being an alien enemy when it was entered into, and for the return of the deposit,

Held (SCRUTTON, L.J., dissenting): when the defendant gave the power of

- A attorney to his solicitor he was not an alien enemy; the authority conferred on the solicitor was complete and irrevocable, the defendant could not interfere with regard to the sale, and the making of the contract and the completion of the sale did not involve any further intercourse between him and the solicitor; as the money must be retained in England during the war the transaction could not benefit either the defendant or the enemy as a whole; and, therefore,
- B the transaction did not constitute trading with the enemy at common law and the contract of sale was not illegal and void.

Domicil—Commercial or trade domicil—Acquirement by residence—Loss by relinquishing residence with no intention of immediate return—Reversion to character of allegiance.

- C Per SCRUTTON, L.J.: To gain a commercial or trade domicil residence in a country with no intention of leaving shortly is sufficient. Time is the principal element in the domicil. Such a domicil may be lost by an intention to abandon it, coupled with some overt act or step taken to effect the change. Leaving the country with no intention of immediate return, and with a sale of one's property therein, seems clearly to destroy a commercial domicil.
- D Until he acquires another trade domicil a person who has lost such a domicil reverts to the national character determined by his allegiance.

LORD COZENS-HARDY, M.R. This appeal raises some important and difficult questions arising out of the recent emergency legislation. The defendant Müller is by birth a German. For many years, probably for forty years, he has resided in England, and during part of that period, though not in recent years, he has carried on business in London. He was never naturalised in this country. He owned and occupied a house and grounds at Herne Hill, held under a long lease at a ground rent of £22 10s. In the summer of 1915 he was desirous of proceeding to Germany, and of selling his house and also the furniture therein. He gave a power of attorney, dated May 20, 1915, to his solicitor, Mr. White. It was a very full power, authorising Mr. White to sell by public auction or private contract, and to execute transfers to the purchaser and give receipts for the purchase money, and in the meantime to receive the rents and profits and generally to manage the premises. The power was declared irrevocable for twelve months. It was subject to ss. 46 and 47 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, and s. 9 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882 [now Law of Property Act, 1925, ss. 123, 124]. Mr. Bott was named in the power as the auctioneer, who had Müller's instructions to sell the premises. It is perhaps right that I should refer to the correspondence which passed between Mr. White and the Public Trustee before the sale. On May 27 Mr. White wrote as follows :

H

"Our client, the above-named Mr. Müller, left this country for Germany last night, via Flushing. We inclose a list of the securities, &c., which he informs us he has deposited at his bankers, the London County and Westminster Bank, Camberwell Green. We have also to inform you that we hold a power of attorney from Mr. Müller to sell his leasehold house, Hill Crest, Sunray Avenue, Herne Hill, and the furniture and effects upon the premises there. We shall be obliged if you will inform us whether we shall be at liberty to pay the purchase money to Mr. Müller's credit at his bankers, or whether such purchase money is to be paid to you."

On May 29 the Public Trustee replied as follows :

I

"In reply to your letter of the 27th inst., I am directed by the Public Trustee to forward you a copy of Registration Order B, on which you should make a return to him of the proceeds of the sale of the lease and furniture and effects belonging to Mr. E. N. G. Müller. The money is not to be paid over to the Public Trustee, but should be retained by you during the war. J. F. SWAIN, for the Public Trustee."

This letter cannot, of course, be regarded otherwise than as a statement of the view of the Public Trustee at the time when it was written, but the correspondence shows what has never been challenged, that Mr. White throughout the transaction acted with the utmost propriety.

A sale by auction took place on June 2, the plaintiff becoming the purchaser for £1,050 and paying £100 deposit. The endorsed memorandum was signed by Bott.

who was described as agent for Müller, the vendor. Mr. White settled the conditions of sale. In the meantime Müller had applied to the Home Office for a permit, and one was granted on May 26 to proceed from Denmark Hill to Tilbury for the purpose of embarking to Germany and to "proceed direct." All that we know is that he embarked at Tilbury on the evening of the 26th. There is no evidence when he arrived in Germany, but he was at Hamburg in August. In these circumstances the purchaser claims the return of his deposit on several grounds. He contends that Müller was an alien enemy on June 2, and that, therefore, the contract was illegal. EVE, J., held that this fact had not been proved; and this being the sole point raised before him, he dismissed the action. I cannot agree with this view. I think there is a presumption of fact that a man who left Tilbury on the evening of May 26 for Flushing reached Germany before June 2, and that in the absence of any other evidence a jury would be justified in finding that he did reach Germany before June 2. He was not an alien enemy while he was in England. He did not become such the moment he left our shores. The meaning of "alien enemy" has from time to time varied. "Nationality" and "domicil" have both been treated as the critical test. The question was elaborately discussed in the full Court of Appeal in Porter v. Freudenberg (1), and it was held that neither domicil nor nationality is the true test. That decision is final so far as this court is concerned. Residence in Germany, not merely crossing the German frontier from Holland, made a man an alien enemy. Intention to reside is not sufficient. Residence implies a certain lapse of time. But, having regard to the abandonment of his British residence and to the fact that he was resident in Hamburg at least from August, if not earlier, I think it is right to hold that on June 2 Müller had become an alien enemy. The point taken before EVE, J., cannot, in my opinion, be supported. (I only mention residence because there is no suggestion of carrying on business apart from residence.)

This, however, by no means disposes of the case. I attach great weight to the power of attorney of May 20. At that date it is beyond dispute that Müller was not an alien enemy. The authority conferred upon White was complete and irrevocable. No further "intercourse" with Müller was needed. White could not be interfered with in reference to the sale. White's position was, having regard to the provisions of the Conveyancing Acts, practically the same as if Müller had conveyed the property to White upon trust for sale. LORD PARKER, in the passage to which I shall refer, seems to me to assert that a trust for sale may be executed although the sole beneficiary is an alien enemy. The transaction is not trading with the enemy within the mischief of the common law, or within the mischief of the proclamation of Sept. 9, 1914. Paragraph 3 adopts the rule in Porter v. Freudenberg (1) by stating it in a positive and also in a negative form:

"The expression 'enemy' means any person . . . resident or carrying on business in the enemy country, but does not include persons of enemy nationality who are neither resident nor carrying on business in the enemy country."

Paragraph 5 (1) applies only to a payment during the continuance of the war. Paragraph 5 (9) has no application if, as I hold, the power of attorney was the only contract or obligation with or for the benefit of Müller.

But can it be said that the power of attorney was necessarily revoked when Müller became an alien enemy? I think not. It is true that most agencies, involving as they do continuous intercourse with an alien enemy, are revoked, or at least suspended. But such considerations have no bearing upon a special agency of this nature. Counsel for the defendant drew our attention to a case decided in 1897 in the Supreme Court of the United States: Williams v. Paine (2). A power of attorney granted by an officer and his wife resident in Pennsylvania to convey land in the city of Washington was held not to be revoked by the war in which the grantors of the power took an active part with Confederates, but to be well executed notwithstanding the war. It must not be forgotten that a

A contract for sale of land stands in a peculiar position. It is for many purposes to be regarded as an equitable conveyance. The objection taken by the purchaser is not really as to title, but only as to conveyance. Time was not of the essence of the contract. The legal estate, if not got in by a deed executed by Mr. White, as I think it might be, could probably be got in by an application under the Trustee Acts, and certainly by an application under the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1916, s. 2. If an order was made under that section all difficulty would be removed.

The recent case in the House of Lords of Daimler Co., Ltd. v. Continental Tyre and Rubber Co. (Great Britain), Ltd. (3) is not a direct decision on the points raised in the present case. But I have derived great assistance from the observations of LORD PARKER. He points out (ante p. 208):

"I see no reason why a company should not trade merely because enemy shareholders may after the war become entitled to their proper share of the profits of such trading. I see no reason why the trustee of an English business with enemy cestuis que trust should not during the war continue to carry on the business, although after the war the profits may go to persons who are now enemies, or why moneys belonging to an enemy but in the hands of a trustee in this country should not be paid into court and invested in government stock or other securities for the benefit of the persons entitled after the war. The contention appears to me to extend the principle on which trading with the enemy is forbidden far beyond what reason can approve or the law can warrant. In early days the King's prerogative probably extended to seizing enemy property on land as well as on sea. As to property on land, this prerogative has long fallen into disuse. Subject to any legislation to the contrary or anything to the contrary contained in the treaty of peace when peace comes, enemy property in this country will be restored to its owners after the war as property in enemy countries belonging to His Majesty's subjects will or ought to be restored to them after the war. In the meantime it would be lamentable if the trade of this country were fettered, businesses shut down, or money allowed to remain idle in order to prevent any possible benefit accruing thereby to enemies after peace. The prohibition against doing anything for the benefit of an enemy contemplated his benefit during the war and not the possible advantage he may gain when peace comes."

The weight attributable to those observations is greatly increased by the circumstance that LORD PARKER's judgment was formally approved of and concurred in by LORD MERSEY, LORD KINNEAR and LORD SUMNER. The result is that, in my opinion, the plaintiff is not entitled to demand a return of his deposit, and the appeal fails.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—The plaintiff in this action is the purchaser of a leasehold house and premises at Denmark Hill, and he bought at an auction sale held on June 2, 1915. The defendant was the vendor, and the contract was signed by John Bott & Sons "as agents for the vendor." The defendant is of German nationality, and, although resident in England for a considerable period, has not been naturalised here. In the month of May, 1915, the defendant intended leaving England for Germany, and instructed the firm of John Bott & Sons, auctioneers, to sell his residence—namely, the said leasehold premises, and also the furniture and effects therein—by public auction. On May 20, 1915, the defendant, being then about to proceed to Germany, duly executed a deed poll whereby he appointed his solicitor, Mr. John White, to be his attorney in his name and on his behalf to sell the said premises and to execute such transfers and deeds as might be necessary for conveying the same, and to give receipts for the purchase money and for other purposes therein set out. The said deed poll contained a declaration that the power should be irrevocable for twelve calendar months from the date thereof. On May 26 the defendant obtained a police permit authorising him to proceed from Denmark Hill, S.E., to Tilbury for the purpose of embarking for Germany via Flushing. The document contains the statement "This permit holds good from 5 p.m., May 26, 1915, to proceed direct." It was given up to the aliens embarkation officer at Tilbury, upon the defendant embarking there for Flushing, and was returned by this officer to the police. The police reported to the plaintiff that the defendant left this country voluntarily for Germany on May 27. The date of his arrival in Germany was not proved. His solicitor has received letters from him from Hamburg and has corresponded with him there; but the date of the earliest letter so received was not proved at the trial. The defendant arrived in Germany and has since been and still is voluntarily resident there. In the answers to requisitions delivered by defendant's solicitors on June 15 they say, "We believe he is now in Germany." The defendant's solicitors have from time to time corresponded with the defendant at Hamburg, the defendant's last address being Ohnhorst No. 9, Klein Flottbeck, Altona, Hamburg.

Those being the facts, the plaintiff has brought this action in which he claims that his contract to purchase the said leasehold property has been dissolved by the act of the defendant in becoming an alien enemy, or, in the alternative, that it is void as being made with an alien enemy, and he asks for a return of his deposit and consequential relief. The defendant denies that the contract is invalid. His solicitor communicated with the Public Trustee immediately upon the defendant leaving for Germany, and explained the facts and asked whether the purchase money for the property should be paid to Mr. Müller's credit at his bankers or should be paid to the Public Trustee, and that official answered by enclosing a copy of Registration Order B, on which Mr. White was requested to make a return of the proceeds of the sale of the lease and furniture and effects belonging to defendant, and the Public Trustee further informed Mr. White that the money was not to be paid over to him, but was to be retained by Mr. White during the war. By his defence the defendant expressed his willingness that the purchase moneys should be paid to and received by the Public Trustee as custodian under the Trading with the Enemy Acts, 1914 to 1916, or otherwise dealt with as the court may direct. The defendant also thereby offered to consent to any order under the Trustee Act, 1893, or otherwise, vesting the premises in the plaintiff which might be necessary or advisable for the purpose of carrying the agreement into effect. The action was dismissed by EVE, J., and the plaintiff appeals. The plaintiff has contended before us that as the defendant, having broken up his establishment here and given directions for realising his house and furniture, left England on May 27, 1915, to go direct to Germany, and as he was certainly in Germany at a later date, the inference to be drawn from the facts proved is that he went direct to Germany and arrived there on or before June 2, and that, therefore, the contract of June 2 was illegal as made with an alien enemy. Further, that in any case it would be illegal to carry out the contract as any payment he might make would be a payment to or for the benefit of an alien enemy, which is forbidden by the proclamation against trading with the enemy and therefore illegal.

The question upon which this appeal turns therefore resolves itself into this: Was the agreement of June 2 illegal when it was made, or has it since become illegal to carry it out? The Trading with the Enemy Act, 1914 [repealed], which imposes penalties for trading with the enemy, provides, s. 1 (2), as follows:

"For the purposes of this Act a person shall be deemed to have traded with the enemy if he has entered into any transaction or done any act which was, at the time of such transaction or act, prohibited by or under any proclamation issued by His Majesty dealing with trading with the enemy for the time being in force, or which at common law or by statute constitutes an offence of trading with the enemy"

By the Trading with the Enemy Proclamation No. 2, dated Sept. 9, 1914, it is provided as follows:

"5. From and after the date of this proclamation the following prohibitions shall have effect (save so far as licences may be issued as hereinafter provided),

A and we do hereby accordingly warn all persons resident, carrying on business, or being in our dominions—(1) Not to pay any sum of money to or for the benefit of an enemy. . . . (9) Not to enter into any commercial, financial, or other contract or obligation with or for the benefit of an enemy."

B It was urged by the plaintiff that entering into the contract of purchase on June 2 was a transaction forbidden by cl. 5 (9) of the proclamation, as on that date it must be taken that the defendant had reached Germany and was an alien enemy. It was also urged on behalf of the plaintiff that, if he were now to pay the balance of his purchase money to Mr. White in order to complete his purchase, he would be offending against cl. 5 (1) of the proclamation.

C In my opinion, neither of these contentions is well founded. It was the auctioneers who as agents for the vendor knocked down the property to the plaintiff and made the contract of June 2, the authority so to do having been conferred upon the auctioneer by the defendant when in this country. The making of this contract did not involve any intercourse with the enemy, nor will the completion of the contract and the conveyance of the property necessitate any such intercourse, as the irrevocable power of attorney to Mr. John White fully empowers that gentleman to convey the property and receive the purchase money without communicating further with the defendant. A contract entered into in England, with an agent in England, who derives his authority from instructions given to him in England or from a deed poll executed in England by a German principal, who subsequently proceeds to Germany, is not a transaction forbidden by the proclamation, nor in particular by cl. 5 (9) of it. It is not a transaction entered into "for the benefit of an enemy," which "contemplates his benefit during the war and not the possible advantage he may gain when peace comes": per LORD PARKER in the Daimler Case (3), ante p. 209. In his judgment VISCOUNT MERSEY, LORD KINNEAR, and LORD SUMNER concurred. The money paid for the property will be retained by Mr. John White or paid to the Public Trustee, and will not be remitted to the defendant during the war, nor will he derive any benefit from it during the war. The consideration money will not be paid "to or for the benefit of an enemy" within the meaning of the proclamation, nor, in particular, within the meaning of para. 5 (1). Nor is the contract in question one entered into "with an enemy" within the meaning of para. 5 (9). It does not involve any communication or intercourse with the enemy. It is not the case of a person who, being an enemy and while he is such, purports to confer an authority on someone here. Such an authority could not lawfully be given except under licence from the Crown.

G That a contract entered into in England with a person here who simply holds or manages property belonging to an enemy is not unlawful is apparent from the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1914 [repealed]. Thus s. 2 (1) of that Act provides that any "share of profits" payable to any enemy shall be paid to the Custodian of Enemy Property; and s. 2 (5) provides that where a person is carrying on any business on behalf of an enemy, any sum which, had a state of war not existed, would have been transmissible by a person to the enemy by way of profits from that business shall be deemed to be a sum which would have been payable and paid to that enemy. This section thus contemplates that a person may lawfully be carrying on business here on behalf of an enemy. Again, s. 3 (1) requires that any person who holds or manages for or on behalf of an enemy any property, real or personal, shall furnish the custodian with certain particulars. The Public Trustee, who is the custodian for England and Wales, required Mr. White to make a return on the form applicable (Registration Order B, s. 3 (1)), and this was duly done. This again recognises that persons here may lawfully hold or manage property on behalf of an enemy, but they are bound to obey the statutory provisions with reference to it. In one sense, every contract made by such persons with reference to such property is a contract made for the benefit of an enemy, because an enemy may gain a benefit from it when peace comes, but such a contract is not, in my opinion, a contract forbidden by the proclamation. Again, s. 4 (1) has further reference to real or personal property belonging to or held or managed for or on behalf of an enemy, thus recognising such a state of things as existing legally. Again, the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916, is to the like effect. By s. 4 (1) the Board of Trade is empowered to vest in the custodian any real or personal property belonging to or held or managed for or on behalf of an enemy.

I am of opinion that the contract of June 2, 1915, was a legal contract, and that the property can be lawfully and effectually conveyed to the plaintiff, and that Mr. White, as the attorney of the defendant, can receive and give a valid discharge for the balance of the purchase money, and that the plaintiff is not entitled to have the contract rescinded or to be relieved from it. In my judgment, the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

BANKES, L.J.—The defendant in this action is a German by birth. For many years prior to May, 1915, he had resided in this country, but had never been naturalised. He was the owner of certain leasehold premises situate at Denmark Hill, where he resided. Being over military age and being desirous of returning to Germany, he obtained permission to do so from the proper authorities, and on the night of May 26, 1915, he left Tilbury on board a vessel bound for Flushing, on his way to Germany. On May 20, 1915, he executed a power of attorney in favour of Mr. John White, his solicitor, authorising him to sell his leasehold premises and to execute any deed which might be required for conveying the premises and to give an effectual receipt for the purchase money; also to sell his household effects and to give effectual receipts for the purchase money. The power was declared to be irrevocable for twelve months from the date thereof. At some date which is not in evidence, but before leaving this country, the defendant instructed Messrs. John Bott & Sons, a firm of auctioneers, to offer the leasehold premises and effects for sale by public auction. The sale was advertised to take place, and did take place, on June 2, 1915. By the conditions of sale the purchaser required to pay the auctioneers a deposit of £10 per cent. on the amount of the purchase money, and to sign an agreement in the form subjoined to the conditions, and to pay the residue of the purchase money to the vendor, or as he should direct, on June 24, 1915, at the office of the vendor's solicitors, Messrs. Whites & Co., at which time and place the purchase should be completed. The plaintiff purchased the leasehold premises at the sale for a sum of £1,050, and he signed the agreement subjoined to the conditions in which the name of the defendant was inserted as the vendor. The plaintiff also purchased at the sale certain household effects. Apparently no point is made with reference to these in the plaintiff's claim for relief. It is part of the plaintiff's case that, at the time of the purchase of the leasehold premises, he had no knowledge of the defendant, or that he was a German, or that he had left this country on his way to Germany, or that there was any reason that he might not lawfully enter into the contract of purchase. Requisitions in title were delivered on June 14, 1915, and the first requisition was in the following terms:

"Information is required by the purchaser as to the nationality by birth of the vendor, and whether, if of foreign birth, he has at any time become a naturalised Englishman, and, if so, when and where he is now residing, so that the purchaser can satisfy himself that he is in nowise precluded by the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act from proceeding with the contract for sale and purchase."

The reply was as follows:

"The vendor is a German by birth and has not been naturalised. We believe he is now in Germany. We send herewith a copy of our letter to the Public Trustee and of his reply. The purchase money will be dealt with in accordance with the directions of the Public Trustee."

The letter referred to in the reply is dated May 27 and asks for instructions as

A to how the purchase money is to be dealt with, in reply to which the Public Trustee informs Messrs. Whites that the money is not to be paid to him, but should be retained by them during the war. Correspondence followed the replies to the requisitions, and ultimately the present action was commenced on Dec. 21, 1915.

The writ was endorsed with a claim

B "for a declaration that the agreement dated June 2, 1915, and purporting to have been made between the plaintiff and the defendant for the sale of a leasehold house known as Hill Crest, Sunray Avenue, Denmark Hill, is void, or has been dissolved by reason of the defendant, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, being at that time an alien enemy or having since become so."

C The first ground of this claim must be founded upon the fact that the defendant was an alien enemy at the date when the agreement was made. The second ground must be founded upon the impossibility of completing the purchase without infringing the law against trading with the enemy. The learned judge in the court below decided against the plaintiff's claim. He refused to draw the inference from the evidence that the plaintiff had arrived and was resident in Germany by June 2, and was, therefore, an alien enemy at that date. If it was necessary to decide this point, I should not be prepared to agree with the view of the learned judge. After making all due allowance for delays and difficulties arising from the state of war, I think the natural inference from the facts is that the defendant must have arrived in Germany before June 2, and if so, that he was at that date resident there within the meaning of that expression when used in reference to an alien enemy. Assuming that to be so, how does it affect the plaintiff's claim?

E It is said that it brings the case within the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1914, and of the Trading with the Enemy Proclamation (No. 2), and that the agreement of June 2 is invalid because it comes within the language of the prohibitions contained in the proclamation. In my opinion, this is not so. The statute and the proclamation are both dealing with criminal offences. The particular offence of entering into a contract with an enemy, which is forbidden by cl. 5 (a) of the Trading with the Enemy Proclamation (No. 2), is one where, in my opinion, a knowledge of the facts which render the act unlawful is an essential element of the offence. In the present case it is part of the plaintiff's case that he entered into the agreement of purchase quite innocently, and in entire ignorance that he was dealing with an enemy. Under these circumstances he cannot, in my opinion, claim to be relieved of his bargain on the ground that he was guilty of a crime, when the fact is that he was entirely innocent.

G There remain, therefore, the two questions whether the contract was unlawful at common law, and whether, assuming that not to be so, any proceedings to complete the purchase with knowledge that the defendant is an enemy is forbidden by the statute and the proclamation. I think that these two questions, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, should be considered together. The material facts appear to be these. The defendant while in this country had given the auctioneers the necessary authority to put the property up for auction. There is no evidence that at the time they did so they were aware that the defendant was in Germany, or that he had left this country. The plaintiff was certainly unaware of either fact. Before leaving this country the defendant had given to Mr. White a power of attorney which purported to be irrevocable for twelve months, which I gave him full authority to complete the sale, and which did not necessarily involve any communication with the defendant, either in reference to the sale or to the disposal of the purchase money. Before the writ was issued the attorney had taken the instructions of the Public Trustee as to the disposal of the purchase money, of which he had informed the plaintiff. By his defence the defendant expressed his willingness that the purchase money should be paid to, and received by, the Public Trustee as custodian under the Trading with the Enemy Acts, 1914 to 1916, or otherwise dealt with as the court might direct, and he further consented to any order being made under the Trustee Act, 1893, or otherwise vesting the premises in the plaintiff which might be necessary or advisable for the purpose of carrying the agreement into effect. I do not see any ground for saying that the fact that the defendant has become an enemy has put an end to the power of attorney. Even if it had, there is power in the Board of Trade under s. 4 of the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916, to give the Custodian full power to convey the property so that no difficulty need arise on that ground. The completion of the sale will not involve any communication with the defendant or any payment to him, or for his benefit while the war lasts. Why, then, should the court interfere? Is there anything in the contractual relations of the parties at their present stage which can be said to offend against either the principles of the common law or the provisions of any statute, if the purchase is allowed to proceed to completion. I think not. The alternative seems either to condemn the property to remain derelict until the end of the war or to hold the plaintiff to his bargain with the variation imposed by statute that the purchase money is to be held up and not paid over to the vendor until the war is over. I think that the latter is not only the reasonable course, but it is the one which is in accordance with the law. In my opinion, the appeal fails.

WARRINGTON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: I think the true inference from the facts is that the defendant arrived in Germany for the purpose of taking up his residence there some time before June 2. and was, therefore, an alien enemy at the date of the contract. His expressed object in leaving this country was to proceed to Germany and nowhere else, and this is also admitted on the pleadings, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary I cannot hold that he abandoned this intention. There was ample time, even allowing for abnormal delays occasioned by the state of war, to reach Germany before June 2. On the whole, then, I think the case must be dealt with on the footing that the defendant was an alien enemy on the date of the contract and I propose to deal with it on that footing.

The contract which is in question in this case is one for the sale of land. Until the passing of the Naturalization Act, 1870, no alien was capable of acquiring, holding, or disposing of land except as leasehold residence or place of business for a term not exceeding twenty-one years. This disability was first removed by s. 2 of the Naturalization Act, 1870 [repealed], which provided that real and personal property of every description might be taken, acquired, held, and disposed of by an alien in the same manner in all respects as by a natural-born British subject. This provision is re-enacted by s. 17 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914 [repealed by British Nationality Act, 1948], the statute in force at the date of the contract in question. A contract for the sale of land is a preliminary to a final disposition of the land, and is indeed in equity itself a conditional disposition, and the land from the date of the contract is considered as belonging to the purchaser, subject, of course, to the payment of the purchase money and the vendor's lien therefor: see WILLIAMS, VENDOR AND PURCHASER (2nd Edn.), vol. 1, p. 504. The contract, therefore, is not simply executory, although the purchase money is not paid; it at once gives the purchaser an equitable interest in the land, and it confers on the vendor a lien for his purchase money. Again, a recognised mode of dealing with land is through an attorney acting under a power of attorney. If such a power is made irrevocable, as is the case with that of May 20, 1915, then, in favour of a purchaser, not only can it not be revoked in the ordinary sense, but any act done by the donee within the limits of the authority conferred by the power will be as valid as if anything done by the donor of the power without the concurrence of the donee had not been done: Conveyancing Act, 1882, s. 9. The attorney under such a power is not like an ordinary agent. As between him and a purchaser he is, so long as he does not exceed his authority, absolutely independent of the principal. He has no occasion to consult or confer with him, and he need pay no attention to any directions he may give. The attorney in fact, when dealing with a purchaser, is exclusively clothed with all the capacities of the principal in reference to the subject-matter. The contract in the present case is

A made by the attorney. It is true it is signed by the auctioneer, who received his original instructions from the defendant himself, but before the sale was effected the attorney was the only person who had power to sell, the auctioneer became subject to his directions, and must be taken to have been acting on his behalf.

The question then is: Does the fact that the principal is an alien enemy avoid a contract for the sale of land made by his attorney, appointed by an irrevocable power before he had assumed enemy character? In the first place to so hold would involve the further decision that a final disposition of the land by the attorney would also be void, inasmuch as there is no difference in principle between the two classes of disposition. There is no reported decision bearing directly on the question, owing no doubt to the modern origin of the holding of land by aliens. The decisions (except Halsey v. Esplanade (4), which is not in point) are in reference to commercial transactions and transactions of a similar nature. It is necessary, therefore, to ascertain what are the principles of law on the subject and how they are applicable to the novel circumstances with which we have to deal in the present case. I propose to consider—first, the principles of the common law, and to inquire whether there is anything in them to require the avoidance of the contract, and then to ascertain whether there is anything in the statutes or the proclamation bearing on the subject which affects the question.

In the first place, it is, I think, well settled that by the rules of the common law when this nation is at war with another no British subject can lawfully have any intercourse, commercial or otherwise, with an enemy except by the permission, express or implied, of the executive authority of the State. As to commercial intercourse, this is clearly laid down by LORD STOWELL in The Hoop (5). I attach great importance to the ground on which that very learned judge rests the principle. It is this, that such intercourse pro tanto interrupts the state of war which exists between the subjects of enemy States, and as the Sovereign alone has power to declare peace and war he alone can make lawful such an interruption. That intercourse, other than commercial, is also forbidden: see Robson v. Premier Oil and Pipe Line Co., Ltd. (6). This rule is, I think, absolute, and the prohibition does not depend on the question whether the intercourse may or may not tend to the advantage of the enemy or the detriment of this country. As to this there is a further rule which I will mention and discuss presently. Does the rule which I am now considering prohibit intercourse between two British subjects, one of whom is the attorney of an enemy but in a position to deal with the subject-matter independently of the enemy? I cannot think it does. On this point the ground of the rule as stated by LORD STOWELL seems to me of great importance. The intercourse between two British subjects under such circumstances causes no interruption of the state of war, and the reason for the prohibition does not exist. So far, then, as the common law is concerned, the rule I am now discussing does not render it necessary to avoid the present contract.

Is there anything in the proclamation or the statutes which compels me to arrive at a different conclusion? [HIS LORDSHIP then considered the Trading with the Enemy Acts, which have been repealed, and said that their terms confirmed the view that such a contract as the present was not to be treated as within the prohibition which he was considering. He continued:] But there is a further rule of the common law which it is necessary to consider. That is, that no British subject can, without the permission of the executive, have any dealings with any person, whether an enemy himself or some other person in this or in a neutral country on behalf of an enemy, which may possibly tend to the benefit or advantage of the enemy or the detriment of this country: R. v. Kupfer (7). The question whether a transaction which cannot possibly so tend is within the prohibition was left open by this court in Robson v. Premier Oil and Pipe Line Co., Ltd. (6). It was said by LORD PARKER in the Daimler Case (3), in effect, that the benefit or advantage contemplated by this rule is a benefit or advantage accruing during war, and the fact that after the war and not till then a benefit will accrue to the enemy is not sufficient to render a transaction illegal. He sums up his view on this point in the following words (ante pp. 208, 209):

"The prohibition against doing anything for the benefit of an enemy contemplates his benefit during the war and not the possible advantage he may gain when peace comes."

This judgment was prepared with the assistance and collaboration of LORD SUMNER and was adopted as their own by LORDS MERSEY and KINNEAR. The proclamation of Sept. 9, 1914, in cl. 5 (1) warns persons not to pay any sum of money to or for the benefit of an enemy. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that it would, under the rules of the common law and under the proclamation, be illegal for him to pay the purchase money, inasmuch as that would be a payment for the benefit of the enemy, and that, therefore, he is excused from performance. The payment in the present case would properly be made to the attorney in this country and not to the enemy himself. The attorney in the present case has complied with s. 3 of the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1914, by communicating the facts to the Custodian and asking for his directions, and the Custodian in reply has directed him to keep the money. It must, I think, be presumed that Mr. White will do his duty as he has hitherto done it, and, if so, the result will be that the enemy will part with his property and be kept out of his purchase money till the end of the war. Moreover, if there be any doubt as to the propriety of the payment of the purchase money to the attorney, the last-mentioned statute provides machinery, extended by the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916, s. 4, whereby the right to recover and receive the purchase money may be vested in the Custodian, who will in that case hold it until the termination of the present war and thereafter deal with the same in such manner as His Majesty may by order in Council direct. The result is, in my opinion, that the contract can be carried out without requiring the plaintiff to do any act which is illegal either at common law or under the proclamation or the statutes.

There remains one point to consider. It has been contended that the authority of the attorney was determined by the assumption by the principal of enemy character, and Hugh Stevenson & Sons, Ltd. v. Aktiengesellschaft für Cartonagen-Industrie (8) is relied upon in support of that contention. In that case, however, it was pointed out by ATKIN, J., that the agency agreement there held to be determined necessarily involved commercial intercourse with an enemy, and I gather that this was also the ground of the assent to ATKIN, J.'s conclusion expressed by the Court of Appeal. As I have already pointed out, the attorney in the present case exercises his powers without reference to his principal, and that being so I can find nothing in reason or authority which would justify me in saying that the power of attorney is avoided. On this point I also refer to the American case of Williams v. Paine (2). On the whole I come to the conclusion that, although, in my opinion, the defendant had assumed enemy character at the date of the contract, the contract was a valid and binding contract. If I am wrong in finding that the defendant was an enemy at the date of the contract, then it follows from what I have said that his subsequent assumption of enemy character did not involve the doing by the plaintiff of an illegal act in performing his part of the contract and did not therefore excuse him from performance. EVE, J., was, in my opinion, right in dismissing the plaintiff's action, though not for the reason given by him, and this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

SCRUTTON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: Two main questions were involved in the appeal. (i) Did any part of the transaction involve Tingley in the offence of trading with the enemy, if Müller were an alien enemy? (ii) When did Müller become an alien enemy? Trading with the enemy was at first committed principally in relation to ships, their cargoes, and the insurances thereon, and the first detailed exposition of the law was given by LORD STOWELL in The Hoop (5) in 1799. At common law, owing to the attitude of LORD MANSFIELD toward insurances, the law had been uncertain: see per LORD MANSFIELD in Gast

A v. Mason (9), and per BULLER, J., in Bell v. Gilson (10); but in 1800, in Potts v. Bell (11), LORD KENYON practically adopted verbatim the judgment of LORD STOWELL "that trading with the enemy without the King's license was illegal in British subjects." In LORD STOWELL's view neither commercial intercourse with the enemy, nor, under its cover, any other species of intercourse, could be carried on, except with the direct permission of the State. This was both because of the danger to the State from such intercourse and the impossibility of enforcing any such contracts by suit. As stated by WILLES, J., in Esposito v. Bowden (12) (7 E. & B. at pp. 779, 783), a declaration of war imports a prohibition of commercial intercourse and correspondence with the inhabitants of the enemy's country; and in the case of contracts made before the declaration of war, but which remain unexecuted when it is declared, if the further execution is unlawful or impossible as involving intercourse with the enemy, the contract is dissolved, and both parties are absolved from further performance of it. When the present war [1914-1918] broke out the President in the Probate Division collected the authorities in his judgment in The Panariellos (13) stating the illegality to extend to all intercourse, whether commercial or otherwise; and a similar conclusion was reached in this court in Robson v. Premier Oil and Pipe Line Co., Ltd. (6), where D PICKFORD, L.J., stated that all intercourse, whether commercial or otherwise, with an alien enemy which might injure this country or help the enemy was illegal, but reserved the question whether intercourse which could not possibly have the above effect was illegal. I think it very dangerous that British citizens should be allowed to speculate whether their intercourse with the enemy can injure their country, or help the enemy and to deal with the enemy if they persuade themselves such intercourse is harmless. This may open an excuse for many undetected, but injurious, transactions. LORD STOWELL in The Hoop (5) (1 Ch. Rob. at p. 199) took the view that

F "it is not for individuals to determine on the expediency of such occasions in their own notions of commerce . . . and possibly on grounds of private advantage not very reconcilable with the general interests of the State. It is for the State alone, on more enlarged views of policy and in consideration of all circumstances that may be connected with such an intercourse, to determine where it shall be permitted and under what regulations."

G In my view, the question left undetermined by the Court of Appeal in Robson's Case (6) should be answered emphatically, by saying that no intercourse with an alien enemy should take place, unless by permission of the State. What at the time constitutes an "alien enemy"? In the Driefontein Case (14) LORD DAVEY said ([1902] A.C. at p. 499):

H "There are three rules which are established in our common law. The first is that the King's subjects cannot trade with an alien enemy, i.e., a person owing allegiance to a government at war with the King, without the King's licence."

In the same case, LORD LINDLEY said (ibid at pp. 505, 506):

I "When considering questions arising with an alien enemy, it is not the nationality of a person but his place of business during war that is important . . . the validity of his contracts does not depend on his nationality, nor even on what is his real domicile, but on the place or places where he carries on his business or businesses."

The full Court of Appeal in Porter v. Freudenberg (1) state the law thus ([1915] 1 K.B. at pp. 867, 868, 869):

"The term alien enemy in its natural meaning indicates a subject of enemy nationality; . . . but that is not the sense in which the term is used in reference to civil rights. . . . It is clear law that the test for this purpose is not nationality, but the place of carrying on the business. . . . For the purpose of determining civil rights a British subject or the subject of a neutral State, who is voluntarily resident or who is carrying on business in hostile territory, is to be regarded and treated as an alien enemy."

And turning to one of the leading authorities on international law, MR. HALL (INTERNATIONAL LAW (6th Edn.), p. 491) says:

"The chief test of the existence of such an identification of a neutral subject with an enemy State as will suffice to clothe him with an enemy character is supplied by the fact of domicile."

These passages are at first sight sufficiently contradictory to render it necessary to examine carefully what the present basis of enemy character is, for the Court of Appeal and LORD DAVEY appear directly to contradict each other, and LORD LINDLEY and MR. HALL seem to take exactly opposite views of the importance of domicile.

Originally war declared by one prince against another involved in its consequences all the subjects of both who were exhorted in the customary proclamation, "Courir sus aux ennemis": WESTLAKE, INTERNATIONAL LAW, pt. ii, War, p. 36. GROTIUS (III.3.9) states that "a war declared against him who has the supreme authority in a population is considered to be declared against all his subjects."

Allegiance was then the test of an alien enemy. In the time of Calvin's Case (15) the alienigena, alien born, might become an enemy by a war with his prince. It is the governing principle that is stated by LORD DAVEY in the Driefontein Case (14). But with the growth of commerce and greater tenderness to private property an alleviation or exception was introduced into the rule of allegiance or nationality. An alien enemy by allegiance could lose his enemy character for the time if he was residing in the King's dominions or trading there by the licence of the Crown. It used to be, and probably still is, necessary to show a licence or permission from the Crown, express or implied: Alciator v. Smith (16); Alcinous v. Nigreu (17). A subject by allegiance could for the time lose his friendly or national character by residing or trading in the enemy's dominions. Either party, by residing or trading in a neutral country, might acquire for the time a neutral character. The conditions under which this loss of national character might be achieved, and under which the new character by residence might be lost, have been carefully considered by LORD STOWELL in several cases where questions of trading with the enemy or the enemy ownership of property seized as prize were in dispute. The conditions of this character are sometimes called "domicil," which explains the statement already quoted from MR. HALL, but by that phrase is not meant civil domicile, what LORD LINDLEY calls in the passage cited his "real domicile," but a condition more easily acquired and lost, called by some of the test writers "commercial" or "trade domicile"—"domicil in a peculiar sense differing considerably from ordinary domicile, which is known as 'trade domicile' in war, but is equally applicable to persons not engaged in trade": see DICEY, CONFLICT OF LAWS (2nd Edn.), App. note vii, p. 741; WESTLAKE, INTERNATIONAL LAW, pt. ii, War, p. 54. Civil domicile is such a permanent residence in a country as makes that country a person's home. Commercial domicile is such a residence in a country for the purposes of trade or otherwise as makes a person's trade or estate form part of its resources: see HALL, INTERNATIONAL LAW (6th Edn.), p. 491. To gain a civil domicile, residence is required with an intention of making the country one's home. To gain a commercial domicile residence with no intention of leaving shortly is sufficient, and time is the principal element in the domicile. "Time is the grand ingredient in constituting domicile," says LORD STOWELL in The Harmony (18) (2 Ch. Rob. at p. 324), and the whole judgment is worth consideration. DA LUSHINGTON in The Aina (19) (Spinks at p. 10) defines the condition as one

"where a man after the declaration of war continues to reside in the enemy's country for the purpose of trade."

A It is not necessary here further to consider the numerous authorities bearing on the acquisition and nature of this "commercial domicile," for it is clear that Mr. Muller by long residence, and registration as an alien, had up to the day that he left England such a domicile that he was not then an "alien enemy" in the view of the common law.

B How does an enemy subject who has temporarily lost his enemy character by acquiring such a commercial domicile lose that domicile? A civil or real domicile can only be lost by complete abandonment in fact and intention of the domicile. When it is lost, if there is no other domicile acquired, the domicile of origin reverts. A commercial or trade domicile may be lost by intention to abandon it, coupled with some overt act or step taken to effect the change, and leaving the country with no intention of immediate return, and with a sale of one's property therein, seems clearly to destroy a commercial domicile. Thus in The President (20) a natural-born English subject was American consul and trading at the Cape of Good Hope, then in the possession of the Dutch enemy, but was intending to return to America. LORD STOWELL, treating him as an enemy, said (5 Ch. Rob. at p. 280):

D "A mere intention to remove has never been held sufficient without some overt act—something more than mere verbal declaration, some solid fact showing that the party is in the act of withdrawing has always been held necessary to divest enemy character."

In La Virginie (21), where a Frenchman trading in America left it temporarily, shipped goods from a French colony, and returned to America, LORD STOWELL, holding him an enemy, said (ibid. at p. 99):

E "It is always to be remembered that the national character easily reverts, and that it requires fewer circumstances to constitute domicile (i.e., 'his national domicile') in the case of an enemy subject than to impress the national character on one who is originally of another country."

I agree with the language of ARNOLD ON MARINE INSURANCE (9th Edn.), vol. i, s. 92, p. 130, in discussing alien enemies:

F "A national character, acquired in a foreign country by residence, changes immediately the party has left such country animo non revertendi; and this is especially the case if he be returning to his native country, sine animo revertendi. In such case the native domicile revives while he is yet in transitu, for it very easily reverts, and is re-acquired the moment the foreign domicile is abandoned."

G Similar language is used by DICEY, CONFLICT OF LAWS, App. note 7, p. 744; DUELL ON MARINE INSURANCE, vol. i, pp. 514-15; HALL, INTERNATIONAL LAW (6th Edn.), p. 433; WESTLAKE, INTERNATIONAL LAW, pt. i, Peace, p. 206. This is, indeed, founded on the language of LORD STOWELL in The Indian Chief (22) (3 Ch. Rob. at p. 20):

H "The national character of Mr. Johnson [born in the United States] as a British merchant was acquired by residence and rested on that circumstance alone; it must be held that from the moment he turns his back on the country where he has resided on his way back to his own country he was in the act of resuming his original character, and is to be considered as an American. The character that is gained by residence ceases by residence. It is an adventitious character which no longer adheres to him from the moment that he puts himself in motion bona fide to quit the country sine animo revertendi."

I This passage was approved by the House of Lords in Uday v. Uday (23) (L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. at pp. 451, 454). When, then, Mr. Muller left England on May 26 or 27 intending to go to Germany, and having made arrangements to sell his house and furniture, I think it is clear that at any rate he lost the English commercial domicile he had acquired by residence in England with the permission of the Crown. There is no evidence that he acquired any other character. What then was his character?

In my view, the original and fundamental rule of nationality provides the answer. Until he has acquired another trade domicile by residence or trade sufficient to establish such a domicile, his national character determined by allegiance reverts, and he was a German, and, therefore, an alien enemy the moment he left England. LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Harman v. Kingston (24) (3 Camp. at p. 153) required proof that a man was an enemy "by birth or domicile." If you can find no domicile his birth or allegiance settles the question. Otherwise a British subject is justified in trading with a German wherever found, unless it can be proved that the German is resident or carrying on business in Germany, a position which, in view of the very various and dubious purposes for which a German may be at present found outside Germany, seems a very dangerous one.

I am of opinion, therefore, that Mr. Müller was, on and before June 2, 1915, an alien enemy. If it had been necessary I should have been prepared to find that he had reached Germany on June 2. It is true that long ago LORD KENYON called the plea of "alien enemy" "that odious plea" (Casseres v. Bell (25), 8 Term Rep. at p. 167), and LORD ELLENBOROUGH in Harman v. Kingston (24) said: "A defence of this sort which goes merely in disability of the person is to be made out by the strictest proof." But I respectfully agree with LORD DAVEY's observation in the Driefontein Case (14) ([1902] A.C. at p. 499) that "the objection being one based on considerations of public policy affecting the Sovereign, courts should be held bound to take notice of the plaintiff's inability to sue," and to decide it with strictness against neither party, but on the ordinary rules of proof. I can see nothing strained in holding that a German who says he is going back direct to his native country, and is known to have started, has got there in less than five times the ordinary time of transit. And I doubt whether the position would be any better if Mr. Müller is only taken to have arrived after June 2, but before the time fixed for completion.

If Mr. Müller was an alien enemy on June 2, I think it is clear that by the common law to contract with him personally, though through an agent, and for the sale of land in England was the offence of trading or having commercial intercourse with the enemy. Perhaps selling land is not ordinarily called trading, though it is the trade of land companies; but selling English land to Germans must be against the spirit and the letter of the law, and the selling of English land by Germans seems to me the same. If Müller was one party to the contract, it can make no difference that he contracted through an English agent. LORD SUMNER, in giving the judgment of the Privy Council in The Panariellos (13) says (85 L.J.P. at p. 116):

"Intercourse with an enemy subject resident in an enemy country is forbidden even though it takes place through his agent in the United Kingdom."

The full Court of Appeal in Marwell v. Grunhut (26) say (31 T.L.R. at p. 79):

"It is obvious the agent could have no greater right than his principal, who, being an alien enemy, could not sue."

ROWLATT, J., in Schmitz (Schmidt) v. Van der Veen & Co. (27) allowed an agent to recover who sold goods as a principal in England for the best price he could get, accounting percentage for the excess over a minimum price to his principal in Germany. The learned judge took the view that the sale by principal to principal in England was in order; what the principal-agent did with the price was another matter, and he had consented to its being vested in the Public Trustee, which removed any objection as to the destination of the price during the war. It may be that a principal to a contract may sue though he is an agent for an alien enemy and a trustee for an alien enemy may sue. Brindon v. Nesbitt (28) is to the contrary effect. There a broker in whose name a policy was effected for and on account of alien enemies was held by the court not entitled to recover. Flood v. Waters (29), cited by ROWLATT, J., turns on a question of pleading—that only the general issue had been pleaded, and not a plea of alien enemy. The other trustee cases—Drubuz v. Morshhead (30) and Antoine v. Morshhead (31)—were both brought

A after the war on bills given during the war by English prisoners in France, endorsed to enemies, and GIBBS, C.J., treats them as an exception to the general rule in favour of English prisoners, who can only raise money during the war by discounting their bills with enemies: see WESTLAKE, War, p. 51. I observe that LORD PARKER in the Drumler Case (3) appears to treat the carrying on of business by trustees on behalf of alien enemies as quite lawful provided the enemies get no benefit till the end of the war. I am not aware of any authority for this, and I do not know that it was necessary for the decision of the case before the House. If correct, it will allow all the German businesses in this country to be carried on by trustees though their owners, the cestuis que trust, are fighting against us, a procedure which, if legally correct, which I doubt, will very much startle public opinion. In my view, the appointment of an English trustee or attorney during the war would be illegal when cestui que trust or principal became an alien enemy. C I note that Parliament, in spite of LORD PARKER's view, has, by Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916, s. 1, empowered the Board of Trade to prohibit all such business carried on by trustees for the benefit of alien enemies. It is also suggested that under s. 46 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881 [Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 123], the holder of the power of attorney might convey in his own name, D and so the conveyance be effected from Englishman to Englishman. I do not find it necessary for my decision to determine this or the position of trustees, for in this case the oral contract is one made on June 2 by the auctioneer in the name of and by direct instruction from Müller. The written document necessary for any enforceable contract is made with Müller who I have held was then an alien enemy. If that was illegal as trading with the enemy, it need not be considered what would E be the effect if the contract had been made and carried out in another way.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the contract was illegal at common law, and as the plaintiff did not know that the defendant was an alien enemy at the time and repudiated the contract as soon as he knew, he has not such criminality as prevents him recovering the money paid, no part of the agreement having been performed: Tappenden v. Randall (32); Kearley v. Thomson (33). This does not apply to the F furniture, where the contract was completely executed, or for the cost of investigating title and appealing against the assessment, which are in the nature of damages. I am not sure, however, that the same or a larger result might not be obtained in an action for rescission for concealment of a material fact. In Carlsh v. Salt (34) JOYCE, J., states the law thus ([1906] 1 Ch. at p. 341):

G "Upon consideration of the authorities, I am of opinion that the vendor of real estate is under a similar obligation [to disclose defects] with respect to a material defect in the title or in the subject of the sale, which defect is exclusively within his knowledge, and which the purchaser would not be expected to discover for himself with the care ordinarily used in such transactions."

H I am inclined to think that the fact that the vendor was an alien enemy was a material defect in the title, which should have been disclosed, but it is not necessary to discuss this.

If, then, the contract of June 2 would have been illegal at common law, and if, as I have held, it is immaterial that it was not hurtful to this country, if the purchase money was not paid over, the remaining question is whether the statutes and proclamations have superseded the common law, and whether the contract can I be justified under the statutes and proclamations. [His LORDSHIP examined the statutes and proclamations and said:] I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the only way in which the transaction can be attacked successfully is, that under the common law the contract of June 2, being a financial transaction with Müller, a German then returning to Germany, and having no residence or place of business in any other country, was trading with the enemy, but that by reason of the definition of enemy in the proclamation incorporated in the statute this transaction is not a statutory offence.

I am not impressed with the argument that this transaction should be allowed, for otherwise the land of England would lie idle. If the government think it right, any land held by an alien enemy can under s. 4 of the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1914, be vested in the Custodian by order of the court, on the application of the Custodian or any government Department, with power to the Custodian to manage it; it may also under the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916, be so vested by the Board of Trade in the Custodian without any application to the court. The government have the power to prevent any land owned by alien enemies from remaining unprofitable; if they do not choose to use this power it is not for private individuals to rectify their omission by dealing with the enemy. The history of this war has shown that leniency to the subjects of some belligerent nations in their private affairs is only abused by them in the interests of their country. I am very much impressed by the public danger of a decision which, at a time when British subjects are being called upon to give up their businesses to serve their country, will enable alien German subjects resident in Germany, and perhaps fighting against this country, to carry on connecting English businesses through trustees or agents and to deal in the same way with English property. That Parliament has given statutory power to a government Department to stop such action by trustees supports my view. It is, I think, very dangerous to allow British subjects to speculate as to what dealings with Germans are not injurious to this country; the safer rule is to treat all dealings with alien enemies as forbidden unless the Crown expressly sanctions them. In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed, and the plaintiff should be granted a declaration that the contract of June 2, 1915, was by the common law of England illegal ab initio, as being made with an alien enemy, and an order for the return of the deposit with 5 per cent. interest from June 2, 1915, and costs here and below except so far as they were increased by the claim for furniture, and costs, and charges.

BRAY, J. [having stated the facts]: The contentions of the plaintiff were (a) that the court ought to draw the inference that on June 2, the date of the contract, the defendant was residing in Germany and, therefore, an alien enemy; (b) that as soon as he became an alien enemy the power of attorney was revoked or ceased to have any force; (c) that the contract was void ab initio on the ground that, being made with an alien enemy, it was illegal; or (d) then, if he was not an enemy on the date of the contract, it was dissolved when he became an alien enemy before completion, on the ground that he could not complete the purchase either personally or by his agent.

As to the contention (a) the learned judge held that no such inference could be drawn, and he dismissed the action on that ground. I prefer not to decide the case on that ground, although the inclination of my opinion is that we ought not to differ from Eve, J.'s decision. No doubt, before the war a man intending to go to Germany via Flushing, and shown to have left for Flushing by the Flushing boat on the evening of May 26, could be certain to arrive in Germany before June 2, and might be said to be residing there unless there was some change of intention on his part or something unusual had happened, but in times of war some delay is sure to occur. The Germans, I take it, do not admit anyone into their territory without inquiries, and inquiries may cause more or less delay. I do not know what inquiries they make or what delays occur. I think it probable that he would arrive in Germany before June 2, but I feel I should be guessing, and guessing is not sufficient. It is said that if he had not arrived by June 2 he could have easily proved that fact. I do not think it would be so easy. He cannot come here and give evidence. His evidence cannot be taken on commission. A letter from him to say that he arrived there, say, on June 5 would not be evidence. On the other hand, the plaintiff might be able to get evidence from Holland to say that he was seen to go by a certain train which would in the ordinary course arrive in Germany, say, on May 28, and that the German government put no difficulties

A in the way of German subjects passing through the frontier. But there is no such evidence. For these reasons I think that I should have considerable hesitation in reversing EYE, J.'s decision on this point. It was argued that the defendant became an alien enemy the moment he embarked on the boat at Tilbury with the intention of going to Germany. I do not agree. The probability that he may become an enemy is not the same as becoming an enemy: see per LORD HALSBURY in Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines, Ltd. (14). However, for the purpose of considering the other points, I will assume that the defendant was an alien enemy on June 2.

C The next contention on the part of the plaintiff was that the power of attorney was revoked when the defendant became an alien enemy. No doubt if the fact that the defendant became an alien enemy made it unlawful for the attorney to sign the contract or complete the sale the contract would be void, and it would be unnecessary to consider this point, but I understand the contention to be that the power of attorney was revoked by the mere fact that the defendant became an alien enemy, and that this was so whether the contract were lawful or unlawful. In other words, it was put as a separate point independent of the alleged illegality of the contract. I will consider this point first independently of s. 9 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882 [see now Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 127]. I cannot understand why it should be said that the power is revoked. There was no change of intention on the part of the defendant. He gave the power of attorney to Mr. White in order that Mr. White or the auctioneers might make the contract on his behalf while he was in Germany, and had so become an alien enemy. Death revokes the power of attorney because the grantor has thereby lost the power of forming an intention, and insanity for the same reason; marriage revokes it because a change of intention is presumed; a bankruptcy because a bankrupt cannot deal with his property or give anyone authority to do so; but I fail to see any reason why the mere fact of becoming an alien enemy should revoke the power. I think, apart altogether from the Conveyancing Act, this contention on the part of the plaintiff fails. Then as to s. 9 of the Conveyancing Act. If this section applies at all to an alien enemy it is conclusive against the plaintiff on this point because the power was made irrevocable for twelve months. It might possibly be contended that this section had no application at all when the grantor became an alien enemy, and that an exception should be read into it, as was done to s. 6 of the Naturalization Act, 1870: see R. v. Ljueh (35), and to s. 14 of the British Nationality and Status of Aliens Act, 1914, in the recent case in this court of Ex parte Freyberger (36). I prefer to hold that, apart from this section, this power of attorney was not revoked.

H The real question we have to consider is whether it became unlawful for Mr. White or the auctioneers (it matters not which) to make this contract on behalf of the defendant on June 2, the defendant then being, as I have assumed, an alien enemy. No doubt, this is an important and difficult question. First, it seems to me that Mr. White under his power could, through the auctioneers, sell his property, execute the transfer, and complete the sale without communicating in any way with the defendant. No intercourse with the defendant would be necessary. Mr. White had undertaken with the Public Trustee to deal with the money as directed. The defendant, if he could not touch the money till after the war, would derive no benefit from the contract till after the war. LORD PARKER in Daimler Co., Ltd. v. Continental Tyre and Rubber Co. (Great Britain), Ltd. (3) said (ante pp. 208, 209):

"The prohibition against doing anything for the benefit of the enemy contemplates his benefit during the war and not the possible advantage he may gain when peace comes."

I The defendant, being the original lessee, would remain liable for the rent, and although he would be entitled to be indemnified by the purchaser yet he could not during the war enforce that right: see Halsey v. Esdaile (5). Then is it against public policy that an alien enemy having an interest in real property should be at liberty to sell it if this involves no intercourse and the alien enemy cannot receive the price? How could it be a detriment to the State? Surely it would be a detriment to the State if he could not. If he cannot sell it he cannot let it, and as far as I can see he could not even engage a caretaker to look after it or employ a person to keep it in repair. No doubt the Public Trustee could intervene, but he was not bound to do so, and he would probably hesitate to do so, as he would render himself liable to the landlord to pay the rent and observe the covenants. It seems to me that it would be to the interest of the State that the alien enemy should be able to sell his property if it can be done, as I think it could be done in this case without intercourse and without benefiting the enemy.

How do the authorities stand? What is the common law as shown by the authorities? There are no authorities with reference to contracts for the sale of interests in real property, and as until 1870 aliens could not lawfully hold land the judges, in deciding cases prior to that date upon other contracts, could not have had in contemplation contracts for the sale of land. This must be remembered, but still the principles on which the earlier cases were decided must be regarded, so far as they are applicable to contracts for the sale of land, and the authorities must, therefore, be examined. These authorities, including the important case of The Hoop (5), have been recently considered in this court. In Porter v. Freudenberg (1) LORD READING, C.J., says ([1915] 1 K.B. at pp. 867, 868, 880):

“Ever since the great case of The Hoop (5) the law has been firmly established as pronounced in the judgment of LORD STOWELL (then SIR WILLIAM SCOTT) that one of the consequences of war was the absolute interdiction of all commercial intercourse or correspondence by a British subject with the inhabitants of the hostile country except by permission of the Sovereign (see also Potts v. Bell (11), per LORD KENYON, C.J. (8 Term. Rep. at p. 561)). This branch of law was again considered as a result of the Crimean War, and WILLES, J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Queen’s Bench in Esposito v. Bowden (12) said (7 E. & B. at p. 779):

‘It is now fully established that the presumed object of war being as much to cripple the enemy’s commerce as to capture his property, a declaration of war imports a prohibition of commercial intercourse and correspondence with the inhabitants of the enemy’s country, and that such intercourse, except with the licence of the Crown, is illegal.’

This law was founded in earlier days upon the conception that all subjects owing allegiance to the Crown were at war with the subjects of the State at war with the Crown, and later it was grounded upon public policy, which forbids the doing of acts that will be or may be to the advantage of the enemy State by increasing its capacity for prolonging hostilities in adding to the credit, money or goods, or other resources available to individuals in the enemy State. . . . The rule of law suspending the alien enemy’s right of action is based upon public policy, but no considerations of public policy are apparent which would justify preventing the enforcement by a British or neutral subject of a right against the enemy. As was said by BAILHACHE, J., in Robinson & Co. v. Continental Insurance Co. of Mannheim (37) ([1915] 1 K.B. at p. 159):

‘To hold that a subject’s right of suit is suspended against an alien enemy is to injure a British subject and to favour an alien enemy and to defeat the object and reason of the suspending rule.’

In our judgment the effect would be to convert that which during war is a disability, imposed upon the alien enemy because of his hostile character, into a relief to him during war from the discharge of his liabilities to British subjects.”

In Halsey v. Esplen (4), where the question was whether the liability of an alien enemy lessee for rent accruing after the outbreak of war under a lease granted before the war was thereby extinguished or suspended, LORD READING says (post p. 1046):

- A "The prohibition of intercourse between persons in this country and alien enemies is based on public policy, and it would indeed be a strange result if a law so founded was held to apply to relieve an alien enemy of obligations incurred before the war in respect of property of which he is not deprived by the Crown, for the property of alien enemies is at common law subject to confiscation by the Crown in virtue of the Royal Prerogative: see HALE'S PLEAS OF THE CROWN, vol. i, p. 95; and Porter v. Freudenberg (1). But if the Crown refrains from exercising the right to confiscate, and allows the alien enemy to continue in ownership of the property, he holds it subject to all its obligations; it would be manifestly absurd that he should derive the advantage of holding the property without liability to perform the obligations incident to his right of ownership."
- C In Robson v. Premier Oil and Pipe Line Co., Ltd. (6), where the question was whether alien enemies were entitled to exercise the right of voting, PICKFORD, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the court, says ([1915] 2 Ch. at pp. 135, 136):
- D "The prohibition of intercourse was stated as extending to much wider limits by LORD STOWELL in The Hoop (5) and The Cosmopolite (38), and reference was made in the judgment to writings of jurists on the subject. The statement there contained has been followed in several cases in the courts of this country, and also in America by such great authorities as STORY and KENT. . . . The prohibition of intercourse with alien enemies rests upon public policy, and we can see no ground either on principle or authority for holding that a transaction between an alien enemy and a British subject which might result in detriment to this country or advantage to the enemy is permissible because it cannot be brought within the definition of a commercial transaction."
- E Later on the same page, however, he expressly refrained from deciding whether the principle extended to intercourse which could not possibly tend to detriment to this country or advantage to the enemy.
- F The result of the cases I have referred to seems to be that in order to determine whether a contract such as this with an alien enemy is illegal and void it is necessary to answer the following questions: (a) Does the contract involve intercourse with an alien enemy? (b) Would it tend, if valid, to the detriment of this country or to the advantage of the enemy? (c) Is it against public policy? For the reasons I have already mentioned, having regard to the facts of this case, my answer to each of these questions is No. Therefore, so far as the common law is
- G concerned this contract of June 2 was, in my opinion, neither illegal nor void. [HIS LORDSHIP then held that the contract was not a "contract with or for the benefit of the enemy" "within the proclamation of Sept. 9, 1914, and concluded:] In my opinion, the contention that the contract was unlawful fails, and the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Army—Court of inquiry—Action on finding by Army Council—Review by civil court—Mandamus—Certiorari—Prohibition.

In a matter affecting discipline in the army the court cannot interfere by mandamus at the suit of an officer or soldier with the proceedings of a military court of inquiry or with any action that may thereupon be taken by the Army Council.

Nor, semble, can it so interfere by certiorari or prohibition.

Notes. The Army Act, 1881, expired on Dec. 31, 1956, and was replaced by the Army Act, 1955 (35 HALSBRYS'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 443), which came into operation on Jan. 1, 1957, and has since been yearly continued in force by Order in Council.

Rule Nisi for a writ of mandamus directed to the Army Council commanding them to cause a court of inquiry to reassemble to hear and determine, according to law, the case of Major and Honorary Lieutenant-Colonel Herbert Valentine Ravenscroft, of the 3rd Border Regiment.

The facts are set out in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

By the Army Act, 1881, s. 42:

"If an officer thinks himself wronged by his commanding officer, and on due application made to him does not receive the redress to which he may consider himself entitled, he may complain to the Army Council in order to obtain justice, who are hereby required to examine into such complaint, and through the Secretary of State make their report to His Majesty in order to receive the directions of His Majesty thereon."

By s. 70 (1):

"Subject to the provisions of this Act His Majesty may, by rules to be signified under the hand of a Secretary of State, from time to time make, and when made repeal, alter, or add to, provisions in respect of the following

A matters or any of them; that is to say, (a) the assembly and procedure of courts of inquiry. . . ."

The Attorney-General (Sir F. E. Smith, K.C.) and Branson showed cause. Hume-Williams, K.C., and R. D. Muir in support of the rule.

VISCOUNT READING, C.J.—In this case Colonel Ravenscroft obtained a rule nisi for a writ of mandamus directed to the Army Council, commanding them to cause a court of inquiry to reassemble, and to hear and determine the case made against him according to law. He based his application upon two grounds. In the first place he contended that he had been condemned without his defence being properly and fully heard; and in the second place he contended that the statutory rules of procedure relating to the constitution and the proceedings of a court of inquiry had not been complied with. When the rule nisi was granted by this court, it was carefully pointed out that it was not to be taken for granted that we in any way decided that we had any jurisdiction to issue the writ of mandamus to the Army Council. The Attorney-General has appeared to show cause against the rule, and he has taken three points. First, he has contended that this court cannot issue a writ of mandamus to the Army Council on the general principle that the civil courts of this country will not intervene in matters appertaining to military law, rules, and discipline. Secondly, he has contended that the Army Council had not in fact convened this particular court of inquiry, and that there was no obligation upon them to do so. Thirdly, he has contended that in any event there was another remedy open to the applicant, equally effective, and that under the circumstances the court should exercise its discretion and refuse the writ of mandamus.

As to the first point. I have no doubt that this court, as a civil court, has no power to intervene in matters which concern military conduct and purely military law affecting the rules and regulations prescribed for the guidance of officers or their military discipline. I am entirely in accord with what WILLES, J., said in Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (1). These are his words (4 F. & F. at pp. 831, 832):

F "It is clear that, with respect to those matters placed within the jurisdiction of the military forces, so far as soldiers are concerned, military men must determine them . . . with respect to persons who enter into military state, who take Her Majesty's pay, and who are content to act under her commission, although they do not cease to be citizens in respect of responsibility, yet they do, by a compact which is intelligible, and which requires only the statement of it to recommend it to the consideration of anyone of common sense, become subject to military rule and military discipline . . . they are subject to a test of law which is different from that administered in civil courts."

I think that the view which is there expressed applies to this case. It is an opinion which binds this court, inasmuch as it has been followed in subsequent cases; but if there had been no such authority laid down, and if I had been compelled to arrive at a conclusion for myself in the first instance, I should have come to a similar conclusion and should have decided this case upon the same principles as are there set out. It is impossible for this court to intervene in such a matter as the present; if we were to do so we should be making the military law dependent upon the civil court. There are regulations prescribed and means afforded for seeking redress when a wrong has been inflicted by a superior officer upon a subordinate officer or upon a soldier, and it is of the essence of the acceptance of a commission in His Majesty's army that the person accepting it makes himself amenable to military law, and subject to the decision of the military authorities when charges of infringement of military law are brought before them. This is expressed in Marks v. Frogley (2) by A. L. SMITH, J.J., in giving the first judgment in the Court of Appeal. I agree with the contention that the actual decision in the case, as well as the actual decision in Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (1), does not decide the matter before us, but each of them contains passages upon the general law applicable which are of great importance. There is the passage I have already quoted, and then there is this one further, where A. L. SMITH, L.J., says ([1898] 1 Q.B. at p. 899):

"I find in the judgment of LUSH, J., in Dawkins v. Lord Paulet (3), some remarks in connection with the articles of war, of which [s. 43 of the Army Act, 1881] is the equivalent, which appear to me to be such sound sense and good law that I must repeat them. He says:

'Can it be reasonably inferred that any other mode or measure of redress was intended by the Act than that which is specified in this article? It is no argument to say that the remedy is imperfect because no pecuniary compensation is given to the injured party. That defect, if it be one, is a defect in the code itself which we cannot remedy. The plaintiff has no reason to complain, for he has all which the law military to which he engaged to submit when he entered the service entitles him to have. The same code creates both the right and the remedy, and this court cannot add to the one or to the other.' "

CHITTY and COLLINS, L.JJ., concurred, and KENNEDY, J., took the same view of the law in the court below. It is upon these principles that we have to consider this case, and I propose to state very briefly the facts which appear to be material for our decision in order to determine how these principles apply in the present instance.

Colonel Ravenscroft was an officer whose conduct with other officers formed the subject of inquiry by a court of inquiry. There had been some complaint with regard to excessive drinking by some of the officers of the regiment to which Colonel Ravenscroft belonged, and in July, 1916, a court of inquiry was held in the trenches of France. As a result of the evidence given there, a court of inquiry was ordered here to be held at Conway, where the battalion was then stationed, having returned from its service in France. The general officer commanding the troops in the western command, not the Army Council, ordered the holding of the inquiry. The court of inquiry met on Sept. 5, 1916. It heard a number of witnesses. Another colonel, whose conduct was also impugned in this connection, and Colonel Ravenscroft were examined before the court. The other witnesses were examined before the court in the presence of Colonel Ravenscroft and the other officer, and were cross-examined by Colonel Ravenscroft. There was an adjournment until the next day, when the same procedure was repeated. The colonel was then told, according to him, that he would have an opportunity of calling witnesses and of making a statement at a later date when the court reassembled. The officer who presided over the court of inquiry differed from that view, but, for the purposes of the present case, not very materially. On Sept. 7 the court did reassemble, and Colonel Ravenscroft says that he had no notice of it. But it only reassembled then, so it is said, for the purpose of examining some mess bills. It met again on Sept. 12, and on that occasion it did again examine mess bills, and heard some evidence with regard to those bills. Neither on Sept. 7 nor on Sept. 12 was Colonel Ravenscroft present, and he states that he had no notice of the meeting of the court on those dates. According to the evidence of the officer presiding, notice was ordered to be given, and there were telephonic communications, from which it appears that the court was told that the commanding officer had been informed that neither of the officers (which would include Colonel Ravenscroft) intended to be present on the examination of the mess bills. The convening officer has since died, and is not, therefore, able to give any evidence. Colonel Ravenscroft, to whom we allowed an opportunity of answering the statement, denies that notice was ever given to him or that he ever stated or gave authority to anyone to state that he did not intend to be present on the examination of the bills, and this court naturally accepts his statement.

I should have said that on Sept. 7 the court came to the conclusion that, having inspected the wine books of the battalion, they were of opinion that, owing to

A the seriousness of the case and the conflicting evidence given by the several officers, the evidence should be taken on oath, and that the officers who had given evidence at the court of inquiry in France should be directed to come to this country to give their evidence and to be cross-examined, or, at all events, to give the opportunity for cross-examination. The court thought that the evidence of these witnesses from France was essential and that no definite finding of the whole case was likely to be arrived at by the court without these witnesses. They, therefore, adjourned pending further instructions. When they met on Sept. 12 and examined the mess accounts and heard some slight evidence about them they made this, as it is called, additional finding: "That the court considers that the amounts underlined in red ink in the attached account are excessive." Some of the items underlined in red ink relate to Colonel Ravenscroft, and, therefore, his counsel is entitled to say that the court of inquiry did consider these mess bills of Colonel Ravenscroft were excessive, and that that finding was before the responsible authority when considering the case.

C It is apparent from these facts that this court of inquiry has never finally reported. This recommendation that the officers should be brought from France was, apparently, considered by the responsible military authority, and the result was that that authority determined, after considering the evidence of fifteen witnesses given on Sept. 5 and 6, in the presence of Colonel Ravenscroft, and subject to his cross-examination and to his calling witnesses if he wished, and acting also upon other information which the military authorities had, that Colonel Ravenscroft should be retired on half-pay. Colonel Ravenscroft did everything which was possible to re-open the inquiry. He communicated with the Army Council and with the Secretary of State for War, and he set forth his grievance in letters written by himself and also by the solicitor who subsequently acted for him. The Army Council reported that the decision was final and refused to re-open the matter. It is in consequence of that that Colonel Ravenscroft has come to this court.

D It is to be observed that the complaint which is made by Colonel Ravenscroft before this court is that he had no notice of the reassembling of the court of inquiry, and, therefore, no opportunity of cross-examining witnesses at the later meetings of the court, or of giving his own explanation. These matters would, indeed, be very relevant if we were considering the proceedings of a civil court. Colonel Ravenscroft relies for his complaint upon the rules of procedure which govern courts of inquiry which, as he alleges, have been infringed. These rules are made under s. 70 of the Army Act [see now s. 103 (1) of the Army Act, 1955].

G They are made by the Secretary of State under the powers given to him by that section, and it is stated in the rule which has been read so often—124 (e) and 124 (f)—that the effect is, as I agree that it is, that notice must be given of the meeting of the court of inquiry and of all adjournments, to all persons concerned in the inquiry, and that

H "whenever any inquiry affects the character or military reputation of an officer or soldier, full opportunity must be afforded to the officer or soldier of being present throughout the inquiry, and of making any statement and of giving any evidence he may wish to make or give, and of cross-examining any witness whose evidence, in his opinion, affects his character or military reputation, and producing any witnesses in defence of his character or military reputation."

I It is because these two rules of procedure have not been fully complied with that Colonel Ravenscroft urges that he is entitled to redress at the hands of a civil court. My difficulty throughout the case has been to understand how in any circumstances it can be established that there has been any breach by the Army Council of any legal obligation imposed upon the Army Council which Colonel Ravenscroft has any legal right to enforce. These are fundamental matters when considering whether or not a writ of mandamus should issue. The whole basis of the application is that the Army Council has refused to perform its statutory obligation. We have again and again asked counsel supporting the rule to point out to us what was the statutory obligation which the Army Council failed to perform or infringed. I do not know at the present moment what the answer is. I cannot find that the Army Council has infringed anything, but what is said is that the Army Council has the power to direct the reassembly of the court of inquiry, and, therefore, that this court, when it finds that the rules of procedure have not been followed, should direct the Army Council to reassemble this court, which means, translated into precise legal language, that this court is directed to command the Army Council to exercise its discretionary right to order the reassembly of the court of inquiry in the way which is asked by Colonel Ravenscroft. I cannot think that this court has any such right. If it is discretionary in the Army Council, this court cannot command it to exercise it in a particular way. If it is discretionary in the Army Council, it does not amount to a statutory obligation which Colonel Ravenscroft has a right to enforce. If it is discretionary in the Army Council, they have exercised their discretion, and have refused to re-open the matter. Again, if it is open to the Army Council to consider other matters, it seems to me that this court cannot order the Army Council to reassemble a court of inquiry, which does not touch the other information, whatever its result, which was before the military authority who recommended the retirement on half-pay of Colonel Ravenscroft. For these reasons I come to the conclusion that the application for a mandamus must fail.

It appears to me that this is a military matter. Colonel Ravenscroft was under military law. His complaint, if any, is against his superior officer who directed the convening of the court of inquiry, and against the officer who, in his view, wronged him by not giving him the proper opportunity of presenting himself on the last two occasions when the court of inquiry met. I should be prepared to decide this case upon the ground that it is a military matter, and, therefore, is not for a civil court, agreeing, as I do, with every word that has been said by the learned judges in the past on this subject. But I do not wish it to be understood that I am deciding that in no circumstances could this court issue a writ of mandamus to the Army Council if it was proved that the Army Council had in fact infringed a statutory obligation which the applicant had a right to enforce. It is not necessary that I should go so far, and, upon so important and so far-reaching a proposition of law, I will only say that I reserve my view.

I am further of opinion that this writ of mandamus ought not to issue even if the first point had been decided in Colonel Ravenscroft's favour, because I think that another remedy, which would be at least equally convenient, beneficial, and appropriate, was open to Colonel Ravenscroft. He could equally have applied under s. 42 of the Army Act [now s. 180 (1) of the Army Act, 1955], and could have complained to the Army Council, who are thereby required to examine into the complaint, and, through the Secretary of State, to make a report to His Majesty, in order to receive the directions of His Majesty thereon. Once it is established that such another remedy is open to Colonel Ravenscroft, it follows, according to the ordinary principles of law applicable to mandamus, that the court will not issue the writ. On that ground also I am of opinion that the applicant fails.

Further, the court will not grant a writ of mandamus unless it is satisfied that the remedy will be effectual. If I am right in the view that I have taken that the Army Council would have the power to consider other information on these military matters that come before them, it is obvious that, even if they were ordered to reassemble the court of inquiry and it was reassembled, it cannot be said that the result would be effectual, because it would still be open to them to decide as they have decided upon the information which was before them from other sources. Moreover, this court would not order the Army Council to reassemble the court of inquiry in order to bring officers home from the field in France to give evidence upon this matter.

I think, further, that this court would be slow to interfere where the complaint is that the rules of procedure have not been strictly followed. The issue of a writ

A of mandamus is under any circumstances discretionary in the court. It is not a matter of right. I do not think that this court ought, in the exercise of its discretion, to order the reassembly for the purpose which I have indicated. Again, satisfied as I am by the evidence which has been produced by the military authorities that they acted, not upon the events of Sept. 7 and 12, 1916—when the reassembly of the court of inquiry took place without notice—but that they acted
B upon the evidence which was collected on Sept. 5 and 6, that is, upon the statements of the fifteen officers as to what had happened at mess and otherwise in this battalion of this Border Regiment, I do not think that it would be right in these circumstances to order the Army Council to take a step which is based solely upon their not having complied in strictness with the rules of procedure. I do not mean by this in any way to intimate that I do not think that it is necessary that an officer accused of any matter which affects his reputation or character ought not to have the fullest opportunity of being heard. What I do mean is that I am satisfied that in substance the military authorities have acted upon information which they got by means of these officers giving evidence on the first two days, and have not acted upon the report of the court of inquiry, which was never final in any sense, but have acted on the whole information which they have been able to collect.
C Having come to these conclusions, I think that, if there was a right to the issue of a writ of mandamus, it could only be if this court exercised its discretion in favour of the applicant, and I should not under the circumstances of this case issue it. I desire only to say that I am satisfied that the application is made with the object of re-opening in some form or other the decision arrived at by the Army Council. It is, in truth, a kind of appeal from the decision of the Army Council, and the D actual infringement of these two rules of procedure with regard to the reassembly of the court of inquiry are the pegs upon which the appeal is really sought to be hung. In my view, the applicant has made out no right to the issue of a writ of mandamus, and it follows that this rule must be discharged.

RIDLEY, J.—I entirely agree with what my Lord has said. I think that it is
F very important to recognise fully the rules laid down in Marks v. Frogley (2) by A. L. SMITH, L.J., which are really taken from Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (1) and other cases previously decided. Civil courts cannot be invoked to redress grievances arising between persons both of whom are subject to military law. Put in other words, the same doctrine is expressed, as I have said, in Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (1) and also in Keighly v. Bell (4), which was decided at the same period and which
G appears in the same volume as Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (1). I think that we ought to do nothing which could fritter away that very important doctrine. I want to say one other word, and it is this. I think, though the point has not been thoroughly argued before us, that no mandamus will lie to the Army Council to bid them act in any particular way in any matter of military discipline. I think that it will not lie to the Army Council any more than it would have done, or ever
H has done, to the commander in chief, whose duties were taken over by the Army Council in 1904. Those matters are entirely in their hands, and it is impossible that a mandamus could be directed to them to act in any particular way in any such matter. If, however, there is a duty imposed by statute which involves no exercise of discretion, but has to be performed, matters assume a different aspect. I do not desire to deal with that point, which does not arise here. There can be
I no question at all but that in this case the matter was one of military discipline. It appears to be established beyond doubt by the affidavits, and particularly by the affidavit of General Childs, which states that the applicant was reverted to retired pay by him, and that his action was approved by the Adjutant-General upon all the information in his possession, and not upon the evidence given before the court of inquiry alone. I think that under the circumstances it cannot be disputed that this was a matter of military discipline, and I, therefore, agree in its entirety with the judgment that has been given by my Lord. This rule must be discharged.

AVORY, J.—I agree that this rule should be discharged for the special reasons applicable to this particular case which have been stated by the Lord Chief Justice. But, as the Crown has invited us to decide this question on a much broader basis. I think that it is also right to say that I concur in the general principle which has been already expressed by the other members of the court. Putting it, if I may venture to do so, in my own words, I express it in this way—that, in a matter affecting discipline in the army, this court cannot interfere, either by mandamus, prohibition, or certiorari, at the suit of an officer or soldier, with the proceedings of a military court of inquiry, or with any action that may thereupon be taken by the Army Council. There are other passages in the judgment of WILLES, J., in Dawkins v. Lord Rokeby (1) which may be quoted beyond those to which the Lord Chief Justice has referred. Thus the learned judge says (4 F. & F. at pp. 831, 832):

"The reading of the oath of the court at a court-martial, out of art. 102, which has been referred to in the course of the case, is abundant to show, with respect to all matters which come under the cognisance of the military tribunals, they are subject to a test of law which is different from that administered in civil courts; it is to be according to military usage and their approval."

He goes on to refer to Johnstone v. Sutton (5) which was in the House of Lords, and he says (ibid.):

"Not only in the case of Johnstone v. Sutton (5) was it shown that military matters, properly brought within the true limits of military jurisdiction, are not to be called in question in civil courts; but also in a subsequent case, in the last century, of Grant v. Gould (6), it was laid down, upon an application for a prohibition, that a man, by becoming a soldier, and receiving the Queen's pay, does agree and consent that he shall be subject to military discipline, and he cannot appeal to civil courts to rescue him from his own compact. . . . It is not competent for this court to undo that which Her Majesty has done, upon the advice of the proper authorities in these matters."

He goes on to state that at that date, namely, in 1866, there was one of the articles of war which provided redress in such a case:

"That if any officer shall think himself wronged by his commanding officer, and upon due application shall not receive the redress to which he is entitled, he is to make his complaint in the manner there pointed out, and he is to seek redress in that manner."

WILLES, J., says (ibid. at p. 833):

"I cannot entertain a doubt that this is the law; whatever responsibility may attach to me for pronouncing it, I must pronounce it, as I am satisfied that it exists."

He also goes on to say, in a passage which may be appropriate perhaps to this particular case (ibid.):

"Nor ought I to allow any feeling of sympathy for Colonel Dawkins, even if I felt it, to interfere with the discharge of my plain duty, that is, to abstain from matters with which I have no concern."

There is also a passage in the judgment of COCKBURN, C.J., which I think is appropriate to this principle, in R. v. Treasury Lords Comrs. (7). It is this (L.R. 7 Q.B. at p. 394):

"It is not because there is no other remedy but that which may be a fruitless and abortive one, that this court has jurisdiction to issue a writ of mandamus. I take it, with reference to that jurisdiction, we must start with this unquestionable principle, that when a duty has to be performed (if I may use that expression) by the Crown, this court cannot claim even in appearance to have any power to command the Crown; the thing is out of the question.

A Over the Sovereign we can have no power. In like manner, where the parties are acting as servants of the Crown, and are amenable to the Crown, whose servants they are, they are not amenable to us in the exercise of our prerogative jurisdiction."

B In this case the real complaint which is made is that one of the regulations for courts of inquiry has not been complied with. In my opinion, if that is so, and it is not necessary to express any opinion if that is so or not for the reasons that I have given, the remedy is by complaint to the superior officer who has command and control over these proceedings, and ultimately under s. 42 of the Army Act which corresponds to the article of war in force in 1866. For these reasons I agree that this rule should be discharged.

Rule discharged.

Animal—Dog—Licence—Keeping dog without licence—Conviction of owner in respect of one date—Liability to conviction in respect of later date in same year—Dog Licences Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict., c. 5), s. 8.

F

An information was preferred against the respondent for keeping a dog on May 30, 1917, without a licence, which, in fact, he had done. On April 18, 1917, he had been convicted of keeping the same dog on March 28, 1917, without a licence. The justices were of opinion that, as the respondent had been convicted during 1917 of keeping a dog without a licence for that year, he could not again be convicted of the offence during the same year in view of the fact that the licence required under the Dog Licences Act, 1867, was a licence which need only be taken out once in each year, and they dismissed the information.

G

Held: the offence of which the respondent had been previously convicted, namely, keeping a dog on Mar. 28 without a licence, was a different offence from that with which he was subsequently charged, namely, keeping the dog on May 30 without a licence, and, therefore, he was liable to conviction on the later charge.

Notes. Section 8 of the Dog Licences Act, 1867, has been replaced by s. 12 (1) of the Dog Licences Act, 1959 (see 39 HALSBURY'S STATUTES (2nd Edn.) 24).

Case Stated by Essex justices.

On June 6, 1917, an information was preferred by Frederick Charles Flack (the appellant) under s. 8 of the Dog Licences Act, 1867, against John Church (the respondent), for that he on May 30, 1917, at Thaxted, Essex, did unlawfully keep a dog without having in force a licence authorising him to do so, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided. On the hearing of the information the following facts were proved: The respondent kept at his residence at Thaxted a greyhound dog on May 30, 1917, on which day he had not in force a licence under the Dog Licences Act, 1867, authorising him to keep a dog. On April 18, 1917, before a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at the petty sessional courthouse, Great Dunmow, the respondent was convicted of the offence of keeping a dog without a licence at Thaxted on Mar. 28, 1917, and fined 15s. The dog kept by the respondent on both Mar. 28, 1917, and May 30, 1917, was the same dog. The justices were of opinion that, as the respondent had been convicted during the year 1917 of the offence of keeping a dog without a licence for that year, he could not again be convicted of the offence during the same year, having regard to the fact that the licence required under the Dog Licences Act, 1867, was a licence which need only be taken out once in each year.
